THE SYMPATHIZING HIGH PRIEST.

"We have not an High Priest, which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities."

When gathering clouds around I view,
And days are dark and friends are few,
On him I lean, who not in vain
Experienced every human pain.
He sees my wants, allays my fears,
And counts and treasures up my tears.

If aught should tempt my soul astray,
From heavenly virtue's narrow way,
To fly the good I would pursue,
And do the sin I would not do;
Still he who felt temptation's power,
Shall guard me in that dangerous hour.

If wounded love my bosom swell,
Deceived by those I prized too well;
He shall his pitying aid bestow
Who felt on earth severer woe:
Desertion, treachery, and scorn,
By all who shared his daily bread.

When vexing thoughts within me rise,
And sore dismayed my spirit dies;
Then He who once vouchsafed to bear
The sickening anguish of despair,
Shall sweetly soothe, shall gently dry,
The throbbing heart, and streaming eye.

When sorrowing o'er some stone I bend,
Which covers all that was a friend;
And from his voice, his hand, his smile,
Divides me for a little while;
Thou, Saviour, seest the tears I shed,
For thou hast wept o'er Lazarus dead.

And oh! when I have safely passed
Through every conflict but the last,
Still, still unchanging, watch beside
My painful bed, for thou hast died,
To guide to realms of endless day,
And wipe the latest tears away.

Christian Lyrics.

THE DEAD OF THE PAST YEAR.

"Blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord."

...ey dread no storm that lowers,
...e perished joys bewail;
...y pluck no thorn-clad flowers,
...ow drink of streams that fail:
...ere is no tear-drop in their eye,
...r change upon their brow;
The ...ed bosom heaves no sigh,
The ...ed earth's idols bow.

...o are so truly blessed?
...From whom hath sorrow fled?
Who find such deep unbroken rest,
While all things toil?—The dead!
The holy dead!—Why weep ye so
Above their sable bier?
Thrice blessed! they have done with woe,—
The living claim the tear.

We dream, but they awake;
Dark visions mar our rest;
Mid thorns and snares our way we take,
And yet we mourn the blessed;
For those who throng the eternal throne,
Lost are the tears we shed;
They are the living, they alone,
Whom thus we call the dead.

THERE COMES A TIME.

There comes a time when I must die,
When I must draw my latest breath,
While weeping friends around me sigh,
To see me in the arms of death.

There comes a time when I must be Borne to the cold and silent tomb,
That bell will sweetly toll for me,
Which fills so many hearts with gloom.

There comes a time when I must give,
Account for all I've done below,
When the just Judge will bid me live,
Or banish me to endless woe.

These things must all, may soon, transpire,
How soon is known to God alone,
My earnest wish, my heart's desire
Is that my Father's will be done.

Selections.

IRRELIGION OF MEN.

There is a cause which we suspect (and we say it without consciousness of feeling towards our clerical brethren) is quite influential in producing the evil in question. It is the manner in which religious truth has been presented too often from the pulpit. While there is here and there a case in which the preacher deals too exclusively in truths, and in modes of presenting them, which are suited to the nature and taste of strong men, has not the rule come to be, to revel in ideas and imagery which, though they may amuse or beguile men for the moment, yet lay no strong arrest either upon the understanding or the conscience?

* * There is a prevalent habit, among clergymen of the present day, of dwelling only on the lighter relations of truth, and of shaping thought very much after the fashion of modern works of fiction. Artistically rounded periods, a profusion of metaphor, something like a sentimental strain, a studied, artificial delivery are marks of too many pulpits. Now, men are quick at detecting the unreal. They see too much of it in the world of business and pleasure, to like it in the sacred desk, or, at least, to be influenced by it there. If the minister do not reach their understanding or conscience, he will probably fall of all salutary influence over them. They will attend church, perhaps, but without any serious purpose, and listen to the discourse as a matter of course. Slowly they will conclude that there is no truth in Christianity, or that their minister is but little under its power. In either case, they will turn the whole subject of serious religion over to their wives and daughters, and the preacher. This is, indeed, a deplorable result. How far the prevailing indifference of men to the Gospel is traceable to this cause, we cannot determine; but we, who have, to such a fearful extent, the responsibility of their salvation on our shoulders, should see to it that we are not to blame by our preaching. Let us so preach that men will be forced to hear, and through the Spirit's power, to heed.

Protestant Churchman.

"I SAT DOWN under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste." Intimacy with the Saviour is happiness, and from that adoring and affectionate communion there should be seen to arise a decisive effect on the temper and conduct.

DIFFICULTIES OF AUTHORS.

As regards works of sterling merit, an author at the present day is at a greater disadvantage, because he must write for the many, and not for the few. As to the few—men of sound sense and pure taste—their wants are nearly all supplied. New truths or new principles no one can attempt to supply, and they readily detect the old story, however ingeniously disguised. This is true, to a great extent, of prose; but as to poetry, all the figures and resources of the poet, and all the similes and metaphors are so familiar, that men regard new poetry like new sermons—as a very unnecessary re-production of things long familiar to the mind. But those who cater for the many must remember, as Aristotle said, that they must calculate on an audience composed of a "very ordinary or unsophisticated set of people." The consequence is, said Thomas Moore, that since those "Who live to please, must please to live," authors will learn to write down to the lowest standard. For literature, like legislation, is soon found to suffer by that kind of universal suffrage which results from extending the circle of your judges.

Authors had need to be men of patient industry, for they labor under serious disadvantages; for authors, like public speakers, have often complained that, without practice they can never be perfect; and, till they are perfect, they have few opportunities of practice.

No reader will buy, and no publisher will offer, anything that is only "very good, considering." Of oratory, it has been remarked that there was never any good speaker who did not acquire his proficiency at the expense of his hearers. There was Charles James Fox, a man who, as said Wilberforce, could commence at full speed, and go on for hours without fatiguing himself or his hearers—even his talents were gradually developed by practice; for, he made a point of speaking as often as he could—once every night if an opportunity offered—expressly with a view to his own improvement.

But, as to Authorship, readers are not quite as indulgent as hearers, and by no means so easy to satisfy. The author soon learns that mere mediocrity will not pass current; and is therefore tempted to aspire to excellence to which he might attain by practice to an ambitious and unnatural effort to appear perfect in a day. The author is still further cramped and discouraged by critics to conciliate, by arbitrary rules and models from which it is dangerous to depart, and by some conventional standard to which his taste must conform. What wonder that the free spirit of genius should be impatient of such leading-strings, and that society should often lose the benefit of the noblest creative powers by exacting a style assisted to their bent! just as the noblest of Grecian architects might have been lost to the world in an age when nothing but Gothic could be understood.

STRANGE VERSION OF THE "PARADISE LOST."

Milton is also a witness to the truth that the highest poetic genius must stoop to patient toil.

The first rude sketch of Paradise Lost is preserved in the form of one of the ancient religious dramas, called Mysteries, and bearing the name of Adam the Un-paradised. Voltaire tells a wild story of a farce from which, he says, Milton derived some hints while in Italy, called the Adam of Andenisi, and opening, as Dr. Johnson delighted to quote, with something no less curious than the line, "Let the rainbow be the fiddle-stick of the fiddle of Heaven."

That the Paradise Lost was written after the most mature preparation, that it was the disburdening of a mighty spirit, and the outpouring of a mind "rich with the spoils of time," and laden with the treasures of widely-varied and comprehensive research, there can, indeed, be no kind of doubt. At the commencement of the 9th book, Milton has left on record that, at that stage of his wondrous work, if not before, his sight was gone. And since it is through the eye that all the beauties of the present, and very much of the wisdom of the past, gain admission to the mind, Milton presents to us the interesting picture of genius engaged in the greatest of all intellectual works, and solely depending on a store which it was from that moment forbidden to replenish or increase.

Milton composed with much rapidity. The silence of the night and the freshness of the early dawn were the hours most congenial to his powers. At these times "he would pour out with great fluency his unpremeditated verse." "Versification,"—it is Dr. Johnson we are quoting—"free, like Milton's, from the distresses of rhyme, must, by a work so long, be made prompt and habitual; and, when his thoughts were once adjusted, the words would come at his command." No small part of the Paradise Lost was composed while the poet was playing on his organ, or swinging in his chair, which at times was the only kind of exercise he could enjoy. For Milton suffered severely from the gout: so much so, that he used to say that, were it not for his gout, his blindness would be tolerable.

A POET WORKING BY CONTRACT.

Having thus been indulged with a glimpse, not only at Goldsmith, but at Milton, in the hour of their inspiration, let us our turn to look into the study of Alexander Pope.

Pope obtained, by practice, such facility of versification, that his thoughts eventually began to clothe themselves more naturally in poetry than in prose. But this proficiency was the merited reward of pains and practice, and not the free privilege of unaided talent. Pope's Iliad was published by subscription, as also were Milton's Paradise Lost, Dryden's Virgil, and several other works of the same early date. Pope engaged, with a list of five hundred and seventy-five subscribers, for six hundred and fifty-four copies (the first impression was only six hundred and sixty,) to supply a poetical translation of the Iliad, in six quartos, at the price of six guineas each set. Having committed himself to this bold undertaking, "he was for a time, timorous and uneasy, had his nights disturbed by dreams of long journeys through unknown ways, and wished, as he said, 'that somebody would hang him.'"

Pope's facility increased with practice; and he represents himself as despatching regularly fifty lines a day, and making sanguine computations of the duration of his labors. At the rate of fifty lines a day, the Iliad, numbering nearly sixteen thousand lines, would have been translated in three hundred and twenty days; this would be about one year's work, if we deduct the Sundays. But the actual time of the performance was nearly six times that period. For Pope began the Iliad in the twenty-fifth year, and ended it in the thirtieth year of his age.

The following passage from Johnson offers so feeling and so sensible an apology for this wide difference between the plan and the performance of Pope's Iliad that we venture to introduce it, more especially as it furnishes an excellent specimen of that language which Lord Macaulay aptly called Johnsonese; though, at the same time, it exemplifies an opinion we very strongly entertain, that it was the fulness and the accuracy of Johnson's mind, as well as his measured and dictatorial manner, which betrayed him into such cumbersome sentences. When the subject was weighty and worthy of his diction, so much may be said, certainly in its favor; but we cannot deny that sometimes he reminds us of a giant cracking nuts. So, Goldsmith told Johnson, very wittily, that, if he were to write a book about little fishes, he would make them all talk like whales.

The passage in Johnson to which we allude is the following:—"According to this calculation, the progress of Pope may seem to have been slow; but the distance is commonly very great between actual performances and speculative possibility. It is natural to suppose that as much as has been done to-day may be done to-morrow; but on the morrow some difficulty emerges or some external impediment obstructs. Indolence, interruption, business, and pleasure, all take their turns of retardation; and every long work is lengthened by a thousand causes that can, and by ten thousand that cannot, be recounted. Perhaps no extensive and multifarious performance was ever effected within the term originally fixed in the undertaker's mind. He that runs against time has an antagonist not subject to casualties."

JOHNSON: WHY LESS EASY THAN ADDISON.

Some readers may observe, How different is this writing from the ease and the elegance of Addison! True; but only try to express the same number of ideas with equal precision in Addison's style, and see what will be the result. Johnson could as easily have clothed his nowise gaudy gems in the garments, as have clothed his thoughts in the language of Addison. If, however, we are asked whether Addison would not have been contented to say less, and to give the same general idea with less detail and limitation, we say, Certainly he would; and we should have admired his good sense for so doing. But still we must maintain, that one great cause that Johnson's sentences are so heavy is, that they contain so much; and, to use rather a homely illustration, we can hardly expect that Johnson's cake should be as light and digestible as Addison's, because it had so many more plums. At the same time, we fully admit that, with the same materials, Addison had much the lighter hand.

THE AMERICAN REFORM TRACT AND BOOK SOCIETY.

This society held its Annual Meeting at the Society's room, No. 28 West Fourth St., Cincinnati, Nov. 6th, 8 o'clock, P. M. The President, Rev. John Rankin, of Ripley, O., opened the meeting with prayer. Mr. A. S. Morrell, Recording Secretary, read the minutes of last meeting. The Treasurer, Mr. G. L. Weed, then read his report. The receipts and expenditures during the year were $6,362.50. The Corresponding Secretary then read the Directors' Report. It spoke of the liberality and unflagging spirit of the society. "The society seeks to unite Christians of every name in opposition to a common foe." It reaches all classes. There is a variety in its publications. By logical argument, didactic teaching, and interesting narrative, it instructs, warns, and encourages every class. It rebukes all sin. To this end was it formed. Similar organizations had failed here. While faithful in reproving certain sins, they did not condemn, in an equally certain and loud voice, all sin. Expediency, policy, fear, or other motives which we could not justify, made them silent respecting some. The society is represented as a national organization, and the term American, in its name, is not meaningless. While it has special claims on Western Christians, it has friends, and sympathisers, and supporters in the distant East, and even in the far off South.

It is an evangelical society. Let the reader note this. It is one of its brightest traits. "Bible doctrines are its principles, and only as it presents those doctrines does it claim approval and support!"

At the last Annual Meeting, the Board of Managers expressed the hope that the society would be able to publish a considerable number of new books this year; but the unsettled state of the country, and the consequent embarrassed condition of financial matters, have rendered this impossible. "We have," say they, "however, printed new editions of some of our stereotype works. In all, we have published 8000 bound volumes, and 108,000 tracts, making 1,500,000 pages during the year. Our circulation this year has been, of books, 10,577, and of tracts, 126,000, amounting to 2,167,000 pages; 1,736 bound volumes, and 624,000 tract pages, of this circulation have been on donation account, or at the society's expense, amounting to $758,00. In addition to this gratuitous circulation, we have sent out, without charge, some 12,000 of the 'Christian Press' to donors, and such persons as we hope to influence in favour of our society and its work." "The total circulation of books and tracts during the past six years has been nearly 20,000,000 pages, including 100,000 bound volumes, and of the Christian Press 500,000 copies, equal to 14,000,000 tract pages." Their books and tracts are sold by colporteurs and booksellers from Massachusetts to Kansas.

The "Christian Press," the organ and record of the society, is in universal favour among its 50,000 readers. "Its out-spoken sentiments on universal freedom meet a response from many Christian hearts that sigh for our country's guilt in the sin of oppression. Its first page of aids to the devout Christian, endears it to many hearts, and in some cases gains a place for it in the family reading where its anti-slavery sentiments have not been sufficiently appreciated. It aims to make reform, in its highest sense, a prominent theme, and secures Christian confidence. Its 'Children's Corner,' where children learn something of the evil and sin of slavery, secures it a place in Sabbath Schools; and its soliciting agency reminds patrons of our aims and wants, and secures their contributions."

The society does little in the way of employing soliciting agents. They have an arrangement with "The Western Tract Agency," located at Chicago, by which money is collected for the society, and its publications are distributed. "The Western Tract Agency" operates (in the territory) west and north of Indiana. Messrs. A. Lord and O. Davidson, of Elgin, Ill., have agreed to pay, in part, the cost of 4,000 copies of the "Christian Press" for one year, when sent to such families or individuals as do not receive any religious paper, and will pay the postage (6 cts. a year) on the "Press."

The assets of the society are 4,876 pages, stereotype plates, copyrights, and engravings, costing	$4,536.55
Tracts and books on hand, bound and in sheets,	1,473.85
Tracts and books out on sale,	3,000.00
Paper on hand for tracts, books, and "Press,"	236.00
Office furniture,	66.50
Cash on hand,	654.25
	$9,957.15

The society has recently had opened up to it a new field for tract distribution—the army! "By the circulation of former publications, and the preparation of new ones especially adapted to the times, (such as the tracts 'What are we fighting for?' etc.) an effort has been made to give our soldiers right views of the conflict in which they and we are engaged, to inspire them with proper motives in the prosecution of the war, and to fit them for suffering and death, to which they are so constantly exposed."

They have sent many thousands of tracts and the "Press" into the camps, not only in their own vicinity, but into Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, on account of which many a care-worn, foot-sore, wounded, and dying soldier, no doubt, has blessed them; and blessed, too, those Christians and churches who have put the means, to do this good work, into the hands of this truly philanthropic society! Reader! if you have a dollar to spare, send it to the Reform Tract Society, Cincinnati, to buy books, papers, and tracts for the soldiers. Rest assured, that here, you can get the right kind—just such reading as our army and navy need—as, for instance, the following tracts:—"The Sinner's Friend," "Not Careful, but Prayerful," "Our Country's Greatest Danger and True Deliverance," "Slavery in Rebellion an Outlaw, and How to Meet It," "Think of Your Soul," "You are Immortal," "Awake and Repent," etc., etc.

Terms of the "Christian Press:" Single copies, 20 cts; 20 copies to one address, postage paid by the society, $2.00; 20 copies, to one address, postage paid by the receiver, $1.20. At the same rate for any greater number. OCCASIONAL.

THE GOOD SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHER.

At a Sabbath School Convention held last month in Camden, N. J., Rev. David Cole spoke as follows:

He would "plunge at once into the middle of things, and catch his fire from the inspiration of the hour and the occasion that had called them together." The question of the church's duty to the Sabbath-school had borne with full weight on his mind and heart, but he would now address himself first to the subject-matter of the Sabbath-school—the things to be taught. These were the truths of God's word. God had designed to give a revelation of his will. It made known two leading truths: that men were sinners, then God had provided a Saviour. Sin and salvation. Around these two points clustered all the truths of inspiration. It was the work of the teacher, with all the ability God had given him, to impress these two truths on his scholars' minds. These great facts should be bound up in the teacher's heart, as a part of his thinking, his being. They should be most present with him, animating, controlling, possessing him. Then he might be in position to impart something of their sublimity, to gain something of the ear and heart of his pupils. Does the church realize that its great mission is to teach the rising generation the word of God?

The work of teaching was a delightful one. The acquisition of knowledge, even of a secular sort, was a spring of pure delight, and the communication of it gave exquisite pleasure. To see the mind grow and expand under one's guidance, to watch the eye sparkle, the face light up, as new facts were appropriated, was a happy employment. But O, what infinite joy to unfold the knowledge of God and of the soul's destiny! What honor to be intrusted with the education of immortal souls! Will any teacher say, "I knew all this before; tell me something new?" The reply will be, "Dear teacher, here's the trouble with you: you have never filled your soul with the thought; it has never taken possession of you; you have not been brought under the thrilling power of that conviction." O, it seems as if Christ's workers were lying supinely on their back, when we cast our eyes over a perishing world, and then sum up the little self-denial, the small sacrifices which they are willing to make to save it.

Again, what measure of time and thought have we, as teachers, devoted to the study of God's word, our text-book? Do we search it as the miner for his treasures? Do we believe there are treasures hidden worth seeking? Do we know from experience that the seeking is rewarded? Have we ever realized the surprising joy that delights the soul at new-found views of truth and duty? Have we, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, had our hopes encouraged, our energies fired, our souls transformed, by pondering on heavenly things? If we have, how shall we teach? Certainly with corresponding zeal and devotion.

A good teacher, again, must have this characteristic: He must be a man earnest, fervent in prayer. The great objection the speaker had against employing unconverted teachers was, that they could not pray over their work. They had no sympathy with God over souls. But can it be that any teacher will do less than pray for his scholars? Will he do less than take them often to the mercy seat, and agonise for them? Will he forget to ask for gifts, for wisdom, patience, grace, to teach aright? Does the teacher want souls for his bite, trophies of divine grace to be gems in the crown of his rejoicing? The apostle labored and prayed that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus his Lord. The faithful teacher's language would be, "Lo, here am I, and the children thou hast given me." His heart was large. It was not enough to be clothed upon at Christ's right hand himself, but he desired his scholars there—a long train of redeemed ones. His language was, "No one will satisfy me, no two, no portion of them, will satisfy me." I want all I ever have anything to do with, every little child upon whose plastic soul I can make an impress of the loving words of my Saviour's—all for whom I ever pray and labor, to be given to me, for my Saviour's sake." This is the spirit of a faithful teacher's prayer. Do we have it?

The teacher must, again, be a working man and woman. Some think they never can be useful workers! The reason is they never honestly, earnestly try. First be a student of the Bible; then be fervent in prayer; and, as a natural consequence, you will be useful in your life—an energetic worker. This will give a new value to the material. It will beget love for souls, and love for the work. Some lazy teachers, who do not work with a will think the Sabbath-school a dull place, and the hour a long one that they spend there. They get through with the lesson in a few minutes, and then seem drained out, positively emptied; and they really shout more over their escape, when the hour is up, than they would over the salvation of a soul!

Then, something else must be done by the faithful teacher. He must bear his scholars on his mind during the week, visit them at their homes, study their circumstances, natures, habits, that he may sympathise with them, watch for them, and pray over them. He must, in short, be full of his work. It must be before his secular business. The glory of God, through his scholars, must be above all, before all earthly considerations.

S. S. Times.

TRAINING OF CHILDREN—ITS DIFFICULTIES.

The comprehensiveness or solemnity of the moral obligations or responsibilities resting upon those in the married state, appear most fully, when the duties required to be performed by them towards their offspring are considered. For there is not a greater moral problem than that of the training of children. He who has never been actually engaged in the work can have no adequate idea of its important claims upon those on whom it rests; nor how severely it tests their individual capacity at each successive step. Our mode of conducting it, its success or failure, forms the criterion by which others determine our own moral worth; or if not, if others should not so judge of us, our own consciences will invariably refer the principal part of the blame attached to an unsuccessful training of our children to ourselves. We cannot but see our faults reflected in those of our children, and whatever we see amiss in them is only calculated to increase and deepen our own humiliation. He who does not become sensible of his own defects after having thus seen them re-appear in the conduct of his children, gives but little promise of ever acquiring in any way a knowledge of himself.

Yet it cannot be denied, that there are certain facts, which seem to contradict what conscience so clearly affirms. It is indeed one of the most enigmatical phenomena in human life, or one, too, of such frequent occurrence, that it needs no proof, namely, that the children of good parents often become degenerate, whilst careless and corrupt parents are as often favored with good children. Many a child for whose proper training the parents did, apparently, all that could be done, in the way of admonition, example, instruction and watchfulness, falls into evil courses, whilst others, left to themselves, and for whom no one seems to care, grow up to be useful members of society and sincere and exemplary Christians. Pleasing instances of this latter kind may easily be accounted for. For who does not recognize in them an evidence of a special Divine providence, a confirmation of the promise, that God will be a father to the orphan; and surely the most important of all orphans are those whose parents fail to hold up before them an example worthy of imitation. Thus forsaken of father and mother, such a child is taken up by the Lord, becomes an object of his special care, and is compensated by Him, in an extraordinary way, for the loss it sustains, by being deprived of the sheltering influences of family life.

The greater mystery attaches to instances of the opposite kind, even as they are recorded in the sacred Scriptures. They are frequently met with in pious families at the present day, and are becoming, it seems to us, more numerous than formerly.

The investigation of the causes of this fact should not be entered into in a censorious spirit, but only with a desire of increasing our self-knowledge.

First of all, it is true that every one must bear his own burden. Our maintaining with Aristotle and Herbert, that education is every thing, does in no wise affect the well-established principle, that every one is personally responsible for his moral or immoral conduct. His actions are, and ever must remain his own, to whatever extent he may have been influenced by others. If they spring from deep-rooted and confirmed habit, he is so much the more culpable for permitting such habit to grow upon him. If they are the manifestations of an evil temper, our sentence of condemnation is, as Kant observes, still more severe. A man's moral peculiarities are imputed to him as his own work. To deny this, is to deny the right to judge of moral actions. If this be so, then may his evil tendencies also be his own work, even in opposition to better educational influences. There is a possibility that a child may, without a parent's or teacher's fault, take to evil courses.

There is a possibility of this being so, but in no single instance can we say with certainty, in this case it has been so. Our sympathy for the parent may incline us to assume that the child's evil tendencies are entirely its own fault. But the degenerate child has also a claim to our sympathy, and this admonishes us so lay part of the blame upon the instructor. Nor will any one, who has in any way shared the responsibility of the training of children, ever venture to clear himself entirely of all blame.

If we examine these unhappy instances more closely, numberless cases will appear, in which the errors committed in the training of children, are clearly discernible even by the eye of man; for acquaintances and friends, though greatly deficient themselves in the proper performance of this particular duty, are, nevertheless, in most cases, able to form a tolerably correct opinion of the deficiencies of others. Follies, which appear insignificant to ourselves, often exert an after-influence upon the child, which may prove a snare and become productive of incalculable mischief. But could we see as God sees; could we, with his omniscient eye, penetrate all those secrets which are known only to parents, and frequently, perhaps, to only one or the other of these, our knowledge would be infinitely increased. Our most secret faults, known, besides ourselves, only to God, are sometimes permitted to re-appear in our children, and being thus constantly held up to our view, they administer a reproof, which is more galling to our consciences, because understood only by ourselves. The Holy Scriptures show a connection between the secret actions of parents, and the conduct and destiny of their children. This is plainly set forth in the history of David. The ruin he had brought on the house of Uriah, resulted in the destruction of his own hitherto happy family. He had, by his double crime, destroyed both honor and life. His sons committed similar crimes against himself and also against each other. He had sinned in secret, the retribution overtook him openly before the world.

He who has witnessed instances similar to these, will not scoff at, nor comment hypercritically upon the Divine declaration that "God will visit the sins of the fathers upon the children." He will rather tremble in view of such evidences of retributive justice. The consciousness that every evil deed will be attended with consequences which will injuriously affect even his children, must rather be to him, as Tertullian observes, a solemn warning to guard carefully against every act of disobedience. God, who has ordained this connexion, does not, on that account, perform an act of injustice against the child. It is His law for this world, that the sons be partakers of the wrong committed by their fathers, even as the individual is a partaker of the wrong committed by the society with which he stands identified, or the government under which he lives. This is a fact, which, even though it had not been declared in God's word, would still be evident, for our daily experience bears witness to its truth. A different law, however, obtains in the world to come. There, every one will receive according to his own works, and suffer only for the wrong he has himself committed.

In all this we would, however, not be thought as indulging a taste for censure or hasty judgment. These considerations address themselves to the conscience of every one. They cause us to turn our eyes from others, back into the innermost recesses of our own hearts. There, the solution of much that is mysterious in the destiny of the family, stands already recorded, if we would only endeavor to read and understand it.

A GOOD HEARER.

We often read about good preachers, and we wish there were hundreds of them where there is now but one. But we are disposed to think that good hearers do much to make good preachers. Ministers often find that they can preach far better to some hearers than they can to others. This shows that hearers have an effect on preachers, as well as preachers on hearers. I propose to characterize a good hearer.

1. He comes to the house of God with a desire to be instructed and profited by the word preached. Do not many attend church without any such desire? But the good hearer has an object in view in visiting the sanctuary—he wishes to increase in divine knowledge and grace.

2. That he may be profited by what he hears, he humbly asks God to make his heart like the good ground, which brings forth a hundredfold when the good seed is sown upon it. He that prays well before going to church, will be likely to hear well when he gets there.

3. The good hearer endeavors to fix his mind on divine subjects while on his way to the place of worship. Men are too apt to think and talk on worldly matters when going in company to the house of God. The good hearer guards against this.

4. When he arrives at church, he goes directly to his seat, and raises his earnest aspirations to Heaven, that he may not be a sleepy or forgetful hearer, but a doer of the word. People are too apt to linger about the steps, to meet old acquaintances, shake hands, and talk on worldly subjects. The good hearer seeks to avoid this.

5. He gives devout attention to each part of divine worship. During prayer, he puts himself in a devotional attitude, instead of sitting erect with his eyes open. He looks out the hymn, and sings with the spirit and the understanding, if not with his voice. During the singing, instead of looking at the singers, he looks at his hymn-book, and follows the sacred song with his eye and mind as it proceeds.

6. Instead of gazing about the house, below or above, or putting his head down in a comfortable attitude for sleeping during the delivery of the sermon, he keeps his eyes most of the time on the speaker.

7. If he does not make a memorandum on paper of the text and main thoughts of the discourse, he endeavors to fix them in his memory and conscience.

8. He endeavors not to have his attention so taken up by the manner and style of the speaker as to lead him to forget the truths which he utters. He does not hear to criticise, but to remember and practise.

9. While he is charitable enough to desire all the hearers to "receive with meekness the ingrafted word," yet he hears for himself as well as for others.

10. After returning from the Lord's house, he endeavors to recall to mind as much of the discourse as possible, and inwardly digest it, that he may grow thereby in knowledge and grace. And perhaps he recounts the main points of the sermon in the presence of others, for his own and their profit.

11. And finally, the good hearer is careful and conscientious in paying his regular allowance to his minister as soon as it is due, that his minister's mind may be free from worldly cares.

Good hearers, as well as good preachers, are quite too scarce in our day. Well for all to seek to improve.

WHAT WOULD BE THE EFFECT OF THE EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVES?

In days past, pro-slavery orators had always a ready answer to the above query. It was something like the following:

1. Emancipate the slaves, and they will overrun the entire North, as the frogs did Egypt in the days of Moses, and eat out all its substance. Or, 2. Emancipate them, and they will refuse to work, and will engage in robbery and murder, to obtain the means of living.

We have never heard or read of proof being adduced in favor of the first proposition. On the contrary, notwithstanding the fact that to-day there are more free colored people in the South, persecuted and down-trodden though they are, and liable to be sold into slavery, than in the Free North, e. g.: Ohio has only about twenty five thousand colored people, while Maryland has some seventy-four thousand, more indeed than all New England,—yet, notwithstanding this, the first proposition is supposed by many to partake of the nature of an axiom, and needs no proof. The fact is, the proof is all the other way—even free colored people prefer the South to the North, and would gladly remain in it.

The West India Islands have been time and again referred to, in proof of the second proposition, and the fact that for some years after emancipation there, there was a falling off in some of the Islands of the amount of sugar exported, has been deemed sufficient proof. It is taken for granted the decrease was owing to the refusal of the emancipated negroes to labor, and after assuming their idleness, then it was thought safe to infer, without regard to facts, that they engaged in robbery and murder. Hence the truth of the proposition. Strange logic, say your readers; nevertheless it has been accepted as sound, by many a mind, and to-day they tremble at the word Emancipation. To quiet the nerves of such we call attention to the following facts:—

1. It has only been a few of the Islands where there has been any decrease in the amount of sugar produced, as the following statistics will show:—

Average annual export of sugar:—

	From 1826 to 1829 slave.	1856 to 1860 free.
British Guiana,	98,000,000 lbs	100,000,000
Trinidad,	37,000,000 "	62,000,000
Barbadoes,	32,800,000 "	78,000,000
Antigua,	19,500,000 "	24,400,000
Imports during the same time,	$8,810,000	$14,000,000

But why was there a falling off in any of the Islands? The answer is furnished by the report of the English Commissioners appointed to ascertain the workings of emancipation as quoted in the "Free Nation," viz., "Labor was thrown into other channels, and is more productive in its new forms than in the old ones. The planters in most cases refused to hire their slaves after they became freemen, and they were reduced to the necessity of taking up government lands for themselves. Hence there are now thousands of farms, ranging in size from a garden spot to a plantation, owned and cultivated by these freemen;" at the present time there are more than one hundred thousand freeholders (colored) working in their own little properties, and accumulating capital. To this we might add another reason; namely, an increased consumption at home after emancipation—we cannot now give the amount, but it is stated by authorities to be considerable.

But take all the Islands concerned in emancipation together, and what do we find?

1. As to population, in 1834, (slave,) it was 827,224. In 1851, (Free,) it had increased to 1,069,885.2. As respects Revenue, in 1833, under slavery it was £432,999. In 1851, under Freedom it was £716,719. 3. As respects Imports, in 1833, under slavery, it amounted to £2,205,523. In 1851, under Freedom, it amounted to £4,737,295. 4. Morals. From 1678 to 1832, no fewer than 28 insurrections took place, accompanied with fearful cruelties, involving both the loss of life and property; but since emancipation, no insurrection has taken place, and crime has gradually diminished. In 1851, in a district embracing a population of nearly half a million, nineteen twentieths being colored, there was not a single murder, and only 336 commitments for lesser crimes to the Penitentiary.

Before taking leave of our figures, we may remark that the character of the imports after emancipation indicate a great increase of prosperity, embracing as they do what may be termed, in reference to the population, luxuries; e. g., from 1835 to 1838, the last years of slavery, the number of yards of calicoes imported was 38,301,930. From 1839 to 1851, the first three years of freedom, the number was 110,018,528 yards.

What then is the voice of the figures to us? Is it not, "Your not to do right, and restore to those we have robbed their liberty?"

Yes, their language is, It is our interest to emancipate the slaves of both the rebel and loyal citizens, for it will not only crush rebellion, but increase our prosperity,—decrease crime in our midst, and prevent insurrections with their fearful horrors.

For ourselves, we care not for the language of figures. We know that the word of God declares, "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." We know that only to the nation that observes to do God's commandments, will he fulfil his promise: "The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thy hand, and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow." Nor is it a question with us, nor can we see how it can be one with any professor of Christianity, whether prosperity would follow the performance of a just act or not. Surely in this respect we should go as far as the old heathen and say, "Let justice be done if the heavens shall fall." We scorn the paltry selfish argument, even if it were true, "Our commerce would be injured, and our wealth decreased by emancipation." Is wealth of more value than liberty, and will its accumulation answer at the bar of God for neglect of duty?

May God give our rulers the patriotism and the courage, to adopt such measures as shall free us from the blighting curse of Slavery; and bring down upon us again the blessing of God and its consequent prosperity. A. R.

SPEAKING WELL OF OTHERS.

If the disposition to speak well of others were universally prevalent, the world would become a comparative paradise. The opposite disposition is the Pandora's box, which, when opened, fills every house and every neighborhood with pain and sorrow. How many enmities and heart-burnings flow from this source! How much happiness is interrupted and destroyed! Envy, jealousy, and the malignant spirit of evil, when they find vent by the lips, go forth on their mission like foul fiends, to blast the reputation and peace of others. Every one has his imperfections; and in the conduct of the best, there will be occasional faults that might seem to justify animadversion. It is a good rule, however, when there is occasion for fault-finding, to do it privately to the erring one. This may prove salutary. It is a proof of interest in the individual, which will generally be taken kindly, if the manner of doing it is not offensive. The common and unchristian rule, on the contrary, is to proclaim the failings of others to all but themselves. This is unchristian, and shows a despicable heart.

"The figures are taken from Martin's work on the British Colonies as quoted in the Free Press.

THE COSTS OF WAR.

Some one has said that "war is an expensive luxury." It is a luxury that a nation cannot afford to indulge in very often. A glance at the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury will show something of the cost of our present war. If the war should continue until July 1st, 1862, the national debt will be about $518,000,000. If continued until July 1st, 1863, the debt will be $900,000,000. Suppose it should terminate at the first named time, the debt will be a heavy one. It will require some time to liquidate it, and a considerable burden to support it. Seeing the figures in the report referred to above, we could not but think of the good that might have been done with this vast amount of means. Suppose the above amount, $518,000,000, were put at interest, at seven per cent. per annum, we could have an annual income of $36,260,000. If this amount were employed in establishing and sustaining the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, throughout our land, it would foot up about thus: It would employ sixty thousand four hundred and thirty-three missionaries at an average salary of $600. According to the late census, the number of inhabitants in the loyal States is near 22,000,000. This would give one minister, or missionary, to every 364 inhabitants in the loyal States. This would be a very nice little congregation.

Suppose the debt in the seceding States to be the one-half of what it is in the loyal States, (they have a population of about 9,000,000,) their debt, at seven per cent., would yield an income of $18,130,000. This would employ, at the above salary, 30,200 missionaries. Each missionary would have a congregation of 278 persons. Suppose, now, the government would undertake, not only to pay the interest on this debt, but to cancel the debt during the next fourteen years. This would enable it to employ twice as many missionaries. This would give to each minister, all over our land, North and South, a congregation of only 160 persons. Now, if each of these missionaries should be zealously engaged, during the fourteen years that would be necessary for paying off this debt, might we not reasonably expect that they would be able, with the blessing of God upon their labours, to evangelize every inhabitant of our land?

This done, and we, of this land, would enjoy something of a millennium. We would be in that state in which we would not need to learn war any more. We might beat our swords into ploughshares, and our spears into pruning hooks. Had we commenced this process fourteen years ago, we would, to-day, with God's blessing upon his Gospel, be enjoying peace

The Christian Recorder.

Philadelphia, January 4, 1862.

NOTICE.

Will those who owe for the Recorder, up to the 1st of January, 1862, and those who have been taking copies to sell, forward us the money by the return mail? You will oblige us very much indeed.

NOTICE.

All persons who do not pay their two dollars in advance, will pay, hereafter, five cents for the Recorder per copy. We are compelled to do this, because it does not pay at four cents per copy; for after the carrier gets his pay, there is not much left to pay expenses.

NOTICE.

Will those ministers who have been taking our paper for six months—a few owe us for a year—send us their subscription? If not complied with, we shall stop sending them our paper after this number.

NOTICE.

In our statement of terms, on the first page, the price of single copies should have been changed to five cents. Our note directing this change was overlooked by the printer.

NOTICE.

Mr. Editor:—Please notice that I will preach at Bristol on the 30th, and at Trenton on the 31st of December, and remain over the next Sabbath to the Quarterly Meeting; and, on the 8th, I shall preach at Pennington, N. J., and at Louisville.

W. Nazrey.

RIGHT AND WRONG.

Rev. W. R. Revels, who loves so much, only show your love by regarding the written law, and your love will continue. 1. Please read the 14th and 15th pages of the General Conference Minutes of 1800, on Canadian Affairs, on the 32d page, and see how much free will is to be exercised there. 2. Please correct your quotations; give the language of the General Conference, and my language in relation to the doings of the Indiana Conference, and leave the world to judge, as well as we. Yours for doing right at any expense.

W. Nazrey.

CARD.

Joshua Woodlin, pastor of the A. M. E. (Bethel) Church, Sixth Street, above Lombard, returns his heartfelt thanks to those sisters for their pleasant call on New Year's day, and their munificent present. Their written address, with twenty-six signatures, will be duly acknowledged by their brother and pastor.

A WORD TO THE SUBSCRIBERS.

Beloved Friends:—Allow us to say to you, as this is the new year, and those who have not paid their subscription, that it was due at our last week's issue. However, we will send you this number, and if you do not send us without delay, to continue the Recorder, we shall be obliged to stop it, though we shall be very sorry to lose you from our list, for we need your support to enable us to pay the debts, which must necessarily accrue. We do hope that nothing will prevent you from renewing your subscription. It is generally conceded, that the paper is well-arranged—that it is just the paper adapted to the wants of our people, and to Methodists generally, and ought to be in every Methodist family, and is worth more than it costs. Though we do not pretend to say that it pleases everybody, for that would be an impossibility, for men differ in taste and in ability.

Times are hard, but we hope this will not be any excuse for you.

In conclusion, we appeal to the Church and friends in every direction, to the preachers, local and itinerant, trustees, stewards, class-leaders, old men and young men, old ladies and young ladies, Superintendents, and teachers of Sabbath Schools, take hold and help us to keep this paper in the field another year. We remain yours, for the cause of the Church and humanity.

We refer our readers to the article written by our friend and brother, A. Field; and especially to the ministers of the A. M. E. Church, upon the Book Concern, and paper. It is an article well-timed, and ought to be read, and re-read by our brethren, and members of the Church.

SMALL POX.

This horrible disease is said to be raging in Pittsburgh, Pa.

JOHN S. ROCK.

A few weeks ago, we spoke of having paid the above named a visit. We now give the following particulars in regard to him.

The subject of this sketch is a colored man, whose name is a household word among the colored people of this country. He was born in Salem, N. J., in 1825. A short sketch of his life appeared in the New York Independent in 1856, an extract of which we copy. "John was a bright boy, but dull with his book. He was three quarters learning his alphabet. After he commenced to learn, his progress was rapid. His teachers all seemed to become interested in him, and he received considerable assistance from them in his private studies. During his youth, he seldom indulged in amusements of any kind—his time was almost entirely absorbed among his books. When thirteen years of age, he went to live with F. L. M'Culloch, Esq., then State Attorney. He remained with him two years. Mr. M'Culloch tells many anecdotes about him. He used to say, no matter what he sent John to do, he must always have a book to accompany him. He would do his work with his book open before him. He had often sent him to build the fire in his office, and in a couple of hours, he would find him still there, reading law, and often so deeply absorbed as not to recognise his presence. One day, Mr. M'C. went to his office a little earlier than usual—John heard some one enter, but did not raise his head—saying, "Take a seat, sir; Mr. M'C. will be in about nine o'clock." He was a great favorite with Mr. M'C and his wife, and they always extend to him a cordial welcome whenever he visits Salem.

For the next three years after leaving Mr. M'C. his time was divided between working on the farm, and going to school. In 1843, when 18 years of age, he was examined and approved as a teacher of public schools. He took charge of, and kept a school for colored youth, from 1844 to 1848. The teachers of the Academy in that town, after having paid several visits to Mr. Rock's school, published a card, in which they bear testimony to his superior skill in conducting his school, and, in imparting instruction. Mr. David Allen writes, "I believe Mr. R. thoroughly capable of teaching the higher branches of an English education. His was certainly the most orderly and the best conducted school I have ever witnessed, although myself a teacher for nearly twenty years." During the time Mr. R. was teaching school, Drs. Sharpe and Gibbon kindly opened their libraries to him, and he commenced the study of Physic—teaching in the public school six hours, studying eight, and giving private lessons two hours every day. Finding that his plan made it impossible for him to get into a Medical College, he abandoned his object of becoming a physician, and went with Dr. Herbert, and studied dentistry. He finished his studies in the summer of 1849, and devoted the balance of the year in canvassing the state, lecturing and using his influence to secure the Right of Suffrage for his race. In Jan. 1850, he went to Philadelphia to practice his profession of Dentistry. There there was not at that time a single anti-slavery man in that part of the state—yet Mr. Rock was liked and respected by all, and when he left that town, every physician, and every lawyer, and nearly every merchant signed a testimonial commending him. He soon made his mark in his profession. In 1851 he took a silver medal for artificial teeth; during the same year he took a silver medal for a prize essay on temperance. After the apprentices' High School had been established, and while it was still an evening school, Mr. R. had charge of it for several months, until it was merged into a day school, under the direction of Professor Reason. Mr. Rock being ambitious and desirous of excelling in every thing, soon found that in order to rank with the first of the Dental profession, he must be a medical man. He accordingly attended lectures in the American Medical College, (the only college in that city open to colored students) and graduated in the spring of 1852. After this he practised both of his professions. About this time he married Miss Catherine Bowers, an accomplished young lady of Philadelphia, and a member of one of the oldest and most respectable colored families of this country. In 1853, Dr. Rock sent a communication to the Philadelphia Dental News Letter, on the "Education of Dentists." The proprietors of that Journal, though friendly to him, thought it best not to publish it, as he was a colored man! A few months after, he sent it to the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, where it was published the week after it was received. The Baltimore Quarterly Journal of Dental Science copied it in their next issue (June 1854) as did also the Dental Register of the West, which is published by the Mississippi Valley Association of Dentist, who added to his title of M. D., that of D. D. S. (Doctor of Dental Surgery) In 1853, when Dr. Rock left Philadelphia and went to Boston, where he now resides, most of the professors of the Dental College gave him letters bearing testimony to his high professional skill, and high moral character and integrity. Professor Elisha Townsend, the first among the best dentists in the country, writes, "Dr. Rock is a graduate of a medical school in this city, and is favorably known and much respected by the profession. Having seen many of his operations, also his mechanical adaptations, it gives me great pleasure to bear testimony to his superior abilities." Prof. J. F. B. Flagg, writes, "I have witnessed his operations, and am much pleased with them. As a scientific man, I shall miss the intercourse I have so long enjoyed in his acquaintance." In 1855, Dr. R. delivered several lectures on various subjects in Boston, and vicinity, which were received with much favor. In 1856, he accepted an invitation to deliver a lecture before the Massachusetts Legislature, on the "Unity of the Races." The lecture was well attended, and won for him a place among literary and scientific men.

In 1857, he accepted the invitation, and delivered the oration on the occasion of the dedication of the new Masonic temple in 11th street, in Boston. This was considered his most brilliant effort. Before this, however, by his intense application and hard intellectual labour, he had undermined his health, so that in the summer of 1856, he was obliged to give up all business—he contented himself with delivering only an occasional Lyceum lecture. After several surgical operations here, and when nearly all hope of the restoration of his health was gone, he went to France, where he submitted to a very severe surgical operation, which was performed by Dr. Nelaton, the greatest of living surgeons, who took a deep interest in Dr. R. and attended him throughout his long sickness. Knowing that Professor Nelaton charged enormous prices for his services, Dr. R. asked early for his bill, when Dr. N. replied with much feeling, "I never take money from my professional brethren—never." The operation proved successful, and the Doctor returned home in 1859, with his health much improved. Dr. Nelaton advised him to give up Dentistry altogether, and as his shattered health forbade the exposure necessary for the practice of medicine, instead of becoming discouraged, he said, "I will now take hold of a profession that will allow me to take care of my health," and suiting the action to the word, he bent all his energies to the study of the law. In 1860, he was invited and accepted an invitation to deliver a lecture on Madame de Stael, before the Legislature of Mass., which he did with credit to himself and with satisfaction to the very large audience in attendance. This is said to be a literary production of no mean order. The Boston papers put him down among the first speakers in this country. On the 14th of September, 1861, on motion of Assistant District Attorney, Thornton K. Lothrop, Dr. Rock was examined before Judge Russel, and admitted to practice as an Attorney and Counsellor at Law in all the Courts of Massachusetts. Having heard of Mr. Rock's admission to the Bar, we called upon him when in that city, and got a copy of his diploma. Here it is.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Suffolk s. s [seal.]

Be it remembered, that at the Superior Court for the transaction of criminal business, begun and holden at Boston, within and for the said County of Suffolk, on the first Monday of September, A. D. 1861,—

Said Court being a court of Record, John S. Rock, being found duly qualified in that behalf, and having taken and subscribed the oaths required by law, was admitted to practise as an Attorney, and by virtue thereof, as a Counsellor at Law, in any of the Courts of the said Commonwealth.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the Court, this fourteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord, eighteen hundred and sixty one.

P. H. Underwood, Clerk.

On the 21st of September, 1861, Mr. Rock received a commission from the Governor and Council as a Justice of the Peace for the city of Boston and the County of Suffolk.

In the history of this young man, there is much to encourage all of us. With obstacles all the way along, and thorns at every step, as every colored man must know, and with pecuniary misfortunes and loss of health, in spite of all, he, like a cork in the water, refuses to stay down, but takes his place beside others more favored; and it is well known to-day, that he is a man possessed of a most through education, refined feelings and manners, and possesses quite the accomplishments of speaking, in addition to his own language, the Spanish, German, and French languages. Young men of all races may learn in the history of this young man, to appreciate what energy, perseverance, and courage may do. We omitted to say he is a Christian man, striving to walk in the narrow path.

TO THE MEMORY OF THE REV. WALTER PROCTOR.

BY REV. JOSHUA WOODLIN.

On Monday, the 16th ult., the last tribute of respect was paid to the corporeal remains of this venerable servant of God. Many of the ministers of the Philadelphia District, itinerant and local, not less than forty in number, with some from the Baltimore District, formed in procession at Bethel Church, Sixth St., and proceeded to the residence of the deceased, accompanied by a noble band of sisters, known as the Daughters of Conference of Bethel Church. With the members and connexions of the bereaved family they soon returned, a selected portion of the ministry bearing the remains of their departed friend. The Bishop, Rev. Willis Nazrey, Rev J. M. Brown, A. W. Wayman, and W. H. Waters were in procession. The corners of every street by which they passed were thronged with crowds of spectators, colored and white, to witness the passing, solemn, and impressive scene.

On arriving at Bethel Church, after the ministers and relatives of the departed were regularly seated, the vast expanse of that spacious building was soon filled; hundreds could not be admitted for want of room, and officers closed the gates to prevent further passage.

Divine service was opened by the Rev. W. D. W. Schureman, who read the 15th chapter of the 1st Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians.

The Rev. Stephen Smith announced the hymn commencing, viz.:

"Rejoice for a brother deceased,
Our loss is his infinite gain," and after singing, he humbly and fervently addressed the throne of grace. After which the pastor, Rev. Joshua Woodlin, addressed the audience, viz.:

"Christian friends and brethren, we are here assembled to pay the last sad office of duty and respect to the memory of a great and good man, who has fallen in Israel. Our father is dead! Nay, not dead, but sleepeth! The Rev. Walter Proctor has fallen asleep in the arms of Jesus.

"According to the best accounts I have received of his history, he was born Dec. 20th, 1790, in the state of Maryland, near Port Tobacco. He came to Philadelphia to live in 1814, and in the same year embraced religion. On July 14th, 1818, he joined Bethel Church under the administration of the Rev. Richard Allen, who was made Bishop of said church. He married in the same year, Oct. 31st. He was present in the convention of 1816. Soon after embracing religion he engaged in the ministry; with verbal license he was two years an exhorter. He was then given written license as a local preacher. And after two years he was ordained a deacon. Such was the religious deportment and conduct of this servant of God, as induced his superiors in office to elevate him to these various stages in the ministry without any regular examination in regard to his gifts, graces, or usefulness. His example was a satisfactory recommendation, and he continued to be a zealous and faithful minister of the gospel. Doubtless he has performed more baptisms, marriages, and burials for the dead, than any minister now living in the A. M. E. connexion.

"On the first Sabbath in the present month, during the administration of the Lord's Supper, I missed that venerable servant of God. After the sacrament, Brother Josiah Eddy and myself visited his residence, and found him ill. But he inquired of us, 'What kind of a time had you this morning?' I told him very good. Said he, 'I felt it, I was praying for it.'

"We again visited him on Friday, the 6th inst., and found that he was fast failing. After some inquiry, he said to us that his business was all right, except a few temporal matters, for which all necessary provisions would be made. 'But my internal part, my soul,' said he 'is all right; and had I the voice of thunder, I would tell it to the world.'"

On Saturday morning, the 7th, he called his family together, all being present except his son John and daughter Barret. And after singing the following hymn,

"Lord, in the morning thou shalt hear
My voice ascending high," &c., he said to his wife, "Mary, pray for us," which she did. After singing another hymn, which was,

"Father, I stretch my hands to thee,
No other help I know," &c., he himself earnestly prayed for each of the family. Commencing on behalf of his eldest son, John, he said, "Lord, I do not see him, but thou seest him. He is out of the ark of safety. Oh, put it into his heart to be good, and see after his mother. Take care of my daughter Elizabeth, and may she also help to take care of her mother." And after praying for each of the family as he saw was needful for them, he addressed his wife in the following manner:—"Mary, my dear wife, you have been a great help to me in the gospel. I have been forty-six years in building this bridge; now it is safe, and you have been my spiritual helper. I have had no education, but I have done as the Lord told me. My work is done," &c.

On Monday he had become so feeble that he could not speak aloud, but he whispered to his adopted daughter, saying, "It will soon be over."

On Tuesday morning, December 10th, he departed this life. During his expiring moments, his wife, with a firm faith in God, and with an humble submission to his divine will, prayed him to still Jordan while her husband crossed over. And without the least struggle observed, he passed out of time into eternity.

"Though Father Proctor," said the pastor, "is dead, he speaks to this audience to-day, in the silent remembrance of departed worth. His example, wise counsels, and good advices have this day had their bearing upon our feelings. I fancy that the echo of his voice is sounding in our ears, and that his spirit is hovering over us, saying, in gentle whispers, 'You have fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity and patience.' May we, like this great and good man, so live that our last end may be like his." So concluded the pastor's remarks.

After the choir sang, the Rev. A. W. Wayman arose, and asked the following momentous question, "Is it true, a great man has fallen in Israel?" The speaker answered the question by showing that, in the person of Walter Proctor, a great man lived, and in his death a great man has fallen.

After which, the pastor announced that the funeral sermon of Rev. Walter Proctor would be delivered at a future period, in Bethel Church, Philadelphia, by Revs. James P. Campbell and James Frisby; in Baltimore, by Rev. J. M. Brown; and in Washington, by Rev. A. W. Wayman. After dismission, the remains of the deceased were conveyed to the Lebanon Cemetery, and interred.

"His long aching head is at rest;
Its thinking and aching are o'er;
His quiet, immovable breast,
Is heav'd by affliction no more."

THE A. M. E. CHURCH BOOK CONCERN.

Mr. Editor:—The publication department of the Church, the most useful, and, perhaps, the most reliable for the diffusion of knowledge, is of all departments the most neglected. True, there are a few among the ministry and laity who speak and write, so far as their means of communication will admit, for the general good; but the Church generally is silent Both in word and in deed, and the true source of information to ourselves and to the world around us, is almost entirely cut off—the book store. Retailing useful books and stationery in the midst of a large community, is a source of local good with which it would not be wise to dispense. It is slowly and silently, by the force of influence, educating the community that there is an African Methodist Episcopal Church—which, by the way, is not so extensively known as some would seem to think, and especially where this information is the most needed. This truth is demonstrated wherever the paper finds its way; it is hailed with the exclamation, that we never heard before of such a Church! The store is a source of convenience as well as of usefulness, and is a standing evidence that the colored people are doing something for the diffusion of knowledge, and the advancement of morality and religion. The paper is a silent, but most efficient missionary, operating in an enlarged field of usefulness—carrying forward all the information the store gives socially, and the increased knowledge of the extent of the organization and its influences. Such means of communication ought not to be dispensed with, or suffered to fall into disuse for the want of united support—and especially when it is shown that such unity will keep them in opposition. The paper goes where the colored preacher or teacher is seldom, if ever, heard of, much less, suffered to speak, and seems to obtrusively answer every word spoken for or against the colored man. The writer has personal knowledge of the paper having found way into the parlour, among a large circle of ladies and gentlemen, and become the subject of conversation and commendation. I know also of one circumstance where a lady affirmed to a company of friends she liked to read that paper (the Christian Recorder) better than any religious paper she had seen.

We have the means of giving the paper an extensive circulation, and being the means of doing much good. A large number of our subscribers live at service, and the paper ioveriably falls into the hands of, and is read by members of the family. Thus the Recorder is introduced—and there are instances where it is weekly asked for and read; thus the subscriber is unconsciously a missionary of good, bearing the tidings into every family, all which the colored people are doing for their own regeneration. The paper is silently doing the work of enlightening the community, and of drawing attention to the A. M. E. Church and its usefulness. I know of instances where families not only inquire for the paper, but urge a renewal of the subscription, and pay for the subscriber. How many similar cases there may be, I know not; but the position gained in the respect of the community, ought to be maintained. Can the Church afford to throw away these most efficient means of information? I think not. When its ministry clamor about the promotion and extension of the gospel, and neglect these most important means, then the question may be reasonably discussed, as to whether it would be more economical to keep our churches open or close them.

As to the ability of the Church to keep these means of information in successful operation, no one ought to doubt. If we are to credit the returns of membership made to the several Annual Conferences, it is shown that we have a membership of over forty thousand. Out of that number we ought to have at least twenty thousand who could afford to subscribe and pay for a weekly paper; but I am sure that less than ten thousand will insure the successful publication of the paper, and give a profit for other purposes. It has already been published one year, with less than one thousand subscribers; and I question whether it has sunk the Book Concern three hundred dollars. If not, it shows how little effort it takes to keep alive the vital principles of progress. I question, though, whether the counting of dollars and cents is to be considered with the amount of good done in the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom.

I am not aware how the subscription list of the Recorder compares in other locations, but in this city those that do not belong to our Church are in the majority. Whose fault is that? The Church, independent of subscriptions, could give annually to the Book Concern a very handsome amount for publication purposes, without making any special effort. By the published Minutes of the several Annual Conferences, the following items are obtained:—

APPOINTMENTS.

Philadelphia,	19
Baltimore,	23
New York,	17
New England,	8
Ohio,	24
Indiana,	22
Missouri,	7
	120

Leaving out the California Conference work entirely.

Now could not each of these appointments give an annual collection to the Book Concern of ten dollars? If so, independent of everything else, we have a revenue from that source of twelve hundred dollars ($1200.00) per annum. Taking this, in connexion with the other fact, that the paper is published one year, with a sinking of less than three hundred dollars, and a subscription list of less than one thousand, and that we have the insured publication of a weekly paper, with evidences of doing more good than all the sermons delivered in all the appointments together in the same length of time; and to those who will count dollars instead of good, a surplus of at least six hundred dollars per annum. Can any Christian man hesitate to be instrumental in bringing about such a result, and, as I think, so easily reached? I think not. Any appointment that cannot give ten dollars per annum to the general Church to promote the cause of Christianity, ought not to be encumbered with the support of a preacher; and any preacher that will not direct his Church beyond its own immediate limits, ought not to be encumbered with an appointment—for he genders a selfish Christianity, and defeats the mission of the gospel. Let the bishops resolve that this department of the Church shall receive attention from the preachers, and we shall soon have a creditable book department. Set apart days in each appointment when discourses shall be delivered and collections taken in aid of the Concern. A preacher would hardly disobey the mandate of a bishop, if he would disregard the request of a Book Steward.

CHURCH SLEEPING.

Mr. Editor:—I think one of the most disgusting, unchristian, and sinful practices in which many of our church members indulge, is that ugly habit of sleeping in church. It is disgusting in the eyes of our sober-minded and intelligent people, whether religious, or non-religious. It is unchristian, because a person who thus indulges in God's sacred house, bears no mark of a Christian, or even a church member, but is the appearance of a night marauder, or an intoxicationist, more than anything else.

It is sinful, because it is treating God's holy temple with contempt, not only so, but it is disrespectful to his precious truths, his minister, and all the means of grace. It is also setting a sinful precedent before an irreligious multitude, for if the wicked world can keep all their church hours away, how many converts would be made by the preached gospel? It further contradicts our profession, for we profess to love God supremely to every other thing, and when we have to sleep away God's holy message, which we claim to esteem most of all others, it is a demonstrable proof that we are not interested in that which we so loudly proclaim. An old proverb, which is philosophically true, says, Actions speak louder than words.

But some people will not only try to justify themselves in this most hateful habit, but will become quite incensed, if told about sleeping in church. I recollect of once reproving a brother relative to this pernicious habit; he challenged me for a fight in the church, he was so exasperated. But I concluded words were as good a missile as I cared for, (as the fisticuff business did not pay very well,) so for a while we shot at each other by the word of mouth, and I flattered myself as being the victor, as he did not sleep next Sabbath.

Again, I recollect of reproving a certain sister some time since about the same thing. And she had the most reasonable, as well as the most justifiable excuse I have yet heard:

She remarked, that when she was a sinner, she had a great fear of hell, and the dread of dying and going to that place very frequently drove sleep from her eyes, so much so that she had spent many sleepless nights in thought over that subject. But, after being thoroughly wrought upon by the word of God, and sin-convicted to the heart, she seldom knew what it was to sleep at all. But, bless God, since she had been born again, the fear of hell was gone, and she had peace with Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, with angels, and all mankind. Therefore, the Bible says, "He giveth his beloved sleep," and she felt to be one of God's beloved, and to this end, sleep was sweet to her. And she intended to sleep, till she slept herself over Jordan. Glory and honor to God's name, that she could sleep.

Now, just such ingenious winding out of a thing as this constitutes the justification of a great many who sleep in church. They will present you a kind of pseudonymous logic, and twirl around it some little risible joke, and away go all its grave and fearful results.

Like the man whom Dr. Pearce, of Georgia, asked why he always slept when he was preaching; he said, "Ah, Dr., whenever I hear you announce your text, I am satisfied; I know you know what to do with it, Doctor; you don't need my assistance at all, so I take a nap."

Great excuse for laziness, indeed; like a great many persons who sleep all day on Sunday, because it is rest-day, which is a wicked habit. No, sir; the secret of church sleeping is founded upon a worthless, careless, indifferent, and uninterested disposition.

RELIGIOUS UNION.

This is the title of an article which appeared in the 42d number of the Christian Recorder, with the signature of Rev. Singleton T. Jones. In relation to that article, we remark first, that it has not been lost sight of; and there are two reasons why we have not said something about it before now.

1. We have been so much engaged, in a pecuniary interest for the welfare of this paper and Book Concern, that we did not find time to think of much else.

The 2d reason is, that we were waiting to hear some of the older brethren speak out, for we hold that there is no impropriety in discussing a matter of so much magnitude as these precious words, viz., Religious Union. Now, the writer, in his article, refers to us, as we preached the first discourse on the day in which he refers to, in Bethel Church, in obedience to the national proclamation issued by the President. He says, that "presuming from our discourses on the same day, that we were fully committed to the Union policy." We would just say, that according to our understanding of the word union, we could not be of any other opinion; for, if religion mean anything, it means love, and where there is love there must be union.

In relation to what the writer says in his article, that there should be but the one colored Methodist Church, we most heartily and sincerely endorse his views, that there ought not now, nor ever ought to have been, but the one colored Methodist Church in this country. I suppose that we would be safe in saying, that we speak the sentiments of our church, or at least the most of them; for we believe that there is no Methodist, or rather true Methodist, but what is in favor of a Religious [illegible]. Now, we propose to ask a few questions [illegible] answered by some one or more.

1. What is the cause of our not being a great and glorious body now?

If that query is answered, the second question is, What is the most healthy and effective means to be raised to remove the cause? The means being solved, the third is, Who will set about the work to remove that cause? and in the event the cause shall be removed, the fourth question is, When, where, and how shall we meet to amalgamate?

We hope that our brethren will speak out freely and frankly upon this subject, and let us know the drift of the minds of the church, and her ministry. Therefore, as Rev. Dr. Jones has led the way for some thinking and discussing to be done, and we have asked some several questions to be answered by or from either side of the house, we will, therefore, wait for further information.

LETTER FROM BALTIMORE.

The old year is about to take leave of us all forever, and make her annual report to eternity.

The past year has been one of many strange incidents, yet amidst them all, our churches in the Baltimore Conference have enjoyed a great peace and prosperity.

Our people are looking forward to New Year's eve with delight, anticipating a pleasant time in taking leave of the old year, and welcoming in the new.

Yesterday, (Sunday,) was a day of some interest to the members and friends of Bethel Church, in this city, as the pastor and trustees were making extra efforts to raise the amount of fifteen hundred dollars, which is the last note due on the church for the recent repairs.

The morning was pleasant; the congregation assembled in high spirits to do what they could to comply with the requirement of the trustees, at 11 o'clock. Rev. R. S. Vinton preached an able sermon, which was very cordially received. It was then announced that the Rev. J. G. Baughan, of Philadelphia, would preach at 3 o'clock. Accordingly at the appointed hour, a large congregation assembled. The Rev. old gentleman appear with the impress of age upon his cheeks, and a head silvered over with the frost of eighty-six winters. And, although the buoyancy of his youth is gone, he gave out the hymn in a clear voice, and prayed with great zeal. He had been requested by some of the friends of his youth, to preach from one of his old texts, Joshua i. 11.—"Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals, for within three days, ye shall pass this Jordan."

After an elaborate introduction, he showed, that in three days (if prepared,) the congregation would be able to go over Jordan; first day, youth, second day, middle age, and third day, old age. In one of these three days, they would have to cross over Jordan.

After the close of the sermon, Brother Frisby Richfield, the Superintendent of the Sabbath School, presented the sum of fifty-four dollars to the Church, as the gift of the Sabbath School managers. Mr. B. Murphey, the leader of the choir, presented ten dollars and sixteen cents, a donation from the choir.

Rev. Mr. Rowe, of the Ohio Conference, preached at night an able sermon, the collection was continued, and the result was that it amounted to three hundred and two dollars, and twelve cents.

The congregation and trustees went home believing that they will be able to meet their responsibility, on the 5th day of January, 1862.

WHAT THEN!

If the British demands of our Government are unmistakably just, there is but one sentiment among thoughtful men: we should yield to them cheerfully. The honor of a nation never requires that she should do wrong, or defend wrong-doing.

If the demands of England are, in whole or in part, such that doubts of their justice may be felt, what then? We reply: By all means, situated as we now are, give England, and, in so doing, give ourselves the benefit of those doubts.

If the demands of England are clearly unjust, what then? We reply: Accede to any demands, not inconsistent with integrity and honor, which we are satisfied she can make good by force. In other words, yield before war what we are satisfied we would be forced to yield after war.

If the assassin presents the alternative, "Your money or your life," we give him the money, knowing that the other side of the alternative really is, "Your money and your life." It involves no loss of honor to yield to force, unless the thing we do is immoral. We may give our money to save our life, though we may not deny our God, or wrong our fellow man to save it.

Good generalship in national policy, like good generalship in the field, requires sometimes the postponement of a battle; and it is better to retreat to escape a defeat, than to retreat because we have sustained one. Our united country, with a just cause, could defy a world in arms. Our loyal States, if their hearts were undepressed, and their arms free from the necessity of warding off the murderous blow aimed by insane parricides, could meet England and vanquish her. But this is the hour of her strength and of our weakness. "This [illegible]

THE LOGIC OF [illegible]

It is said everywhere, with a perfect [illegible] shows that it is thought to settle the qu[illegible] that the right of search which led to the c[illegible] of the rebel ambassadors, is one which Great [illegible] tain has contended for and practised in in many cases. Undoubtedly it is. It is admitted in the English papers, and has been demonstrated very much at large in our own. But there is a vital question here which has been singularly overlooked by the able writers and speakers who have taken up this topic, not only here, but in England, and that is, by what principles is the conduct of nations to each other to be tested, and how is the spirit in which they act to be construed when they are put upon their trial in any case? [illegible] should say, indubitably by the principles of the nation which ACTS in the case. The spirit and [illegible] of what we do as a nation is to be judged by the principles we avow. If we say there is no right of search, then when we do search we [illegible] that we say we have no right to do, in other words, we do wrong; and in dragging out an English vessel, to do what we say neither we nor others have a right to do, and what we have not done to others nor allowed them to do to us, we seem to [illegible] out for a course of special offensiveness the greatest maritime power on earth. The case against us on the abstract question of the right of search is stronger than it was against England in our last war with her, for she did on a claim of right what she was willing to allow, and what we had practised indiscriminately against all; while we, against what we have maintained, practised and fought for as right, have practised what we will not allow, and that with a discrimination against England.

Nor is it logical to say, England claims the right of search, and therefore, we (who deny that we have the right to search her vessels. That means that we have the right to search her vessels, but she has no right to search ours. We are going to have two principles, one for England and one for ourselves. Now common sense, without puzzling itself with any logic in the matter, sees that if we have the right to search her vessels, then a fortiori, she has the right to search ours; but we deny the latter, how then can we maintain it? Common sense will insist that what we do, defines our principles more clearly than what we say. We hardly mean to stultify ourselves by saying: We may search her vessels because she claims the right of search, but she may not search ours, for we deny the right.

Hence, it follows, that England is not so illogical and inconsistent as some imagine in objecting to our course. For her theory of the right of search involves of necessity that it shall be reciprocal. She asks it, and she grants it; but, in the nature of the case, she can only grant it to those who grant it to her. England does not claim, as some of our logicians seem to argue, the right of being searched, nor does she claim a right of search for us. She simply claims the right for herself, and lets other nations determine their own claim. No nation claims directly rights for other nations. She may, incidentally, by logical sequence, concede them to others; but that is their concern. We cannot draw England's inference, therefore, without accepting her premises, nor avail ourselves of them against her, while we declare she has no right to use them for her own welfare. We cannot insist on our right of search without granting hers, and till we actually grant it to her we cannot logically claim it for ourselves.

Our nation must have one principle, and carry it through. When England and we have a conflicting principle, we must carry through our own, not hers, whether it makes for or against us in the particular case. We have carried our own through when it made for us, we must carry it through just as faithfully when it makes against us. It is better to give up Mason and Slidell than to give up principle. To claim the right to seize them, on the purely abstract idea of the right of search, is to abandon our avowed principle, with the interpretation which our policy of the entire past has given it; and is, in the future, to encounter a precedent which we may be very desirous to set aside. We can maintain no right to search the ships of Great Britain without admitting the general right of search, and her particular right to search ours; or if, denying or refusing the right, we may still exercise it, much more may England, who admits and grants it, exercise it upon us. If we stand to the legality of the seizure, we meet a dilemma move whither we may.

It is said, however, we are in a state of war, and are forced to this course. But that very question within the greater question, has already been settled by the policy of our country. That was exactly the condition of England when we went to war with her in large part upon this question. She was struggling for her existence, and, apart from that struggle, never would have accepted a war with this country on the question. She acted not on the abstract principle, but on a practical application of it, which she thought essential to her being. We fought with her against the principle of the right of search, denying alike her right to search our ships, and our right to search hers. Surely, after engaging in one war with England against the principle, we are not going to engage in another for it; and this is not putting the case strongly enough: it would be a war for our right to search others, while we may not be searched. So much for this question, as it involves the abstract principle of the right of search.

Other principles are involved. We are laughing at England, because she seems to say, that part of the offence is, that we did not go to greater extremities, did not, on our allegation, that the vessel contained what is contraband of war, take her, and her passengers, and crew to a port where legal process could have been instituted to test the matter. We affect to think that her cry is:

"My wound is great because it is so small;"

and we might think it a happy stroke to rejoin:

"Then 'twould be greater were it none at all."

But the reply may be made that England might justly prefer that very great inconvenience and distress should be experienced by individuals in this case, to the establishment of a practice, or of a precedent in itself wrong and mischievous. It would be a great personal relief just to take the money from a thief, and let him and the witnesses in the case have no further trouble; nevertheless, the law considers such a course criminal. It is the compounding of felony, and would work great mischief in the end. England's logic is not so bad as her spirit; that is detestable. She will urge her claim, not because it is logical, but because she thinks she is strong enough to enforce it. Nevertheless,

"Logic is logic. That's what I say."

SPECIAL NOTICES.

Discontinuances.—Papers are forwarded at the option of the publishers until an explicit order is received for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, according to law. Such order should be given by letter, not by returning a paper. Notice given to an agent is not sufficient.

Change of Address.—Subscribers wishing the address of the paper changed, will please state where they remove FROM as well as TO.

Remittances may be sent by mail at the risk of the publishers, and receipts will be returned in the next issue of the paper.

Post Office Address.—It is useless for subscribers to write on business, unless they give the name of their Post Office and State.

The Trent Affair Settled.—Mason and Slidell to be given up.—Mr. Seward's letter to Lord Lyons closes thus:

If I decide this case in favor of my own Government, I must disavow its most cherished principles, and reverse and forever abandon its essential policy. The country cannot afford the sacrifice. If I maintain those principles, and adhere to that policy, I must surrender the case itself. It will be seen, therefore, that this Government could not deny the justice of the claim presented to us in this respect upon its merits. We are asked to do for the British nation just what we have always insisted all nations ought to do to us.

The claim of the British Government is not made in a discourteous manner. This Government, since its first organization, has never used more guarded language in a similar case.

In coming to my conclusion, I have not forgotten that if the safety of this Union required the detention of the captured persons, it would be the right and duty of this Government to detain them. But the effectual check and waning proportions of the existing insurrection, as well as the comparative unimportance of the captured persons themselves, when dispassionately weighed, happily forbid me from resorting to that defence.

Nor am I unaware that American citizens are not in any case to be unnecessarily surrendered for any purpose into the keeping of a foreign State. Only the captured persons, however, or others who are interested in them, could justly raise a question on that ground.

Nor have I been tempted at all by suggestions that cases might be found in history where Great Britain refused to yield to other nations, and even to ourselves, claims like that which is now before us. Those cases occurred when Great Britain, as well as the United States, was the home of generations which, with all their peculiar interests and passions, have passed away.

She could in no other way so effectually disavow any such injury as we think she does now, by assuming as her own the ground upon which we then stood. It would tell little for our own claims to the character of a just and magnanimous people, if we should so far consent to be guided by the law of retaliation as to lift up buried injuries from their graves, to oppose against what national consistency and the national conscience compel us to regard as a claim intrinsically right.

Putting behind me all suggestions of this kind, I prefer to express my satisfaction that by the adjustment of the present case upon principles confessedly American, and yet, as I trust, mutually satisfactory to both of the nations concerned, a question is finally and rightly settled between them, which, heretofore exhausting not only all forms of peaceful discussion, but also the arbitrament of war itself, for more than half a century alienated the two countries from each other, and perplexed with fears and apprehensions all other nations.

The four persons in question are now held in military custody at Fort Warren in the State of Massachusetts. They will be cheerfully liberated. Your Lordship will please indicate a time and place for receiving them.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer to your Lordship a renewed assurance of my very high consideration. WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Lord Lyons to Mr. Seward.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 27, 1861.

The Hon. Wm. H. Seward, &c., &c.—

SIR—I have this morning received the note which you did me the honor to address to me yesterday in answer to Earl Russell's despatches of the 30th of November last relative to the removal of Mr. Mason, Mr. Slidell, Mr. McFarland and Mr. Eustis from the British mail packet Trent. I will, without any loss of time, forward to her Majesty's government a copy of the important communication which you have made to me.

I will also, without delay, do myself the honor to confer with you personally on the arrangements to be made for delivering the four gentlemen to me, in order that they may be again placed under the protection of the British flag.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

LYONS.

Popular Opinion on the Surrender of Mason and Slidell.—Washington, Dec. 28.—The settlement of the Trent affair affords much gratification among all conservatives. Prominent Union-loving men, whatever may have been their previous opinions on the subject, regard the adjustment as removing a serious impediment in the prosecution of hostilities against the insurgents, and as depriving the enemy of the strength which they would have derived from a war between the United States and Great Britain, and possibly with France. There is a generally expressed acquiescence in the course of the Government, while the despatches of Secretary Seward are viewed in the light of the highest statesmanlike ability.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 29, 1861.—The surrender of Mason and Slidell is generally approved of by the Unionists in this city; but the Secessionists are woefully disappointed, as it completely annihilates their most cherished hopes of a war with England.

NEW YORK, Dec. 29th.—The surrender of Slidell and Mason to the British Government has been the theme of every tongue, since the correspondence on the subject was made public yesterday. The popular feeling is one of deep regret that a necessity should exist for giving these rebel "contrabands" up, but that the necessity being recognised, Mr. Seward has performed a very disagreeable duty with as much grace as the nature of the case would permit. On all hands, the disposition is to let the subject drop as speedily as possible; only treasuring it up in remembrance, for use some day when John Bull has another rebellion in India, or Ireland, or Canada, or Australia.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—The public have received the announcement of the surrender of Mason and Slidell to the British Government very philosophically, having generally anticipated such a finale. Of Philadelphia the same may be said.

Effects on Money, Stocks, and Markets.—Philadelphia.—Saturday, December 28th.—The Stock market has been active and buoyant to-day under the very gratifying intelligence that the publication of the correspondence between Secretary Seward and Lord Lyons warranted the conclusion that we had escaped the danger of a collision with England on the Trent affair; and the tone of feeling excited late in the day, upon reading the despatches themselves, gives rise to the belief that the upward movement now inaugurated will be continued with increased force by outside orders. The dignified and able manner in which Secretary Seward presents the points of the case in controversy, and maintains the hereditary policy and honor of the nation, while he at the same time satisfies the demands of England, will meet the approval of every unbiassed mind, and will be especially gratifying to the business community, which has manifested every anxiety to avoid a war. It will also be a subject of general congratulation, and of no little weight in restoring confidence, to find that the tone of the despatch of the English Government was marked with a scrupulous regard to the temper of our people, and an earnest desire to avoid hostilities, if it could be done in any way consistent with the honor and rights of England. The effects of to-day's news, therefore, no matter in which way regarded by politicians, cannot fail to be of the greatest importance, and produce the most decided effect upon business interests generally. No greater calamity could be forced upon us at the present time, than a war with England. This we have feared, and now it passes away. A sensitiveness, at times excusable, but not advantageous in enabling us to form right opinions, has led us to regard England's position as a neutral with envy and distrust, and, overlooking the difficulties which it forces upon her, to construe her every act into a covert design to draw us into a war. The tone of Lord Russell's despatch will go far to modify this impression, and public confidence will be in a corresponding measure restored. The fear of foreign complications has caused a rise in exchange, shipments of gold, a nervousness about the banks, an advance in the rates of interest, a timidity among capitalists, and a decline in Government loans, from all of which a re-action must take place, as the cause has been removed, and as they were all unjustified by the condition of our trade and finances. A country importing little or nothing, and exporting upwards of $4,000,000 per week, in which the great business demand for money has almost ceased, whose specie has increased upwards of $80,000,000 in the last twelve months, and whose banks hold nearly double as much of gold as they did a year ago, has nothing to fear commercially except in so far as great political events shall counteract the legitimate effects of its favorable financial position; and as the public have learned to measure the effect of the rebellion already, the taking away of the fear of a war with England, must be productive of general confidence and buoyancy. We are now free to discuss the plan of raising funds to overthrow the rebellion, and as no one doubts that the wealth of the country is equal to this emergency, with an increase of difficulties, it will only be a question as to how that wealth is to be made available for the Government use.

The news, although only vaguely reported until late in the day, has already had the effect of increasing the transactions in stocks to a much larger amount than for some time past.

New York.—Saturday, Dec. 28—P. M.—Without marked activity, the Stock Market, to-day, was firm at the opening, under favorable rumors from Washington. The advance was quite general throughout the list, ranging from ½ to 1½ per cent. The advance was not resisted with any vigor by the bears, who have in some cases changed their tactics, and taken a long line. Toward the close of the session, it was understood that the release of Mason and Slidell had been ordered, and the market closed very strong. After the Board, prices showed a still further improvement, when the despatches from Washington announced officially that the complication with England had been amicably settled, and that Messrs. Mason and Slidell had been given up to Lord Lyons. At the second Board there was a very active market, and prices were established at a still further important advance. There was but little disposition shown to put out sellers' options, and the shorts were free buyers. The action of the Administration in regard to the rebel Ambassadors was received with almost universal approval, and the howls of rage anticipated by the Confederate journals in case of such an event were not heard.

The leading Papers on the release of Mason and Slidell.

THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER:

Mr. Seward's renewed assurances of very high consideration for Lord Lyons, and the honor of the latter in subscribing himself the most obedient, humble servant of Mr. Seward, have closed for the present, with a flourish of formal courtesy, the diplomatic discussion of the Trent affair. Whatever views may be entertained by individuals, or by classes of politicians, upon the law of the case or the policy of our action, certain we are that everybody must experience a direct sense of relief, and this sense of relief may lead the way to a feeling of active acquiescence. War at any time, to a community whose renown arises from a successful cultivation of the arts of peace, is, in its immediate effects, a wholesale disaster; and while we would shrink from nothing which honor or duty called upon us to endure, we cannot but feel gratified at the conclusion that neither one of those considerations imperatively calls upon us now to bear a double burden of such calamity. The painful suspense and feverish anxiety of the public mind, the perturbation of opinion, and the fluctuation of finance occasioned by the pendency of the question, and the secrecy of its management, have for the present an end, and for the time being we are glad to adjourn our speculations about hostile combinations, foreign interventions, and, mayhap, a general world-war. The rising vision of "fierce hosting" suddenly dissolves into thin air, and we once more breathe freely.

England selects the period of our supposed extremity as that of her actual opportunity. Her entire course, instead of being marked by nobleness and magnanimity, is one of treachery and cowardice, and the blow with which she would thus strike an adversary under such circumstances, is, even in the slang of bullies, a foul one. Not long since the heir to her throne passed in an ovation through the country, and the present sad bereavement of her Queen is even now calling forth in our midst expressions of sincere and respectful sympathy. Unfortunately, such sentiments have met with a sudden rebuff, and we should not be surprised if there sinks down deeply into the American heart a desperate grudge, a cherished animosity, a lurking revenge, lying latent until it, in turn, may select an opportune day of retribution. We feel that the future may disclose that her triumph of to-day has been dearly bought, and that her statesmen have sacrificed, to the impulses of the moment, the far-reaching interests of years to come. By committing the blunder of accompanying a diplomatic note by an obtrusive display of warlike preparations, it has been sought to give to the offering of our reason the false color of a concession, extorted by our fear, which, besides gaining no practical result beyond what would have been secured by a courteous and considerate manner, has, at the same time, laid up in the memory of the country a store of bitter recollections, to haunt and stimulate the popular mind as the keen reminiscence of an unavenged indignity.

We nevertheless find in the settlement of the difficulty matter for public congratulation. The friends of peace and progress in England could not suppress apprehensions that we were incapable of dealing dispassionately with the case, and the organs of Government and of the aristocracy were loud in proclaiming that reason and reflection would be powerless before the influence of the mob, and that amid a wild and turbulent Democracy, all regard to British rights and British honor would be clamorously overborne. But how different the result! Reason has been appealed to, and reason has promptly responded. Our sense of justice has been invoked, and it has quickly justified the appeal. We, ourselves, have sat upon our own case, and with judicial rigor of reasoning, and judicial freedom from bias, have decided against ourselves. No nation has, within the present century, yielded such a thorough, calm, noble, and frank tribute to the great principles of international amity.

THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS:

The tone of the English journals received by the mails of the American indicates that, while a war, for which gigantic preparations were being made, would inevitably have ensued if Mason and Slidell had not been promptly surrendered, the course adopted by the Administration will be entirely satisfactory, and will be hailed with delight by all the friends of our country in the old world. There are some important interests in England which anxiously desire the commencement of hostilities, because they imagine that they would result in the total downfall of republican institutions, and that by opening the Southern ports British manufactures would secure an abundant supply of cotton. But, on the other hand, the British capitalists who have immense investments in American securities, and a very large portion of the English people who either sympathize with the national cause in this country, or keenly realize the horrors of a protracted contest with America, will now, since what they deem the national honor of their country has been vindicated, resolutely oppose all hostile measures, and do all in their power to secure a lasting peace.

It is difficult to decide who will be most annoyed and indignant at the action of the Federal Government in the release of Mason and Slidell—the traitors in arms against the Union, or the despots of the Old World. And loyal men, who are disposed to complain of this action, should carefully await the wrathful explosions from both these classes before committing themselves too far. When the traitors, Slidell and Mason, were captured, a thrill of joy was felt throughout the entire Rebellion. Daily diminishing in numbers, in courage, and resources, terror-stricken at the tremendous preparations of the Federal Government, and at the daily evidences of dissatisfaction among their own people, Jefferson Davis and his associates hailed the prospect of a difficulty between the United States and England as a sure promise that they were about to secure an ally that would prove a most effective assistant in the destruction of our sacred Constitution, and our beloved Union. Their whole treachery, was on the eve of sinking into oblivion, and, like drowning men, they caught with desperate avidity at the straw thus held out to them. They were ready to see Slidell and Mason hung in chains, and in fact greeted their arrest and imprisonment as the only fortunate sign that had appeared to them for months.

THE NEW YORK HERALD:

The evident disposition of the American people was not to apologize, and not to deliver the prisoners, if the right should turn out to be on our side. Rather than do so the American democracy were willing to lose their last man and their last dollar. They believed they were right, substantially, and paid little attention to the nice discriminations of international law. Their blood was up, and "No Surrender" was the watchword. Fortunately for England, there was a cool statesman at the helm of the foreign affairs of this country, who was not led away by the syren voice of passion. His masterly analysis of public law, his calm dignity, and his imperturbable courage in deciding against the United States upon the technicality of the case, while he fearlessly asserts that the principle and the merits are on our side, ought to fill the English government with gratitude, and put to shame the disgraceful conduct of the press which professed to represent it.

There is another vital point established. It is the entire neutrality of England and France in our domestic strife. They are now both nailed down to their own stewals before Europe and the world. We are thus left free from doubt and difficulty in the prosecution of the war for the Union, and will be enabled to put forth the undivided energies of the nation in crushing a rebellion which was only formidable because we were not prepared for it, but which will, ere long, be swept away before our advancing armies, like the grass of the prairie before the devouring flame.

THE BACKBONE OF THE REBELLION BROKEN.—Mr. Seward was right in his opinion communicated to our Minister at London, that this Southern rebellion lives upon its hopes of European intervention, and that with those hopes destroyed this rebellion would collapse in ninety days. The settlement of our difficulty with England, and according to the friendly suggestions of France, in putting an end to the calculations of help from England and France, or from either, breaks the backbone of this rebellion.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE:

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.—I. For a series of ten years, during her protracted, desperate struggle with Napoleon I., Great Britain, through the commanders of her vessels of war, was accustomed to stop on the high seas the merchant vessels of the United States, muster their crews, and take therefrom such persons as those commanders decided, without adjudication or appeal, to be natives of the British dominions, therefore liable to impressment into and service in the Navy of Great Britain.

II. The persons so impressed from our vessels, though mainly seamen of British or Irish nativity, were by no means wholly such. On the contrary, hundreds if not thousands of native Americans were thus impressed and compelled to work, fight, and die for an alien government.

III. So early at least as 1804, our Government called the attention of the British to this practice of impressment from our vessels as at war with all our ideas of international law and neutral rights. But, though our representations were frequent and urgent, we never received any satisfaction or apology whatever.

IV. Great Britain was offered by our Government, soon after her various and persistent outrages on our maritime rights had compelled us in 1812 to declare war against her, an immediate suspension of that war, (her Orders in Council having, unknown to us, been repealed before she heard of our Declaration of War) on the sole condition that she should stipulate for a renunciation of her alleged right to impress seamen from our merchant vessels. But Great Britain peremptorily refused to give any such stipulation, or to surrender or qualify in any manner her asserted right.

V. Though we had been suffering from this British practice of impressment from our vessels through at least ten years—down to the outbreak of war in 1812, we had never threatened Great Britain with hostilities because of this wholesale and persistent violation of what we regarded as our vital maritime right.

VI. Even on the return of peace, after Napoleon had been dethroned and all Europe restored to amity with Great Britain, her Government peremptorily refused to stipulate that she would not in future resort to impressment from our merchant vessels whenever she should be at war, and judge such impressment essential. This ancient right of Great Britain, so vital to her maritime strength, was in no manner disavowed or renounced by her, nor has it been to this day, unless in the peremptory demand made by her that Mason and Slidell, native-born Americans, taken by us from one of her merchant vessels, should be surrendered to her, and their capture apologized for. After this should a British cruiser ever venture to stop an American merchant vessel in quest of British born seamen, even though deserters from her service, we cannot say that the attempt would be promptly and sternly resented—for it might be made at a time when it would be impossible to give that practical effect to our just indignation; but it would constitute an outrage so flagrant that all but those who fancy whatever she deems essential to her maritime ascendency is her undoubted right, would cry shame upon her. We hold therefore, that the capture and release of Mason and Slidell has brought Great Britain herself to acknowledge, after sixty years of confident denial or of obstinate silence, that in her aggressions on neutral maritime rights which drove us into the war of 1812, she was flagrantly, obstinately wrong.

Let none imagine that we object to the release of the Rebel Commissioners, or to the manner in which Gov. Seward has conducted the discussion on our part. On the contrary, we heartily approve both the fact and the terms of our Government's compliance with the British demand. We thoroughly agree with the general spirit both of Gov. Seward's and of M. Thouvenel's suggestions that it ill becomes the United States, after their honorable struggles and sacrifices in behalf of the Freedom of the Seas, to be even accused of unfaithfulness to that great principle. If we are ever again to be brought into hostile collision with Great Britain on a question involving, or claimed as involving, the Maritime Rights of Neutrals, we insist that our flag shall be unfurled and upheld, as hitherto, in accordance with all our National instincts and traditions, on the side of the recognition, the establishment, or even the enlargement of those rights—never on the other. If Great Britain should to-morrow object to the treatment of anything as contraband of war, except in the case of a vessel violating, or intending to violate, a blockade, we hope our Government, at whatever present inconvenience will at once assent to the new doctrine thus asserted—new, at all events, from that quarter.

Latest Intelligence—Arrival of Fugitives—Drafting.—A number of fugitives from the vicinity of Waterford, Loudon county, Va., six miles above Leesburg, succeeded in making their escape through the rebel pickets, and crossed the Potomac on Tuesday night. More besides themselves have escaped from that vicinity in various ways, and others are expected nightly.

Suspension of Specie Payments by our Banks.—At a conference of New York banks on Saturday evening last, by a unanimous vote, they resolved upon an immediate suspension of specie payment.

NATIONAL ODE.

FOR THE FOURTH OF JULY.—BY REV. DR. GILMAN, CHARLESTON, S. C.

The song we publish beneath is not new. It was printed ten years ago, perhaps earlier; but it is, we think, not generally known. What has since become of the author, we know not—whether, like so many in that latitude, he has eaten his words, and become as loud in praise of Rebellion as once of Union; or whether he remained true to his principles, and for their sake has been robbed and exiled, we cannot say. But the song, as an expression of patriotism and political orthodoxy, coming from the very birth-place and hot-bed of treason, is at least a curiosity. It sounds as if it had been written in view of the false doctrine and false faith which have for thirty years infested South Carolina.

It is interesting to compare the present position of the Rebels with their former professions; and we need wish no severer punishment to our enemies than that which their own words, often spoken, have suggested and denounced. Read the spirited verses below, (the Italics are our own;) notice whence they came; remember that by the guns of that same city the "banner" was first "torn;" that it was her machinations which prevailed to "sever freedom's shrine," to break "the tie of country," to "stain the blessings sent" from heaven. The "solemn vow"—how has it been kept? Can we wonder that the peculiar curse of the Almighty rests, even now, upon that wicked city by the sea?

Hail, our country's natal morn!
Hail, our spreading kindred born!
Hail, thou banner, rent yet torn,
Waving o'er the free!

While this day, in festal throng,
Millions swell the patriot's song,
Shall we not the notes prolong?
Hallowed jubilee!

Who would sever freedom's shrine?
Who would draw the invidious line?
Though by birth our spot be mine,
Dear is all the rest—

Dear to me the South's fair land,
Dear the central mountain band,
Dear New England's rocky strand,
Dear the prairied West.

By our altars pure and free,
By our laws' deep-rooted tree,
By the past's dread memory,
By our Washington—

By our common kindred-tongue,
By our hopes—bright, buoyant, young,
By the tie of country strong,
We will still be one.

Fathers! have ye bled in vain?
Ages, must ye droop again?
Maker, shall we rashly stain
Blessings sent by thee?

No! Receive our solemn vow,
While before thy throne we bow,
Ever to maintain as now,
"Union—Liberty!"

COFFEE DRINKING.

How strong should coffee be taken, is an inquiry of much practical importance. How much should be taken at a meal, is scarcely of less moment. Coffee, like any other beverage, may wholly ruin the health; the very use of it tends to this ruin, as certainly as does the use of wine, cider, beer, or any other unnatural, stimulating drink. There is only one safe plan for using coffee, and that is never under any circumstances, except of an extraordinary character, exceed in quantity, frequency or strength; take only one cup at the regular meal, and of a given, unvarying strength. In this way it may be used for a lifetime, not only without injury, but with greater advantage than an equal amount of cold water, and for the simple reason that nothing cold should be drunk at a regular meal, except by persons in vigorous health.

One pound of the bean should make sixty cups of the very best coffee. If a man takes coffee for breakfast only, one pound should last him two months, or six pounds a year.

One pound should be made to last a family of ten persons, young and old, one week. Put about two ounces of ground coffee in a quart of water, or rather, divide the pound into seven portions, one for each breakfast in the week, and make a quart of coffee out of it, which will be sixty-four tablespoonfuls. Give the youngest two tablespoonfuls, and the oldest a dozen; the remainder of the one cup being filled up with boiled milk. This will give a cup of coffee sufficiently strong for all healthful purposes, for the respective ages; and for various reasons, pecuniary as well as physical, some such systematic plan as this should be adopted in every family in the land. How to make the cup of coffee? is a third question. It is perhaps as good and as easy a plan as any to buy the coffee in the grain, pick out those that are imperfect, wash it, parch as much as will last a day or two, with your eye upon it all the time until it is of a rich brown, with no approach of black about it. Grind only enough for the day's use; grind it fine, for the greater the surface exposed to the hot water the more of the essence you will have; pour the boiling water on the coffee, close it up and boil it ten minutes, let it stand to clear ten minutes, then use.—Hall's Journal of Health.

FOR CONSUMPTION.

CREAM VERSUS COD-LIVER OIL.

During a few years past "cod-liver oil" has been the great popular panacea for consumption; tons of thousands of barrels of so-called cod-liver oil have been sold at enormous prices, and consumed. We say "so-called," for it is quite certain that a very large proportion of material sold under this name has been mainly lard oil. We think little harm has been done by the deception, except by the cheat involved in selling for $1 per gallon. There is no doubt that thousands of cures have been effected by the use of both, the pure cod-liver oil, and the spurious lard oil. Faith is the article, (that is, in the label on the bottle, and in the advertisements of the sellers,) has, in many cases, dispelled fear, and started the patient on the high road to health; while the real nourishment afforded by the oil is often just what is needed by the dyspeptic patient, suffering for lack of nutriment. Indeed, it is believed that to the carbonaceous elements of the oil, which are essential to good respiration, is mainly due the benefit that has been derived from the much-lauded cod-liver oil. Acting upon this belief, one of our first physicians, Dr. Alonzo Clark, who is, perhaps, the highest authority of our city, has proposed the use of pure sweet cream as a substitute for the oil. Cream is essentially an oil, very similar in its composition to the cod-liver oil, and others of like character, while it is far more palatable, and vastly cheaper. The Medical Reporter says that a consumptive patient, now under treatment, is taking cream with better effect than was experienced under the cod-liver oil previously tried.

Our advice is, for all who have, or think they have, consumption, to adopt a cream diet. Eat the pure sweet cream abundantly, as much of it as the stomach will digest well. Eat it alone, on bread, with baked sweet apples, and at every meal. Eat it, believing it will cure, and we doubt not that it will prove quite as effective as the purest cod-liver oil that can be bought.—American Agriculturist.

DEEDS OF KINDNESS.

Suppose the little cowslip
Should hang its golden cup,
And say, "I'm such a tiny flower,
I'd better not grow up."—
How many a weary trav'ller
Would miss its fragrant smell;
How many a little child would grieve
To lose it from the dell!

Suppose the glistening dew-drop
Upon the grass should say,
"What can a little dew-drop do?
I'd better roll away."—
The blade on which it rested,
Before the day was done,
Without a drop to moisten it,
Would wither in the sun.

Suppose the little breezes,
Upon a summer's day,
Should think themselves too small to cool
The trav'ller on his way,—
Who would not miss the smallest
And softest one that blow,
And think they made a great mistake,
If they were talking so?

How many deeds of kindness
A little child may do,
Although it has so little strength,
And little wisdom, too!
It wants a loving spirit
Much more than strength, to prove,
How many things a child may do
For others by his love.

LIVES OF PIOUS CHILDREN.

CATHERINE HALDANE.

You know, children, that the good example of a good child like yourselves is a great help to you in trying to be good; just as the bad example of a bad boy or girl, unhappily, leads other boys and girls to become bad like them. Now, as I wish that you will all become good and pious, I propose to give you short accounts of the lives of some pious children; who, like many of yourselves, were once foolish, and perhaps wicked; but who learned to be sorry for their sins, and to love the blessed Saviour; and who are now perfectly happy with Jesus in heaven.

Let me, before I begin, entreat you, my young friends, to read these lives of pious children with attention, and to try to recollect what is told of them; and while you read of them, to pray that God, for Christ's sake, would make you also good and pious like them. Be assured you never can be happy till you love Jesus, and try to please God, as they did.

The first I shall tell you about is Catherine Haldane. She was born December 3d, 1795, and died June 5th, 1802. If you count the time between these two dates, you will find that this good little girl lived only about six years and a half. When she died, she was younger than the most of you. And yet she was a remarkably healthy child, and promised fairer for long life than any of her brothers or sisters. But this did not prevent her taking sick, and dying so very young. If you look at the graves in the cemetery or church-yard, my young readers, you will see many of them which are shorter than yourselves. God took away their little inmates when very young, while he has spared you. But perhaps you may be the next. Then, get ready to die, for you know not how soon you too may die, and be laid in the dust. "All flesh is grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away."

Catherine Haldane had a pious father and mother. Her father was a minister of the gospel in Edinburgh, Scotland. He was once a wicked sea captain, but, when converted, became a famous preacher, and his preaching the means of converting many. From the time that Catherine could understand anything, her parents taught her that she had to give an account of her thoughts, words and actions to God. It is a great blessing to have religious parents. If God has given you this blessing, you should be very thankful to him; and you should love your parents the more for teaching you to love and please God. Catherine's parents early taught her to listen to the reading of the Scriptures; (before she could read herself, I suppose,) and also such little religious books as are adapted to the capacities of children. She soon began to attend to the parables, and some of the stories of the Old Testament. Her mother usually spent two hours daily in reading and talking on what she read, to Catherine and her elder sister. They were never led to regard this as a task; and as they found it entertaining, and were not desired to continue when they began to tire, they always looked forward to it with pleasure, and were disappointed if anything occurred to prevent it.

Her father tells us that Catherine early became fond of reading accounts of pious children. In this, my dear young readers, I hope you will resemble her. As I have said already, the good examples of others are well fitted to strengthen and engage us to walk in the good ways of the Lord.

No particular impression appeared to have been made on Catherine's mind by the word of God till she was five years of age. She had listened to some parts of Scripture with seeming attention, but never appeared to consider herself particularly interested in what she heard, till one Sabbath evening, when her younger sister was asked the meaning of being born again. John iii. 3, Catherine immediately replied—"To get a new heart from God."

Her mother said she feared she did not know what a change of heart meant; and spoke seriously to her. Catherine was much affected, and after she went to bed, said to the excellent and truly pious servant who was her attendant,—"I have been thinking on that verse, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die.'"—Ezekiel xviii. 20.

One evening her attendant spoke to her of the love of Christ to children. Catherine desired her to read the passage of Scripture which speaks of Jesus riding in triumph to Jerusalem, and about the children crying: "Hosanna to the Son of David." Matt. xxi. 15. She asked if these children had been always good. She was told that they had had hearts and evil natures as well as others; but that the Lord had probably changed their hearts, and given them love to Jesus; and that no child's heart was so bad, that the Lord could not make it good. After she was in bed, Catherine whispered to her attendant to pray that the Lord would give her a new heart; and, shortly afterwards, she was observed to be herself on her knees, engaged in prayer.

My young readers, do you think that God heard little Catherine's prayer, and gave her the new heart which she prayed for? Oh, yes, he did! He always hears and answers prayers for a new heart. Do you desire a new heart also? If so, pray heartily to God for it, as did Catherine Haldane. Without a new heart you cannot love God, nor the Saviour Jesus Christ; and unless you love God, you cannot keep his commandments. Without a new heart you cannot be saved, nor get to heaven. Oh, think what shall become of you, if you should die before you get a new heart. Your soul should be forever lost. You should be driven to hell forever. Let me teach you a nice little prayer for a new heart; which you will find in the 51st Psalm, 10th verse; learn it, and put it with your morning and evening prayer:—"Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me."

You will recollect, my young friends, that I told you, that this little girl, when less than five years old, through the blessing of God on the instructions of her godly parents, felt herself to be a sinner, and that she prayed to God for a new heart. You will now learn from the remaining part of her history, that the Lord heard and graciously answered that prayer, and made her one of his own lovely and loving children.

The account we have of her was written by her father, who, as I stated before, was a pious minister. He tells us that one Lord's day having heard the Gospel preached, she was talking with her attendant and her sister about the sermon. Her sister remembered a good deal of what she had heard; Catherine could say but little. They alleged that she had not been attentive. She burst into tears, and said,—"Elizabeth, although I cannot remember so much of the sermon as you, I love to hear paps preach, and I hope I shall soon love my Saviour."

While she showed such seriousness in speaking on these things, she was notwithstanding very fond of her play, and no child enjoyed it more than Catherine.

Her younger sister being asked if she loved Mr. H——y, answered, Yes. Why? Because he gives me good things. The same question was put to Catherine. She replied, Yes; but not because he gives me good things; but because he is one of the Lord's people. She then said to her sister, If you love Mr. H. for giving you good things, you should love Jesus much more, for he gives you all things. She added, you should love the Lord's people; for Jesus said, "Love one another."

Her mother having corrected her for a fault, told her to pray God to make her sensible of her faults; to wash her in the blood of Jesus, and to give her a clean heart. She was much affected. O, said she, I am very sorry for doing it; for I have offended my Saviour too. I do not know what to do. The 103d Psalm was read to her, and she was told that she must believe that "the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin," for that nothing she could do would recommend her to God, or procure her pardon. Catherine answered, I think I do believe it, but I do not know; for I often think I will do well when I do not.

On another occasion, after her father had been conversing with her, she said to her attendant who had expressed doubts whether she loved the Saviour—"I do love Jesus."

In February, 1801, when a little more than five years of age, Catherine began to grow ill; and although her fond parents did all that could be done for her, she gradually grew worse. During her illness, she took pleasure in hymns, and in having the Scriptures read to her. She was particularly fond of the 25th chapter of Matthew.

Her illness made her fretful, especially when medicines had to be administered to her. When afterwards spoken to on the subject, she was always sensible it was very sinful, and expressed much sorrow. Sometimes her mother spoke to her seriously before she gave her medicine, and at such times Catherine would pray earnestly that she might behave like a child of God; and would then, with great gentleness, submit to what was judged proper for her.

But I have not room to tell you much more of this pious child. What more I say of her must be short. As her illness increased, she attended to hymns and the reading of the Scriptures, and conversed as formerly upon religion. Your parents, no doubt, teach you to learn and repeat Psalms, which are better than any hymns. Catherine showed much earnestness in prayer. One day her father desired her to pray aloud, which she did; she not only prayed for herself, but for her brothers and sisters individually with much affection.

When her mother told her that she thought her dying, Catherine said, if she was sure of going to Jesus she should be happy; but that she was afraid she had not a new heart.

During her illness, her temper was observed to become more gentle and patient. She spent more time in prayer than formerly, and in hearing about Jesus, she had long been accustomed to hear a chapter of the Bible read to her after she was in bed. She would never allow this to be neglected, either before or after she became ill.

One Lord's day her mother, on going out, desired her to keep a Sabbath School. When she returned, she heard Catherine praying with the rest, that if it were the Lord's will, he would restore her to health: if not, that he would prepare her for death, and take her to himself.

She suffered much with great patience. Some time before she died, she wished to see her papa, who came and spoke with her, and prayed. She then told him that she loved Jesus Christ. She ever afterwards enjoyed comfort of mind, and never expressed a fear of death. A short time before her death she said, "I have just been thinking how happy I shall be when papa, mamma, Elizabeth, and the rest, meet me in heaven." She added, "It was a pretty chapter that papa read this morning, (at family worship,) that there would be no need of the light of a candle there."

This dear little girl died soon after; giving her sorrowing parents every satisfaction they could desire, that she had obtained a new heart, that she was sorry for her sins, and that she loved her Saviour. She is, without doubt, now happy in the presence of Jesus in heaven. My young reader, have you yet seen yourself to be a sinner? Have you got a new heart? If not, we entreat you to seek it—to pray earnestly for it. You cannot be saved without it. Remember that little prayer for a new heart in the 51st Psalm, 10th verse, and, as I formerly recommended, put it into your morning and evening prayers,—"Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me."

W. S. B.

From the Youth's Evangelist.

REMEMBER THE SABBATH TO KEEP IT HOLY.

One Saturday evening Nettie Lewis put away her doll and other playthings; for she said tomorrow will be the Sabbath, and I must not play, but keep it holy. How much better I am than other little girls; for their mothers have to tell them to put away their toys. My little readers, take your Bible and read in Luke xviii. 9, the story of the Pharisee and the Publican, and tell your teacher which one you think Nettie was the most like. The first thing she did, when she woke the next morning, was to draw aside the window curtain to find out what kind of weather it was. Upon seeing it bright and beautiful, she did not once thank Him who made it so, but clapping her hands, said, I can wear my new bonnet and dress to-day, and look as nice as Flora Lee. In Sabbath School Nettie stood up with the others at prayer, but whispered with her cousin Mary. When the congregation united in singing the praises of God, she joined them, but thought only of her fine voice. When she went into church, she looked to see who came in, and how they were dressed.

During the sermon she read her paper and library book. In the afternoon she went to visit a little friend, who took a walk with her. They spent the time in silly conversation, not speaking, or even thinking, of that best Friend, whom they were grieving. While out a shower came up and spoiled her new bonnet, which made her cry with vexation. Thus in tears and anger closed this day, spent for herself. Do you think it was a holy Sabbath? We will now glance at sweet Winnie Brown, who lives in the same village. On this same lovely Sabbath morning, Winnie rose early and asking her Heavenly Father to show her how to keep it holy, sat down and read about Christ taking little children up in His arms, and blessing them. Her heart was filled with love to him, and she longed to get to his House that she might worship Him with his people.

In Sabbath School during the time of prayer, she closed her eyes, and followed the minister while praying that the Good Shepherd would make each little child there a lamb of His fold. When afterwards they sang, Winnie also could be heard, but she was singing with the spirit and understanding, as we are directed to do in the Bible. Then her teacher explained the lesson and she listened closely, that she might remember, and practise all the week what she there heard. Then Winnie went into church and endeavored to worship God in Spirit and in truth, as he commands us. In the afternoon, she pleased her brother Harry, who was beginning to grow weary of the day, by telling him some Scripture stories. Then this dear little girl went next door to read to a poor blind woman and told her about the sermon, for which she was very grateful to Winnie. Was not Winnie much happier than Nettie? although she, like the Publican, could say, God be merciful to me a sinner. Which one kept the day holy?

Boys, you are just as much bound as girls to obey the 4th Commandment, although this story is meant for them. You can break it just as easily as they. Pray then for aid to "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

MYRTA.

A GOOD BOY.

One cold frosty morning, little John Miller, after wrapping himself up warm, gathered his books and started for school. He was running along whistling merrily, when he saw something glittering in the path before him. John stopped and picked it up—a bright silver half dollar. How many careless little boys would never have thought of the loser, but have put the money in their pocket. So with little John. He was very glad on account of his prize, and as he ran away, thought how many good things he could buy with the money. But as he went along, he asked himself what his good mother and Sabbath School teacher would say. He tried to persuade himself that he was not doing wrong. Yet still his conscience whispered, "Try to find the owner." Now I don't know what my little readers would do, but I hope they would all do as little John Miller did, who ran back to the place where he had found the money, to look for the person who had lost it. After looking up and down the street, he saw a little ragged boy sitting upon a step crying bitterly. John went up to him and asked what was the matter. The little boy told John, that his mother had given him her last half dollar to buy some food with, and he had lost it, and the little boy cried more than ever. John's eyes filled with tears as he saw his trouble, and putting his hand in his pocket, drew out the money and gave it to him.

A bright smile overspread the little boy's face, as he said, "Oh how glad I am." John too was glad and taking the little boy's hand, they went together to John's house, where he told his mother everything. She gave the little boy some breakfast, and then taking a basket full of those things which she thought would be useful, went with the little boy to his mother, and carried joy with her, feeding a starving family. All that day, you may be sure, John Miller was a happy boy, and as he said his prayers that night at his mother's knee, he thanked his Father in heaven, fervently, who had supported him when he was tempted, enabled him to do his duty, and thereby relieved the distress of some of his fellow-beings. Now, my little readers, would not you all like to do as John Miller did?

LOVE.

One of our first efforts as Sabbath School teachers should be in gaining the affections and confidence of our scholars. Love has often more influence than wisdom. The one applies to the reason, the other to the affections; the one speaks to the intellect, the other goes straight to the heart. "It is beautiful," says one, "to believe ourselves loved, especially by those whom we love and value." Yes, it is beautiful, certainly; but we to us if we neglect the responsibilities attached to it. When God permits us to win the regard of others, he places in our hands a sweet and powerful influence, which we should be very careful to use in His service, and to His glory.

Human affection, sanctified by the divine blessing, may be made the instrument of much good; wanting that, it is but a burning light without life or warmth. The lowly and loving may frequently do much more, in their limited sphere, than the rich and noble. We must never forget that we are all appointed to the station which we fill in this life, by the wise Disposer of all things, who knows what is suited to our various capacities and attainments much better than we do ourselves and who would not have placed us there if he had not something for us to do.

There are few who live up to their power of being useful. This is our dwelling place, where each has his or her sphere of usefulness—their mission of love and duty to perform as they pass on through life.

PRESS ON.

Press on, my loved ones, don't delay.
The time is passing fast away:
Go, print your names where all is love,
Where endless joy is far above,—
Where all is pensive, bright, and clear,—
Where none are parted, all are dear,—
Where no proud one dare his foot place,—
Where we shall see Christ face to face.

MATTIE.

If is with the warning voices of our souls as with the tones of nature around us; often inaudible in the glare of the day, they are heard distinctly in the darkness.

DOMESTIC MARKETS.

The Flour market continues dull, and without any change to note in prices or demand.

WHEAT.—There is very little doing, and prices are unsettled and lower, with sales of forty thousand bushels prime Pennsylvania red at $1.30 and 1.33, closing as the former rates. Southern do. at 1.35, and white at 1.40 and 1.45 per bushel. RYE.—About three thousand bushels Pennsylvania brought 72 and 73 cents, and some Southern 63 cts. Corn is in fair request at quotations, with sales of twenty-five thousand bushels at 62 and 64 cts. for old yellow, 53 and 54 cts. for new, and 60 and 62 for old and new mixed. Oats are unchanged, but dull, and thirty thousand bushels sold at 39 c. for prime Delaware, and 39 and 40 c. for Penna.

PROVISIONS.—There has been very little movement in Pork, except on Government account; sales city packed mess at $12.50 and 13.00, and 12.00 New prime is held at 9.00, but without sales. City-packed mess Beef is worth 12.50 and 14. Dried Beef is dull. Bacon.—There is very little demand for any kind; sales of one hundred and fifty casks, including Hams, at 8 and 9 c.; Sides at 6 c., and Shoulders at 4½ and 5 c., cash, and short time. Green Meats.—There is rather more offering; sales of Hams at 5½ and 6 c.; Sides at 5 c., and Shoulders at 4 and 4½ c. Lard meets with a limited inquiry, and prices are steady; sales of tierces and barrels at 9 c.; one hundred mixed packages country at 8½, and kegs at 9½ and 9¾ c. Butter.—There is very little coming in, and it is in fair demand, only with sales of solid-packed at 9 and 9½ c.; two hundred kegs choice dairy grades at 16 cts., and two hundred and fifty tubs Pennsylvania at 15 and 16 c. Cheese is dull at 7 and 8 c. per pound, and Eggs seventeen and eighteen cts. per dozen.

BARK comes forward slowly, and is held firmly at last week's figures, with sales of sixty hogsheads fine ground No. 1 Quercitron at thirty dollars per ton.

BEESWAX is scarce and held firmly, with further sales of prime yellow at 33 c. per pound.

CANDLES.—Sperm are sold at 20 c., on time, and there is little or nothing doing. Prices of Adamantine and Tallow Candles continue as last quoted, with limited sales.

COFFEE.—The market is nearly bare of stock in first hands, and it is in good demand, at a further advance, with sales of one thousand five hundred bags, including Rio at 19 and 20 cents, Laguyra at 22 and 22½ c., and St. Domingo at 19 c. per pound, cash, and time.

FISH.—Mackerel are held with more firmness, and most of the recent arrivals here have been stored; sales at $10 and 10.50 for No. 1, 8 and 9 for No. 2, and 4 for small No. 3s. Codfish sells by retail at $3 and 3.25 per 100 pounds. Herring are worth 1.75 and 3.50 per barrel, as in quality.

FEATHERS.—There are but few here. Sales of three thousand pounds good Western at 38 c. per pound.

FRUIT.—There is a moderate demand for Bunch Raisins. A lot of Malaga Lemons sold at $9, and Messina at 6 per box. Domestic fruit is in steady demand. Green Apples range from $3 to 4 per barrel, as in quality. Dried Apples from 6 to 7, old and new. One hundred bags unpared Peaches sold at 10 c. for halves and 6 for quarters. Cranberries range from seven dollars to ten dollars per bbl., as in quality.

GINSENG is scarce, and crude, if here, would command 50 and 55 c., cash.

GUANO.—The sales are light, and prices unchanged, as the season for active operation is now over.

LUMBER moves slowly. Among the sales we notice two cargoes Southern yellow sap Boards, at $13 and 14 per M feet, and twenty thousand red oak barrel staves at 16.00. Laths are held at 1.20 and 1.25, but sales are in a small way.

MOLASSES is held firmly, but the demand continues quite limited. Sales of clayed Cuba at 25 and 27 c., on time.

OILS.—There is no falling off in the demand for Linseed Oil, and further sales have been made at 83 and 87 cts., cash. Ten thousand gallons sold last week on private terms. Fish Oil is firm. Lard Oil sells at 70 and 80 c. for fall and prime winter. There is no movement in Red Oil. In Coal Oil there has been more doing. Further sales of refined at 45 and 50 c. cash.

PLASTER is unchanged. Small sales of soft at 2.25 per ton.

RICE is held firmly, but there is very little demand; small sales at 6¼ and 7 c.

SALT has advanced. The two last imports of Liverpool have been duted for higher prices. An invoice of thirty-six hundred sacks Liverpool ground sold privately.

SEEDS.—Cloverseed is dull, and prices have declined; sales at $4 and 4.50 per bushel from wagons. Timothy ranges from 1.75 and 2.35. The market is bare of Flaxseed, and it is wanted at 2.10 per bushel.

SUGAR.—There is a firmer feeling in the market, but not much inquiry. Sales of one hundred and fifty hogsheads of Cuba at 7¾ and 8¾ c., and two thousand seven hundred bags of Pernambuco at 7¾ cents.

TALLOW is unchanged; we quote city-rendered at 9¼ and 9½ cents, cash, and country at 8½ and 9 c., cash.

TEAS.—Prices are tendering up for both black and green, but the sales are limited.

WOOL.—There is no falling off in the demand noted for some time past; free sales of medium and low grades at 50 and 60 cents, cash. The stock of low-grade wool throughout the country is nearly exhausted.

SEWING & GIBBS
WILCOX & MACHINES.

Price with Hemmer and Feller,
$35 00.

THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.

Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread.

It forms a fast, even, and elastic seam, which is warranted not to rip in wear, even if the seam is cut at frequent intervals, and presents the same appearance on both sides.

A Patented device of great utility to learners, prevents the possibility of the machine being run in the wrong direction, or the balance-wheel reversing a lady's dress.

Another feature which deserves particular attention is its The Wilcox Patent Needle cannot be set wrong.

Two thousand stitches or two yards of work, can be done in one minute without dropping a stitch.

These Machines so simple and accurate in their construction, as to permit the use of the shuttle; and with one thread produce a all the practical results of the two thread machines; and more, for they do all without tucking, and hem the finest muslin without puckering.

Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the range in a given time.

"It is emphatically the good, for priced Family Sewing Machine that the public have long been waiting for."—Boston Transcript.

"It is indeed a wonderful production, and for family use especially, we think will bear favorable comparison with it."—Philadelphia Evening Journal.

"A mechanical wonder."—Scientific American.

"Among the best and most perfect sewing machines. Light and elegantly finished, and so simple in its construction that it seems almost impossible for it to get out of repair."—Pittsburg Christian Advocate.

"Has combined with its own peculiar merits all the really valuable improvements of the higher priced machines."—Pennsylvanian.

"The machine, in the opinion of the committee, is more worthy the encouragement of a perfect family machine than any on exhibition."—Franklin Institute Exhibition Report of 1858.

"Taking into consideration simplicity, cheapness, durability, and doing all work, the committee were unanimously in favor of the Wilcox & Gibbs sewing machine."—Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society's Report.

"We must, in justice, express our confidence in the merits of the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine. We consider that a gt at desideratum has been supplied by it, in proving beyond doubt, that two threads are not necessary to make the best of a good instrument."—Christian Advocate and Journal, June 21, 1860.

"We have one of these machines in use, and think more highly of it than of any of the number we have tried."—Richmond Whig.

The undersigned, Wisconsin, in consequence, has examined more than twenty different kinds of Sewing Machines, and after six weeks' experience with Wilcox & Gibbs' Patent, he has purchased one of them, as the best adapted to the wants of his family, and as the best in use to require repair.

OLIVER CRANE.

Boston, July 3, 1860.

The undersigned, during eighteen months has had in almost constant use, in his family, a Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine, upon which has been made the clothes of his large family—from muslin to pea jacket—including the clothing required by his several boys, and in no case have they been found, although by hard service. The machine now in use in his family has required no repair, and is, in all respects, well appointed, efficient and durable.

EMPIRE
SHUTTLE MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.

Salesroom—510 Broadway, New York.

This MACHINE is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism, possessing many new and valuable improvements, having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION combined.

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—

1.—Excessive fatigue to the operator,
2.—Liability to get out of order,
3.—Expense, trouble, and loss of time in repairing,
4.—Incapacity to sew every description of material,
5.—Disagreeable noise while in operation.

THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither rip nor ravel, and is alike on both sides—performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nainsook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires fifty per cent. less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of 12 years of age can work it steadily without fatigue or injury to health.

Its strength and Wonderful Simplicity of Construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is Guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this

UNRIVALLED MACHINE.

But in a more special manner do we solicit the patronage of

DICK'S ACCOUNTANT
AND DISPATCH PATENT.

THE INVENTOR'S CLAIMS ACKNOWLEDGED AND PROTECTED BY THE GOVERNMENTS OF CANADA, THE UNITED STATES, AND GREAT BRITAIN! WITH EXPLANATIONS.

What I claim as my invention is the substitution of keeping accounts current, of whatever kind, description, or variety, in printed form, by keeping the statements of the current accounts standing in printed type, in their equivalents, the type being so arranged in form as to admit of being readily and quickly re-adjusted to any particular point, whenever necessary, for the purpose of making a change in the form of time to the current of business transactions; so that, when readjusted in all such parts or in any given degree as an impression from such form of type, or sheet exhibit of a printed form, the true state of all the accounts so kept, severally represented by all the balances or conclusions, in accordance with the said or such conclusion, is found to be correct, requiring it to compensate business, a balance sheet of the most complete and perfect character, the details of management being substantially as recited in specification, wherein it is shown, that the said or like to be recorded, may be represented by figures, words, letters, or characters, or any other symbols, or in combinations or by whatever else will indicate the fact or facts as desired, and further shown, based on this primary invention, I also claim the same in the form or modification of rendering or presenting accounts in partial or full statements when the statement of statements as now are done, or substantially thus kept in type, by the employments of my invention, to the maximum of transcription what is now, but the particular mode of so doing appears in the form of the Dispatch Machine, constituted of Apron Movement, Book and Cutter stamp, I claim in the finished and ballast wrought and also in the machine itself, embracing all the forms and modes of operation, as indicated in describing it, either as a single hand instrument, or as propelled by machinery. And in connection with these specific claims, and based upon them, I also claim all other means and applications substantially the same as these herein claimed or intended to be claimed. With these claims duly acknowledged and protected as above, this invention has already passed the Patent Office, Canada, Somerset House of the American Courts, and in Great Britain, and it is now used in more than one hundred Newspaper Offices. Its immense value in banking and similar institutions will be shown to a stranger which will make its appearance soon. Meanwhile, applications for information, "Cards of Right," or "Dispatch Machines," will receive due attention, when addressed either to

"THAT * * WHICH WE HAVE SEEN WITH OUR EYES * * OF THE WORD OF LIFE."

If Jesus came to earth again,
And walked and talked in field and street,
Who would not lay his human pain
Low at those heavenly feet?

And leave the loom, and leave the lute,
And leave the volume on the shelf,
To follow him, unquestioning, mute,
If 't were the Lord himself?

How many a brow with care o'erworn,
How many a heart with grief o'erladen,
How many a man with woe forlorn,
How many a mourning maiden,

Would leave the baffling, earthly prize,
Which fails the earthly weak endeavor,
To gaze into those holy eyes,
And drink content forever!

His sheep along the cool, the shade,
By the still watercourse he leads,
His lambs upon his breast are laid,
His hungry ones he feeds.

And I, where'er he went, would go,
Nor question where the path might lead,
Enough to know, that, here below,
I walked with God indeed!

If this be thus, O Lord of mine,
In absence is thy love forgot?
And must I, when I walk, repine
Because I see thee not?

If this be thus, if this be thus,
Since our poor prayers yet reach thee, Lord,
Since we are weak, once more to us
Reveal the Living Word!

O nearer to me, in the dark
Of life's low hours, one moment stand,
And give me keener eyes to mark
The moving of Thy hand.

ETERNITY.

Eternity! Eternity!
How long art thou, Eternity!
A little bird, with fretting beak,
Might wear to naught the loftiest peak,
Though but each thousand years it came;
Yet thou wert then as now the same.
Ponder, O man, Eternity.

Eternity! Eternity!
How long are thou, Eternity!
O man, fall off thy thoughts should dwell
Upon the pains of sin and hell,
And on the glories of the poor,
That both beyond all time endure.
Ponder, O man, Eternity.

Eternity! Eternity!
How long art thou, Eternity!
Who marks thee well would say to God,
Here judge, here, smite me with thy rod,
Here let me all thy justice bear;
When time of grace is past, then spare.
Ponder, O man, Eternity.

Eternity! Eternity!
How long art thou, Eternity!
Lo, I, Eternity, warn thee,
O man, that thou oft think on me,
To sinners, punishment and pain,
To them that love their God, rich gain!
Ponder, O man, Eternity!

DESCRIPTION OF THE MOHAMMEDAN MOSQUES IN THE EAST.

MOSQUE OF MOHAMMED ALI.

The Mosque of Mohammed Ali was commenced by the great Pasha whose name it bears more than thirty years ago, and was yet unfinished when its founder died; indeed, it is not even yet finished according to the original plan, although it is doubtful whether any more money and labor will be bestowed upon it. It is the first and last thing seen of Cairo, for it stands upon the most projecting part of the citadel hill, and at a little distance seems to rest as a splendid coronal upon the brow of the capital city. Its form is rectangular, and its size about 250 by 400 feet. The walls are said to be four feet thick, and must be no less than forty or fifty feet high. These walls are built of the stone quarried from the neighboring hills, and were designed to be entirely encased with oriental alabaster, both on the outside and the inside, although this outside casing has not yet been put on, and probably never will. The western part forms the usual open paved court, surrounded with covered galleries resting internally upon alabaster pillars. The eastern end is enclosed and finished as a house of prayer. This forms a large hall, and is faced throughout with alabaster; it is surmounted with one large, and I think, two smaller domes, which rest upon massive columns. The arches of these domes are painted with elaborate arabesques of green, blue, crimson, and gold. The paved floor is covered with carpets of orthodox green. The great dome is hung with circles of lamps, alternating with ostrich eggs, the circles becoming more elevated as they approach the centre, forming on feast occasions, when lit up, a magnificent pyramid of light. On the eastern side is the usual niche, which informs the worshipper which way to turn his face that he may look towards Mecca when he prays. In the south-west corner, in a little chamber railed off, lay the coffin of the great Mohammed Ali, with nothing but a heavy velvet pall thrown over it. One afternoon, a company of six Americans, two from New York, two from Pennsylvania, one from Ohio, and one from Minnesota, spent an hour in rambling through this splendid Mosque, during which time we met with but one worshipper, a poor fellow who had selected a spot near the tomb of the founder, where he was going through with his prayers at a tremendous rate, talking away while drawing in his breath, as a boy would do who was counting a hundred upon a wager. Poor fellow! he felt the necessity of prayer, but as the duty was irksome, he tried to get through with it just as soon as possible. And what worse was he than those in Christian lands, who won't pray at all, or who go through the form in the most listless and careless way. This man was doubtless sincere, he certainly was intent, for he never suffered his eye to wander, or his lips to rest a single moment, although for several minutes we walked and talked, and stood around him, while satisfying our curiosity in viewing the tomb; we, however, respected his piety so far as never to stand between him and Mecca.

It is not lawful for any one to enter a mosque with shoes on, hence the Turk and Arab slips off his loose slippers at the door, and enters bare-footed. The Frank, however, does not like to run around on the cold stone floor in his stockings, so a compromise is made for their benefit. Two or three Arabs will be found squatted at the door of the mosques visited by Franks, having in their possession a few pair of large rude slippers, made of twisted straw or cloth, without any leather soles; for one or two piastres, you get the use of a pair of these, which you draw on over your boots, and then it is all right, you can go where you please.

This mosque is peculiar for its elaborate finish, and for its freshness. All the other mosques are old and dingy, most of them resting under the dust of three or four centuries, while this is new and fresh. It is also distinguished for its tall and reed-like minarets; they are much higher than ordinary, and they are exceedingly slender; it seems that they must bend with the slightest breeze, and it remains to me a mystery yet to know how the muezzin can possibly crawl up them when he goes to call the faithful to prayers.

MOSQUE OF SULTAN HASSAN.

This mosque stands immediately below the citadel, and on an open space used as a market, although the entrance is from a side street, and up a flight of narrow steps, where is perhaps the most elaborately carved, and magnificent door-way to be found in the whole Mohammedan world. The entire structure was built of the stone with which the great pyramid of Ghizeh was encased, for originally that pyramid was finished like the others, with smooth inclined planes on its four sides, instead of the step-like risers as it now is, the casing having been removed for building purposes, and mainly for the building of this mosque. This edifice is generally regarded as the most imposing and majestic building ever erected for Mohammedan worship, with the single exception of the great mosque at Delhi, in India, built about two hundred years ago, by the Emperor, Shahjehan. The walls of this mosque are very high and massive. They surround a large rectangular court, and the covered galleries on three sides are very narrow, and very high, supported by immense pointed arches. On the eastern side there is no house of prayer, but the gallery is very deep, and resting upon its massive arches forms a great alcove, the floor of which is elevated two or three steps, and in the midst of it is a high, rude, wooden pulpit, from which the Koran is read, and sermons delivered on Fridays. Back of this alcove, is a large domed chamber, which contains the tomb of its founder, Sultan Hassan. This tomb is only two or three feet high, covered with a carpet, and inclosed with a rough, unpainted, wooden paling. From time immemorial, the most splendid copy of the Koran known in all Islam, lay at the head of this tomb, but it is there no longer. Two or three years ago, it was carefully removed to Constantinople, as belonging rightly to the head of the faithful. The open court is paved with fine marble, and in its centre stands a canopied fountain, where the worshippers perform their ablutions before they go to their prayers.

To show the great change which has taken place, and is still going on here, in the matter of public opinion, I would simply elucidate the fact, that less than twenty years ago, Dr. Durbin tells us that he had considerable difficulty to get into this mosque at all; and then only upon the condition that he would walk upon but two sides of the court, and even there keep close to the wall. With me it was very different. The keepers seemed glad to get a customer, and they very readily supplied me with the requisite orthodox slippers, when I stepped over the low rail which bars the entrance and went just where I pleased, and lingered just as long as I pleased. This was the only mosque that I visited twice, and neither time did I find a worshipper within the entire edifice.

MOSQUE OF TOOLOON.

This is the oldest mosque in Cairo, being founded in the year 879, or ninety years before the conquest of Moez, which fact in itself is sufficient to show that a city stood here before the rise of the Fatimite Caliphs. It is said to be an exact copy of the great mosque of Mecca. It must be five or six hundred feet square, and consisted merely of an open court, surrounded with covered galleries. These galleries rest upon pointed arches, showing that this style of architecture was in fashion among the Saracens at least two hundred years before its appearance in Europe.

But one of the galleries of Tooloon remains unencumbered, the others are walled off, and built up with a great many small rooms for the accommodation of paupers, so that this mosque has become, in reality, a great poor house. My impression is, that it is no longer used as a place for Mohammedan worship, but turned to a better purpose, that of practical charity.

This mosque is principally distinguished for the very peculiar minaret which stands upon its western wall. Instead of the tall, slender, and very graceful minaret which prevails so generally, this is a stone tower with the stairway outside. It was so built, tradition tells us, that the founder might be able to ride up it on horseback. Whether he ever went up this minaret or not, I know not; but up it, one clear sunny afternoon, I went to the very top; and was rewarded by a very fine view of the city; second only to that from the citadel. And I must confess that I experienced very peculiar emotions when I found myself standing upon the spot where the crier stood as he called the city to prayer four times a day for the last thousand years. There is something in antiquity which commands our homage, so that a creed, even although false, becomes magnificent as a matter of sentiment, when it has dictated the devotions of millions for ten or fifteen centuries. To venerate the aged is one of the instincts of our natures. And that which has been associated with the daily worship of the one living and true God, for a thousand years, must become, in some measure, hallowed to our affections, even although the worshipper has been a fanatic or an imposter. The fault of the worshipper cannot, and should not, wholly dissipate the reverence we feel for the Being falsely or ignorantly worshipped.

OTHER MOSQUES.

I was very anxious to visit the Mosque El Azhar; and as Brother Barnet had never yet been through it, we made an appointment to visit it together; but other arrangements finally prevented, and I had to leave the city without the pleasure of seeing El Azhar. This I regretted, for it is the grand collegiate mosque of the city; indeed the most celebrated educational establishment in all Islam. It has twenty-four apartments; one for each of the recognised nations in the Mohammedan world, and youth are here instructed from all the countries where the religion of the false prophet prevails. The course of study is mainly confined to the Arabic language, and the literature and the interpretation of the Koran. In the study of the Arabic, the scholar must master five different volumes upon the verb, and six upon the noun, besides sundry others upon syntax, &c.; after and during which he is expected to listen to not less than seven years of oral lectures. The study of theology is about as elaborate. The student first commits the Koran to memory; he then learns to chant it. Then he applies himself to the ten volumes of commentary; some of which are huge folios; after that he gives himself to a careful study of the eight collections of the Traditions of the Prophets. How true is it, that every false religion exacts of its votaries more time and toil than does the religion of Jesus. Its founder knew well man's wants and capacities, and ordained a religion suitable to both. El Azhar has, in late years, fallen off considerably in its many resources and its renown, because of the diminished esteem in which the religious sciences are now held in Egypt. Still it is estimated that from 2000 to 3000 students, from all countries, are yet in attendance. There are about 150 professors; some of whom are allowed to receive any fee from his pupils. Some of these receive the income of endowed professorships, and others lecture gratis, expecting thereby to acquire religious merit.

There are now between 300 to 400 mosques in Cairo. Most of them were built between the 12th and 17th centuries, which was the era of this city's greatest glory. Quite a number are in the ruins; very few have been built within a century; all seem dingy and less cared for than formerly. And no person seems to feel the necessity of building new ones, or even keep the old ones in repair. The spirit of fatalism rests upon not only the mosques, but some other things in and around this city. The Arab sits and calmly smokes, and looks on with indifference as time and decay slowly but surely do their appropriate work; he leaves all things to God. Come what may, he receives everything as the decree of necessity, and simply, and without any emotion, ejaculates, "Praise be to Allah." J. B. S.

HOW POPE STUDIED ENGLISH. HOW TO IMPROVE IN ENGLISH.

In Johnson's Life of Pope we have some interesting copies of portions of Pope's manuscript, with his own genuine corrections and alterations, showing by how much even a poet's second thoughts are best. "Of these specimens," says Johnson, "every man who has cultivated poetry, or who delights to trace the mind from the rudeness of its first conceptions to the elegance of the last, will naturally desire a greater number, but most other readers will be tired." We so far concur with the learned Doctor in this opinion that we decline to transcribe the blotted page, but would refer the more curious reader to Johnson's Lives of the Poets for some interesting specimens.

The smooth and harmonious numbers of Pope, so far superior in cadence and rhythm to any poetry of an earlier date, are said by Johnson actually "to have tuned the English language; for, since the days of Pope, no writer, however deficient in other powers, has wanted melody." It is also remarked by Dr. Waits, that there is scarcely a happy combination of words, and scarcely a phrase poetically elegant in the English language, which Pope has not inserted in his version of Homer. And Johnson remarks, "How Pope obtained possession of so many beauties of speech, it were desirable to know."

This question, How Pope, born and bred in England, learned that poetical phraseology which seems only part of his mother-tongue?—this is, indeed, a question which it would hardly occur to any but an author to propose; so much a matter of course does it appear to ordinary readers that a poet should be able to summon all the stores of the language to do his bidding. But this opinion, however natural, agrees not with the experience of men of genius.

That choice language which we find in the poems of Pope and in the prose of Addison, is hardly the language of our mother-tongue; or, at all events, it must be admitted that such smooth, and chaste, and varied diction is a form and dialect of that mother-tongue, far superior to what we learn by nature, and only to be acquired by art.

Let us explain ourselves a little more at length. We once heard a sensible country Rector inform a new Curate that the lower classes could not understand above one-fourth part of that English which the higher classes speak; and, consequently, that as often as a preacher deviates from this very limited vocabulary he is virtually speaking in an unknown tongue.

Now, if one word out of every four in the dictionary is as large a proportion of the language as the ploughman can understand, the word out of four is about as many as the Squire or the Parson are able commonly to use. Words, the instruments of thought, are like other instruments, or other tools. A first-rate workman carries a great variety of tools in his flag-basket; and attains an additional finish and accuracy by the skilful application of each. But the rougher and ruder kind of labourer can handle only one or two of a sort. So it is with the ordinary vocabulary of common conversation. One word acts many parts. Nearly all persons, without special study, may be detected in ringing the changes on one set of words, and of moving round and round in one narrow circle of trite phraseology. It is one thing to understand every word in the language; but another thing to have every word ready and available for its proper use and application. Even Goldsmith, so choice and so chaste in his writings, was singularly careless and inaccurate in common conversation. It was remarked of him by one of his friends—"Goldsmith, for instance, would say, 'This is as good a guinea as was ever learnt;' coined, he ought to say; but such a word as coined would never occur to Goldsmith."

It is obvious that persons who read only on one subject are likely to find their style limited to a confined circle of phraseology. They will add a few nautical or maritime expressions after a trip to the seaside; they will say their ideas feel under high pressure, after the steamship; they will designate one friend as a specimen of Early English, another as Decorated, another as Gothic, after a smattering of Church architecture: and, perhaps, after a month at geology, they will speak of peculiarities of character as cropping out, and call old-fashioned people antediluvian. They will thus astonish their brothers and sisters with a new vocabulary of terms almost as striking as a new language. The truth is, they have been pressing into their service one or more classes of words never used before. The advice which these observations naturally involve is this: "Vary your reading if you would enrich your style."

Let it be granted, therefore, that one column of the dictionary out of four is as large a proportion of our language as any one person will use by nature. It is by art—by variety of reading, and minute observation of every word in every sentence of the most effective writers—that all the great masters of composition have studied to enrich their style; their endeavor being to incorporate and make habitual as much of the other three columns as they can.

In this study of language, Pope had succeeded so far as to lay the whole language under contribution, to supply words in unison with every tone of feeling, and words expressive of every shade of thought. So, Johnson, struck with admiration at these varied beauties, immediately raised the question, How much command of language ever was attained?

To indulge our curiosity, we are permitted to know that, first of all, Pope prepared himself by endeavoring to start from the point at which Dryden, his predecessor in the art of translation, had left off. By perusing the works of Dryden, Pope first of all discovered the most perfect fabric of English verse, and habituated himself to that only which he pronounced the best. In the next place, as Johnson believed, Pope gleaned from authors, obscure as well as eminent, what he thought brilliant or useful, and preserved it all in a regular collection. For it is remarked, that when, in Pope's last years, Hall's Satires were shown him, he expressed a wish that he had seen them sooner—a wish which would seem to imply a life-long habit of enriching his poetic style by incorporating with it any beautiful expressions that might occur. Poets adopt the same mode of improvement as painters. A painter will study nature not only in the original at rivers, rocks, and flood and field, but also in the pictures drawn from nature by artists of acknowledged genius. For, the study of fine paintings opens our eyes to the beauties of nature before unseen. So also the poet will learn the beauties of language from observing the combinations of words and phrases by which poetic beauties have already been achieved.

THE LIBRARY.

One of the most perplexing subjects for the Superintendent is the management of the Sabbath-School Library.

In a large school the books are destroyed or lost with a wastefulness that is frightful, and yet it seems next to impossible, without a degree of harshness that few superintendents will venture on, to enforce such a degree of responsibility in regard to the use of the books as to prevent this shameful abuse.

The return of the books, the selection of others, and their distribution take up a large part of the time that the school is in session, and unless the business is conducted with more system than it is in most schools, it not only consumes a large amount of time, but it produces endless disorder. Some teachers are not satisfied unless they are allowed to go to the library, and make the selection of books for their class by actual inspection of them on the shelves. They take umbrage at the superintendent if he interposes any objection to this course. We have seen schools in which two, or three, or even half-a-dozen teachers at a time would be at the library, rummaging among the books, while their classes in the meantime would be left to run riot in disorder.

If the superintendent is decided in the matter, and will not allow any such irregular proceedings, then there is dissatisfaction among the scholars. Neither they nor their teachers have any acquaintance with the books, and the mere titles in the catalogue give little clue to their real character. They are obliged to select from the catalogue pretty much at a venture, and when the librarian brings round the books selected, they are found in half the cases utterly unsuitable. A child just beginning to read gets some book of antiquities or of didactic theology. A member of the Bible-class gets a book of nursery rhymes. More frequently still, the book selected is out, or lost, and the scholar gets no book at all.

A valuable book, that has cost fifty cents, or a dollar, is taken home by a poor child. It is borrowed by some of the neighbors and not returned. It is mislaid in the general irregularity and disorder that so often prevail in the homes of the poor, and it cannot be found. It is played with by some of the smaller children, and is so soiled and defaced that it is no longer fit to be placed in the library. The child and its parents are too poor to replace the book. Yet if a dozen such cases occur, as they may easily occur, every week, and without remedy, the library soon disappears altogether.

Besides the loss of time, the waste, the interruption and disorder, attendant upon the use of the library, there are other evils even more serious. Books creep into our libraries that have no business there. We never saw a Sabbath-school library yet, in one of our large city schools, which would not have been enriched by having half its contents committed to the flames. Not that one half the books are bad, in the sense of containing what is in itself objectionable. But some are merely exciting stories, that convey no religious instruction or Scriptural truth. Still more are utterly dull and heavy, such as a child can by no possibility be induced to read. Look over the shelves. You know a book of this kind the moment you see it. There it stands untouched and clean, year after year.

But how can the evil be avoided? Some of these libraries contain many hundred volumes. They must do so, in order to have enough to accommodate the children. But how can the superintendent or the teachers sit down to read all the books that are offered for their choice, and make an intelligent selection? It is impossible. The books now published by the various houses engaged in supplying this species of literature, cannot be less certainly than three thousand. No teacher can expect to be acquainted with them all.

Disturbed by a sense of responsibility in this matter, and vexed by the petty annoyances which the library gives in the school, some superintendents are disposed at times to throw the whole thing overboard, and not to have any library in the school at all. This would certainly be a great mistake. We speak from no small experience in this matter, and from actual observation among the class of people to whom the Sabbath-school itself is most important, and we feel quite sure that the institution would be shorn of one of its main elements of usefulness, if the library were abandoned. The library book, and the child's paper, carry the blessed influence of the Sabbath-school home to the father and the mother, to the older and the younger children, to friends and neighbors. These silent messengers preach weekly to hundreds of thousands who can be reached by no other agency. By means of the library, skilfully used, the teacher may continue and supplement his lessons all the week round. The library, therefore, cannot be given up. It is too great an element of usefulness. It is too dear to the children, particularly to the children of the poor.

Cannot the difficulties of its management be remedied?

The main difficulties, in our opinion, are two—first, in getting a proper selection of books; and second, in having the teachers sufficiently acquainted with them. These two points once secured, there is no other difficulty that cannot be readily met by any superintendent of ordinary executive ability. If the library contains no trash, that is, if there is in it no book that is not both valuable and attractive, and if the teachers in the main are so far informed in regard to the books as to guide the children intelligently in their selections, all the other troubles can be managed without difficulty. Indeed, there have been half-a-dozen plans proposed by different correspondents of this paper, any one of which would have been satisfactory, but for these primary and radical defects. In regard to these two essential points, we shall have something to say in a future number.

"TRUST IN THE LORD AT ALL TIMES."

Paul Gerhardt, a German poet and divine, was born in Saxony, in 1805. He entered the ministry, and for ten years performed the duties of his sacred office in the Nicolai Church at Berlin. "But his religious sentiments," writes his biographer, "did not wholly coincide with those of the king, and Gerhardt, too conscientious and too decided to affect opinions which he did not entertain, was deprived of his appointment, and ordered to quit the country. Utterly destitute, not knowing where to lay his head, or provide for his helpless family, he left the house where he had spent so many happy years. But no affliction, however terrible, could shake his confidence in Divine wisdom and mercy. After some consideration, he determined on directing his steps to his native land, Saxony, where he yet hoped to find friends. The journey, performed on foot, was long and weary. Gerhardt bore up manfully; his heart failed him only when he gazed on his wife and his little ones. When night arrived, the travellers sought repose in a little village inn by the roadside, where Gerhardt's wife, unable to restrain her anguish, gave way to a burst of natural emotion. Her husband, concealing his anxious cares, reminded her of that beautiful verse of Scripture, "Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not to thine own understanding; in all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths."

"The words uttered to comfort his afflicted partner impressed his own mind so deeply, that, seating himself in a little arbor in the garden, he composed a hymn," of which Madame de Pontes gives us the following translation:—

"Commend thy ways, O mortal!
And humbly raise thy sighs
To him, who in his wisdom,
Rules earth, and sea, and skies.
He who for all has found a spot,
Wind, wave, and ocean dread,
Will find a place, oh! doubt it not,
Thy feet can likewise tread!

In him alone confide thou must,
Ere he will bless thy deed;
In His word must thou put thy trust,
If thy work shall succeed.
Murmur, and vain repining,
And effort—all will fail;
God will not listen unto these—
Prayer can alone prevail.

All means and ways possessing,
Whate'er he does is right;
His every deed a blessing,
His steps one path of light!
To thee it is not given
The tempest's rage to quell;
God reigns supreme in heaven,
And all he does is well.

True, it may seem a moment
As though thou wert forgot,
As though he were unmindful
Of thine unhappy lot;
As though thy grief and anguish
Reached not the eternal throne,
And thou wert left to languish
In sorrow and alone.

But if, though much should grieve thee,
Thy faith shall on'er have ceased,
Be sure he will relieve thee,
When thou expect'st it least.
Then hail to thee victorious!
Thou hast, and thou alone,
The honor bright and glorious,
The conquest and the throne."

Not many hours after Gerhardt had thus expressed his unshaken faith in the Most High, he found by experience that God indeed had not forgotten him. "Evening had now deepened, and the pastor and his wife were about to retire to rest, when two gentlemen entered the little parlor in which they were seated. They began to converse with the poet, and told him that they were on their way to Berlin to seek the deposed clergyman, Paul Gerhardt, by order of their lord, Duke Christian of Merseburg. At these words Madame Gerhardt turned pale, dreading some further calamity; but her husband, calm in his trust in an overruling Providence, at once declared that he was the individual they were in search of, and inquired their errand. Great were the astonishment and delight of both wife and husband when one of the strangers presented Gerhardt with an autograph letter from the duke himself, informing him that he had settled a considerable pension upon him to atone for the injustice of which he had been the victim. Then the pious and gifted preacher turned towards his wife, and gave her the hymn which he had composed during his brief absence, with the words, 'See how God provides! Did I not bid you confide in him, and all would be well?'"

Let us all take this lesson to our own hearts—those hearts so prone to sink under the burden of anxieties, forgetful of him who has commanded us to cast our cares upon him.

How many, faint in prayer though praying still,
Feel God can help, mistrustful if he will!
Which to a parent most unkind would prove,
To doubt his power or to doubt his love?

The Friend.

THE ETERNITY OF THE WICKED.

The fact that there is so much wickedness unpunished in this world, leads to the supposition that there will be punishment for man hereafter. Without the Bible, this goes no further than supposition: "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

The existence of man does not terminate with this life. There is an eternity before him of happiness or misery, an eternal heaven, or a never-ending hell. The future condition of the wicked is plainly pointed out; sin will be punished. God is displeased at sin, and looks upon it with abhorrence. Of this displeasure man has not been left in ignorance. The doom of the impenitent is plainly written. "Woe unto the wicked; it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him." "The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God." The righteous go to the grave as well as the wicked, hence the Psalmist must refer to hell as a place in which the wicked will inevitably be punished for their sins.

The wicked will be punished after death. The early Christians were exhorted not to fear the persecutor who had power to kill the body, but could go no farther. "Fear not them," says Christ, "which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." Fear God. Avoid sinning against him, that after death you may not be cast into outer darkness where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. At the resurrection, some will awake to shame and everlasting contempt, and on the day of judgment some will be sentenced to eternal perdition; showing that the punishment of the wicked is not confined to this life. Their torments will commence immediately after death. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, where death did its certain work, the one lifted up his eyes in torments, the other was conducted by angels to Abraham's bosom; the one found himself in the flames of hell, the other in the home of the blessed. To the wicked there is no rest; as death finds them, so their eternity will be. Their doom will be forever sealed; it will always be the same. "The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever."

While there are some who deny that there will be any punishment after death, others affirm that the punishment of the wicked will be limited in duration, that the wicked will be reformed and purified, and prepared for heaven. Each of these theories is alike contrary to the teaching of divine revelation.

The Saviour, when speaking of the necessity of giving up sin of all kinds, however difficult it might be, or whatever effort it would be necessary to make, says it must be done or heaven will be lost. It may be like taking off a hand, or a foot, or like taking out an eye; a painful operation, but it must be done. "If thy hand offend thee, cut it off; it is better to enter into life eternal maimed, than having two hands, to go into hell; into the fire that never shall be quenched, where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." The worm will continue to live, the fire continue to burn, and each act its part in the punishment of the sinner. The one will never die; the other will never go out.

The sentence of the wicked, on the day of judgment, will be: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." The fire, which is an emblem of the punishment of the wicked, is everlasting. The punishment of the wicked in hell is the same in duration as the happiness of the righteous in heaven. No one doubts that the righteous will be eternally happy, nor is there any more room to doubt that the punishment of the wicked will last forever.

If anything further is necessary to prove the proposition, that the punishment of the wicked will be eternal, there will be no difficulty in producing additional testimony. When the Lord Jesus comes the second time, he will take "vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ;" they "shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." This destruction, whatever it may be, is everlasting, and of the nature of punishment. While this language does not convey the idea that the wicked will be blotted out of existence, it signifies that they will be destroyed as to the great end of their being—eternal life, with all its enjoyments, will be lost.

There is a sin unto death. Sin may be committed under such aggravating circumstances that there is no hope for pardon seen in this life. Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. He that is guilty of this sin, and may we not hope the number is small, "hath never forgiveness, but is in danger of eternal damnation." "It shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come." Here is a sin that is never pardoned, and, therefore, the transgressor must be forever punished. Punishment must necessarily be continued until there is pardon. Thus, we see, from a somewhat extensive examination of the Scriptures, that the punishment of the wicked will have no end. The language of inspiration is certainly sufficiently plain. So plain, indeed, that he that runs may read. On the supposition that it was the design of the Author of the Bible to teach us this doctrine, what stronger language could have been selected? He has told us that their punishment will be "everlasting;" that the smoke of their torment will ascend "forever and ever." If you examine the written Confessions of the different churches who hold this doctrine, you will not find it expressed in any stronger language than is contained in the Bible itself. The strongest terms in which I find it written in the standards of the U. P. Church, are as follows:—"The wicked, who know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Jesus Christ, shall be cast into eternal torments, and be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." The greater part of this quotation is couched in Scripture language, as if it were unnecessary or impossible to express it in stronger terms. A doubt will not arise in the mind of any one as to the teaching of this Confession of Faith on the subject of future punishment. It is written with equal clearness within the lids of the sacred volume.

The punishment of the wicked will be indescribably awful. It is represented as a lake of fire and brimstone; everlasting fire; everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power; a place where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. The suffering inflicted by fire is most intense; no great, perhaps, as anything within the reach of our conception. Such language certainly teaches that the torments of hell are great. It is not probable that the sufferings of all will be alike. That there will be degrees of punishment, scarcely admits of a doubt. Some are much more guilty than others; the sins of some are committed under peculiarly aggravating circumstances; the opportunities of some are greater than others; and we know that where much is given, much will be required. Each one will receive according to the deeds done in the body. This principle could not be carried out, if the punishment of all the finally impenitent were the same.

The woes of the wicked may be increased in a future world, and especially of such as have labored to bring their fellow men under the influence of evil. The writings of Paine, Voltaire, and others are leading victims down to hell from time to time, and adding new poignancy to the sufferings already endured. Why the anxiety of the rich men of the Parable, about his five brethren, doubtless companions in crime, unless it be a consciousness that their presence in the world of woe would add new fuel to his torment?

But why pursue the subject farther? Why even attempt to portray the wailings of the lost? Their misery no human tongue can describe. In vain will they call upon the mountains to fall upon them, and the hills to cover them from the face of an angry God, and from the wrath of the Lamb. Truly Christians should work out their salvation with fear and trembling; they should strive to enter in at the strait gate, to secure the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls. They should be constant and in earnest, in seeking the conversion of the impenitent. Their time for labor is short, and hence whatever is done must be done quickly. Those who know not God, and obey not the Gospel of Christ, will be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

Impenitent and careless ones! take warning in time. There is a heaven to be gained and a hell to be avoided. Angels will rejoice over your rescue from the power of Satan, and your deliverance from the wrath to come. To-day, if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. Accept the offer of pardon, believe in Christ, repent of sin, and all will be well.

DR. BRECKINRIDGE ON THE WAR.

The December number of the Danville Review contains an able article on this subject from this eminently patriotic Kentuckian. We most heartily commend the views here presented to the consideration of every citizen. What he says of the character of the rebellion, is in strong contrast to the sentiments of such persons in the North, as have sought to palliate and excuse the conduct of those in arms against the Government:

THE MORAL CHARACTER OF THE REBELLION.

This rebellion begins in an outrage upon many of the clearest obligations of Natural Religion; loyalty, love of country, fidelity to public trusts, gratitude for honors bestowed, truth and manhood in the discharge of obligations voluntarily assumed, nay eagerly sought; how many of the leaders of this rebellion are free from the stain on their personal honor, of deliberately transgressing some, or all of those natural obligations, which no contingency under heaven can justify any one in violating! We speak not of the mere fact of treason, as defined by human laws. What we speak of is the perfidy, in every revolting form, which has marked this treason in its birth, in its growth, and in its present frantic struggle. Men seeking to overthrow monuments, cemented by the blood of their immediate ancestors! Men dishonoring names, illustrious through many generations! Men betraying their friends, their neighbors, their kindred. Men seducing children to take up arms against their parents—and then handing them with savages to desolate their own homes, with fire and sword. It is a madness—a fearful madness. No madness can be greater, except the madness that could induce this great nation to suppose that God allows it to let this go unpunished.

NO NEW TRUTHS TO BE DISCLOSED.

The service we are doing is not so much to disclose new truths as to make a clear statement of the grounds of a common and fixed conviction, which the public mind has widely and instinctively adopted. It is a conviction just in itself, and noble both in its origin and impulses. We will not agree to the ruin of our glorious country; and so we are not grieved to see that we cannot do it with any hope of peace thereby. We will not allow the Constitution to be subverted, the Union to be destroyed, and the nation to be divided; and so we are glad that in the order of God's providence, the alternative to which the nation is shut up—is victory. If the people in the States which have taken up arms against our national life, will rise up in their might, recover their liberty, and put an end to the traitorous dominion of the cruel and perfidious class minority, which is degrading and oppressing them; the nation has no further cause of war with them. If they will not do this, or if they cannot do it in their present miserable condition, it must be done for them—and it will be. The American people have not sought this war, they were led to the brink, not only of ruin, but of infamy, in the attempt to avoid it. The American people have neither approved nor participated in the injuries or the insults, inflicted on any portion of the nation, by any other portion of it; on the contrary their whole national history attests, that whatever factions or sections may have done or attempted, the nation has been faithful in its lot, and true to its sublime mission. And now, in this great crisis, if God will own our efforts, we will retrieve our destiny—and teach mankind a lesson which after ages will be slow to forget.

FINAL ISSUE.

It is more certain now than it was at first, that the conspirators have reason to dread, and that loyal persons may confidently rely on the resolute purpose of the American people to uphold the Union, the Constitution, and the laws; so that the assurance of unavoidable failure to the one, and of speedy and complete deliverance to the other, becomes day by day the nourishment of the reaction which is inevitable in its set time. That which is thus unavoidable, in the nature of the case as it exists, cannot be called in question by any one who confides in the capacity of mankind for self-government, by any one who knows that to deceive a people, and then betray them, and then oppress them, and then impoverish them, are crimes which no people ever forgive; by any one who understands that the indignation of mankind is relentless, in proportion as the sacrifices have been costly and bitter, which the folly of corrupt rulers forced them to make, to no end but ruin and ignominy; by any one who accepts the assurance of God that civil society is an ordinance from heaven, and is incompatible with the permanent reign of anarchy. Nor do the innumerable acts, which, in a thousand ways, reach us from the whole area covered by the usurped power of the Confederate Government, fail to confirm, in the public mind, the conviction already stated. On the one hand, there comes up a subdued but incessant wail of a loyal people groaning for deliverance; on the other, a fierce cry for blood and plunder, mixed with a wild clamor about cordial unanimity. The nation pities and heeds that wail of our brethren, and, by God's help, will make it audible throughout the earth, as a lesson to the conspirators.

CONCERNING SELF-GOVERNMENT.

ITS USES AND ABUSES.

It is a good thing to have self control. The wise man has said concerning it, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." It is more important to subdue the lusts and passions of the heart, than to take a city, or conquer a country. There is more moral courage required to subdue our stubborn wills, and go, in the spirit of meekness, and ask forgiveness of another for the fault we have done, than is required to charge with a regiment up to the cannon's mouth.

How often have we seen the leader of armies, led by their own lusts—and the conqueror of nations subdued by their own passions. History records but to one, the name, the conqueror of the world; and that is only comparatively; and whilst many others, actuated by a fire ambition, have sought for the same distinction, yet all have signally failed. But Jesus has said, "Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth." Whilst the pathway of the conqueror is marked by scenes of desolation, "the path of the just shall be as a shining light." Whilst positions of honor, and trust, and profit, and influence, are held in high estimation by the world, "The ornament of a meek and quiet spirit is, in the sight of God, of great price." It should be our emulation, therefore, to believe what the motto of each one should be, "Vincit, qui se vincit."

Another view of this subject is very worthy of consideration. *

THE BIRTH-DAY OF REV. RICHARD ALLEN.

We would recommend to the Superintendents of all our Sabbath Schools, teachers, and people, in order that the little folks may be instrumental in doing good, to give an exhibition on the birth-day of the sainted Allen, which will come on the 14th of February. We hope that every station and circuit, where there is a Sabbath School, will be encouraged to pursue this course. It will be a credit to the managers, children, and parents, as well as doing much for the sustaining of the organ of the church, which is in much need at the present time.

ACTIVITY.

The Rev. Henry Davis, of Union Church, in this city, deserves much credit for his perseverance and activity on behalf of the Christian Recorder, in disposing of papers and procuring subscribers. We hope that Brother Davis will have his Sabbath School children to give an exhibition on the day we have referred to in another part of this paper.

NOTICE.

We call special attention to the advertisement headed "Good News," under the head of Advertisements, in another column.

WHERE ARE BISHOPS PAYNE AND QUINN!

This question is asked us nearly every week, and we are seldom able to render an answer satisfactory. We really would be glad if our Bishops would keep us posted occasionally. Their arrangements could be made for the winter, spring, and summer. The Christian Recorder is a medium by which it can be done at no expense to them, but to great satisfaction to their friends.

LINDA.

This is the title of a new work put into our hands by the author, Mrs. Jacobs, of New York, a colored lady, who was born a slave in North Carolina, but managed so as to wend her way to the so-called Free States. It is a work of more than three hundred pages, giving a history of her life in slavedom, and the various transactions which came under her notice. We most cheerfully commend the work as worthy of perusal. She is in this city for a few days, and those who wish the book can procure it of her, at No. 107 North Fifth St.

NOTICE.

We understand that the Hon. Frederick Douglass will lecture in this city, at the National Hall, on Tuesday night, the 15th inst. Also Mr. Anderson, a young man of fine literary taste and ability, from Canada, will lecture in Rev. Joshua Woodlin's Church, (Bethel,) in Sixth St., Philadelphia. Subject: "The Christian Recorder," and literature in general.

P. S. The lecture will be on Thursday night, the 17th inst. After the lecture a collection will be taken up; one-half to be appropriated to the Christian Recorder, and the other half for the benefit of the speaker. We hope to see Bethel full.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE BORDENTOWN QUARTERLY MEETINGS.

Cookstown, first Sabbath in January, 1862; Bordentown, second Sabbath; Allentown, third Sabbath; Cranberry, fourth Sabbath. The Quarterly Conference of the Freehold Circuit, at Manalopin, February 1st, 1862, at 3 o'clock, P. M.

We joined, by holy matrimony, December 31st, Mr. John Washington to Miss Julia Blair, both of Allentown, N. J.; and, on January, the 1st, 1862, Mr. Philip Benson to Miss Cornelia Morris, both of Philadelphia, Pa. Our watch-meeting we held at Bordentown, having the assistance of Rev. W. J. Fuller, who preached an able sermon, while God walked among his golden candlesticks. From a previous engagement, we expected Rev. Caleb Woodyard in our midst on the occasion, but as, on the previous Sabbath, he severed himself from the A. M. E. Church, and joined the Baptist denomination, we suppose accounts for his absence.

In our last issue we find the following blunder committed by the printer:—At the head of the article "Religious Union," the words "For the Christian Recorder" are inserted, whereas they should have been omitted.

We call attention to the advertisement of our friend, Mr. William Still, in relation to the price of Lehigh coal, and hope that all will give him a call.

THE BETHEL CHURCH SABBATH SCHOOL.

We, for the first time, had the pleasure of being present last Sabbath to hear the Bethel School catechised up in the main audience room; and, to the great credit of those who were volunteers for the prizes, which Dr. Armstrong, a member of the Methodist Church, promised to give. There were seven who contended for the prize, and the number of verses committed by the highest scholar was over four hundred. Francis Seymour, the successful one, after the Doctor's remarks to him, replied as follows:—

DR. ARMSTRONG:—Respected Sir,—I return my sincere thanks to you for your kindness in rewarding me with this valuable prize, for recitation of Scriptural verses, it being no more than my indispensable duty.

Dear Sir:—This, your manifestation of interest for my improvement, will ever be remembered by me, let my future destiny be where it may. And this sacred volume I will ever appreciate.

After the pertinent remarks of the Doctor, little L. A. replied as follows:—

Sir:—I will also prize your valuable and precious gift, and will read its pages, and will endeavour to obey its precepts; and from it learn instruction and the road to heaven. I hope we shall both meet when time shall be no more.

REPLY OF ANNA M. FINER TO DR. ARMSTRONG, ON RECEIVING A BIBLE.

SIR:—I thank you for this valuable present. I shall read its pages and try to obey its precepts, hoping that they may do me good in time, and save me in eternity.

CLASS MEETINGS.

Perhaps there is no one wing of the Church (Methodist) to which so much importance may be attached as that of class meetings. It is one of the fundamental principles in Methodism. It is a source by which true believers may meet weekly together and speak freely of the hope they have in that rest which remains for all the faithful in Christ Jesus. The sainted Wesley, the founder of Methodism, saw the great advantages which he conceived would be to all those of this persuasion, if properly conducted.

We say class meeting, because it differs a little in form from that which is termed speaking meeting. Class meetings are arranged off in classes, and each are called upon individually by a leader to speak of what progress, if any, he or she has made since they last met. The course pursued by a speaker's meeting is about the same in substance, but differs a little from that of class meetings. Each one, with his own accord, if opportunity will admit of it, rises to his feet, and speaks as long as he may think it prudent of his or her desire and determination to go to heaven.

We love class meeting, because it was, and is, intended to assist each other to work out their salvation. We love them because they are to have leaders, and their duty is to see each person in his class once a week, at least, in order to inquire how their souls prosper. And, now, what is his duty next? 1. To advise; to give counsel to; to offer an opinion as worthy to be followed in God's name. 2. To reprove, blame, chide, rebuke, and correct, by showing such a one the folly of such a course, and the displeasure of the Almighty God. This is what is meant by reproving. 3. Comfort or exhort; to invigorate, to enliven, to cheer, to advise, or persuade. These three specified items devolve upon the class leaders heavy responsibility. O how important it is for class leaders to live near the throne of grace, in order that they may be prepared to give the members of their class wholesome instruction in the most solemn and impressive way that can be given. But a question arises here, whether class meetings are, in reality, conducted now, in this our day, as originally intended? We fear not in many instances. We wonder sometimes if some leaders do not think, when they are appointed to lead a class, that they are equal in every sense of the word to that of an elder? We shall leave this for you to answer in your own mind. O how much of the Holy Spirit is needed to properly lead class; nay, a mind after Jesus Christ, the man God!

We have been visiting some of the classes in Bethel Church; and, from the manner in which some address their class, a stranger would take it for granted that they were preachers, and that preaching was more essential than to advise, reprove, comfort, or exhort. We think that the more solemn and impressive a leader is, the more lasting will the exhortation be. We say this because we know, from experience, that the more weighty and solemn, the deeper root it takes. For instance, in protracted meetings, we have seen those little excitable hymns sung, the professing Christians would give vent to their feelings, and thus the poor penitent souls, who are seeking to find the blessed Jesus, are in a measure lost sight of, and the singing only excites the poor penitent, instead of making a weighty impression on their mind and heart. Hence the beauty of indoctrinating.

TRUE HAPPINESS.

There are many ways, through life, that men seek for what they call true happiness. Some seek it one way and some another. Some seek it around the card-table, others in the billiard room; some in the theatre, others in the drinking saloons; some in the ball-room, others in the social circle; some by their fireside. The latter is happiness, indeed, where there is that mutuality with the heads of that family. But alas! some accursed crime creeps in to mar their comfort and happiness, and the whole family is torn asunder. Some seek it in their wealth, but riches take to themselves wings and fly away. Others think, by living a strict moral life, there is happiness; they pay their just debts, and do to all men as they would have all men do to them, and they think they are now ready for death. Now the only happiness that man can boast of, is, in a crucified and now risen Saviour, who is ever making intercession for us at the right hand of his Father, that we may enjoy true felicity throughout the endless ages of eternity. Then seek for the gracious love of God. Make thyself acquainted with his precepts. Love the people of God. Seek their society. Love the house of God, then thou shalt have happiness when thou goest out and when thou comest in; when thou liest down and when thou risest up. E. M. FREEMAN.

NOTICE

A Quarterly Meeting will be held in the A. M. E. Union Church, on Coates Street, near Fifth St., on the 18th and 19th of this month. Preaching on Saturday evening; on Sabbath at 10, 3, and 7 o'clock; and love feast on Monday evening at 7 o'clock, on the 20th January, 1862.

HENRY DAVIS, Elder.

LETTER FROM BISHOP NAZREY.

To the members of the General Conference of 1860 of the A. M. E. Church in the United States of America:

I have, some weeks ago, brought to your notice a question, which is as important as it is grave, in relation to the treaty made, in 1856, between the A. M. E. Church in the United States, and the B. M. E. Church in Canada West, in their attempted separation, on account of which I have labored under many and grievous wrongs, and especially for the last few months. A personal knowledge of the legal ability of what composed the General Conference at Pittsburgh in 1860, has prompted me to look for a proposal of some plan by which a question, fraught with so much mischief, may be set at rest; but as it has not yet appeared, I am compelled to bring before you the important Christian duty devolving upon those with whom God has intrusted the legislative work of his Church and people. I am unwilling to believe, even from the long silence on the subject, that the majority of the members who composed the last General Conference of the A. M. E. Church, are willing to be parties to, or even witness the destruction, by their legislation, of the B. M. E. Church, which they justly acknowledge to be a part of the great family of Methodists. I, therefore, ask or request some person or persons, who desire the peace and future prosperity of these two Christian bodies, to offer some plan, either through the columns of the RECORDER, or to the Philadelphia or New England Annual Conferences, by which peace may be restored, and the Canadian Church be properly cared for in the enjoyment of her legal rights.

It is a truth, known to all who have noticed my past history as an itinerant minister during the last twenty-two years, that my policy has been to make, and endeavor to keep, peace in the Church of God. It has been said by some that if Bishop Nazrey would resign, the whole matter would be settled. Well, let us notice that question. Many of us are acquainted with the affliction through which Bishop Quinn past a few years since, and how it might or might not affect his mind with the increased labor, and the liability, with the rest of us, to the common diseases of mankind, is unknown; and also the feeble health of Bishop Payne. I say, that these things, considered with my past labors in, and love for the Church, forbids me to commit so rash an act, until the matter has been brought to the notice of those who are so deeply concerned. Again, if the rumor that I had separated myself from the Church, when I was doing the work I was sent to do, be true, what would it be to go off without a notice? Again, it is a violation of the express will of the General Conference, to resign in the interval.

W. NAZREY.

LETTER FROM BROTHER R. H. CAIN.

BRO. WEAVER: The events transpiring in this section, constrain me to pass the bounds hitherto marked out for myself, relative to obtruding my thoughts on the readers of the RECORDER. But the transactions of the past few weeks in these parts, demand that I should no longer hold my peace. The cause of human elevation, Christian reform, and intellectual improvement, has long demanded that there should be sacrifices made for the restoration of fallen humanity. Man, selfish man, has too long stood in the way of Christian light; he has too frequently interposed his own unjust claims, in matters which belonged to a universal brotherhood. The one idea class have long stood between the refulgent rays of the sun of righteousness, which sheds its benign light upon the world of mind, making it what it is destined to be by its beneficent Creator. But these interlopers must be gone; and liberal, high-minded souls must assume position, and truth; living, almighty truth, must have its legitimate place in the affairs of man's deliverance, from the bondage of ignorance and error. Humanity has struggled for ages for a complete emancipation from the slavery of priestcraft, and prejudicial domination; and it behooves all lovers of humanity, to bestir themselves to make good their calling, and demonstrate that mind is destined to soar above matter, and assimilate with its great Author, in a higher sphere.

We have had illustrations of these facts lately in our midst, which clearly indicate that there are advances making toward a better understanding of our true relations to each other, as fellow laborers, in the great work of moral, social, intellectual, and religious reform. A reunion of the members of the Shiloh Presbyterian Church in N. Y., was the occasion which practically illustrated what true intellectual greatness can do for its possessors. The company assembled—the character of the entertainment—the mode of conducting it—addresses delivered, and the general gathering of the clergy of all denominations—the complete unanimity of sentiment and feeling, which pervaded the gathering, crowned all; and low and grovelling must have been the mind that could not see that intelligence is as superior to ignorance, as the rays of the sun at high noon are to Egyptian darkness. Ministers should have no strife, but who can save the most souls, and who can best agree in doing good? Blessed are they, whom, when the Master cometh, shall be found so doing. The churches and schools begin to understand that, in union there is strength, not a mere union of material forms but a union of thought, a consonance of ideas. A combination of mental forces, which is the leaven that moves all material forms; and, consequently, gives moral force and real strength to all enterprises, which develope human genius and intellectual greatness.

Had a stranger directed his course toward Bridge St. chapel, on the night of the 10th of this month, and quietly taken his seat in that spacious edifice, at the hour of 8 o'clock, P. M., he might have been astonished and delighted with what his eyes did see. A company of Sabbath School scholars, all neat and clean, with smiling faces and bright eyes, would have greeted his gaze.

A large, respectable congregation had assembled to listen to the sweet singing of the scholars, who were about to repeat a concert which they had formerly given, with great satisfaction to all. After prayer, by the pastor, Miss Victoria Price began the exercises by throwing the magic wand over the piano, compelling it to give forth the Star-Spangled Banner, in the sweetest symphony, to the delight of the audience; in fact, it seemed to inspire the little urchins so, that they came forth with renewed confidence to perform their various parts.

Mr. Robert Hamilton, the vocalist, of Brooklyn, was in his place as the director of the music, and I assure you it was well done. The children acquitted themselves well, both in singing and speaking; it was a complete success on their part, and the superintendent and teachers may well be proud of the effort, and the parents should be encouraged to renew their efforts to induce their children to be more diligent in their attendance in the school. If the sweet music which these children, by a few weeks' training produced, is an exhibition of what the human voice can be made to perform in a state so imperfect as this, what might not be accomplished by right kind of training, in all the departments of human relations? The investigating mind could not but muse, as it listened to those girls and boys, as they thus gave proof of their immortality, and capabilities for chanting the praises of the great Eternal. If there are such wonderful effects produced upon us as was evidently experienced by that eager and attentive multitude of people, of the various shades of mind who witnessed this exhibition, surely, when these same spirits, disenthralled, and free from the material form which hinders the immortal soul from giving full flow to the lofty strains of harmonious sound of which it is capable—when they shall be fully developed, and removed to a higher sphere in the realms of light, then they should be attuned in harmony with that divine nature, while in this preparatory state.

The Sabbath School cause is gaining interest in these parts, and we may hope for much in the future from this department of our labors. There is a hopeful prospect that the youth will be gathering into the school, and a healthful influence will be exerted in the community. Our school now numbers seventy scholars, and is on the increase. When the present pastor entered upon his labors, it numbered about twenty. It has required much labor to raise it to its present numbers: the children have been encouraged by a Christmas present, given to them by the Sabbath School Association, which has been formed for the purpose of looking after its interests, by devising means, and elaborating measures for the advancement of so noble an enterprise. Christmas night was a pleasant, happy one to children, and parents, and the friends of improvement. At the hour of 7½, the children met in the basement, all neat and tidy, for the purpose of forming in procession and marching up stairs, to listen to remarks from several clergy of this city, on the improvement of the mind, and the interests of the rising generation. Two beautiful Christmas trees, tastefully trimmed, and laden with a selection of choice books and other articles, as Christmas presents for the scholars, graced the stand. At 8 o'clock, the exercises began by prayer, by Rev. Mr. Gloucester, present pastor of Shiloh Church, (Presbyterian,) N. Y. Then the pastor announced that he was pleased to inform the audience, that there were so many friends of the cause of moral, social, and religious improvement present, who would participate in the exercises of the meeting. Rev. Mr. Thompson, of the M. E. Church was introduced, and sung one of those soul-stirring hymns, peculiar to the warm-hearted Christian; and then, in an interesting strain, poured forth truths, which all seemed to feel the force of, directing the minds of the children to that Saviour, who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." His remarks were received with marked attention by the large audience which had assembled on the occasion.

The children, (bless them,) then sang a sweet hymn, led by one of their own members with life and vigor. Then Rev. Charles Thompson, of Siloam (Methodist) Church, addressed the school and parents, with marked effect. They who have heard his clear, distinct voice, while setting forth truth, may well feel that it is not a loss of time to listen to his elucidations. Grasping his subject with a master hand, or I should say with a master mind, he always puts the blows in the right place. He showed the necessity of a proper training of the mind, that it might be prepared to fill its high mission. A theme befitting a mind like his own, who has made much sacrifice to cultivate it for usefulness.

Rev. Dr. Leroy, followed—an old and tried friend of the despised and down-trodden of this land—one who has long stood and plead for desponding humanity—his remarks were received with much pleasure by the children and friends. He was happy, in his anecdotes, which pleased and delighted the little ones. Rev. Gloucester then arose and cast light over the audience with his strong and logical truths, which every unbiassed mind could not but recognise. Always at home when advocating reforms and education, he was peculiarly so on this occasion.

Professor Wilson, of Ethiopic fame, was truly in one of his most happy moods, as he made the closing address of the evening. He came forward, and delighted every one by bringing forth the importance of educating and improving the condition of the rising generation, the hope of the young man in the future. The events transpiring in the land, and the prospect of an abundant harvest in the fields of thought, he closed amid the applause of the congregation; then came the distribution of the gifts for the Sabbath School scholars, which made their lovely faces shine, and eyes sparkle. The meeting closed with a general good feeling, and all were repaid for our gathering together on the occasion. The work goes on, and still there is room for more. Let the church of Christ continue her labors for the good of all her members, not forgetting the dear little children, the lambs of the flock. R. H. CAIN.

A CARD.

On the 18th ult., the Executive Committee having the Superintendence of the A. M. E. Book Concern, assembled in Bethel Church, Sixth Street, in obedience to the call of the General Book Steward.

And whereas, the General Book Steward informed said Committee, that the change effected in the editorial department of said Book Concern, i. e., in separating the Editor and General Book Steward, had been, and still continues to be, detrimental to the financial interests of the Christian Recorder; causing many who believed as he did, i. e., that the duties of the Editor and General Book Steward should be combined in the person of one, to cease their subscription for the paper.

And whereas, it is an acknowledged principle in science, "That every effect has a cause," and vice versa, "every cause an effect," consequently if the cause is removed, the effect must cease.

I, therefore, for the future welfare of this much needed organ in our Church, and with the best of feeling toward those with whom I have been associated, do hereby signify my withdrawal from the editorial department of the A. M. E. Book Concern; and announce, that from the above date I am not responsible for the matter which may appear in the columns of the Christian Recorder.

A. I. STAMFORD.

OUR "SAY."

MR. EDITOR:—If 'coming events cast their shadows before,' then the present generation will mark a new era in the history of that anciently honorable, but now despised and oppressed race, the African nation. This thought forced itself upon my mind while perusing that interesting article which appeared in the 'Anglo' of December 14th, headed 'hints and queries.' The author is, evidently, a thinking man, and comprehends the true interests of the human brotherhood.

As no race, class or condition of men, ever attain to eminence and distinction until they take the work of improvement and self-elevation into their own hands; so also they must be united in a clear and well-defined principle of action, that their intelligence, wisdom, and discernment may be apparent to all. Then will their 'say' be heard, and their rights respected—first, because they respect themselves, and in that they also respect others; second, because they give the most convincing proof that they are worthy of such respect. For there is an intuitive perception in most men which leads them to acknowledge and respect the rights of those who give proof of their ability to vindicate and maintain them.

My mind was forcibly impressed with the writer's sound logic, and the importance of his closing sentences, the last of which allow me to quote:

'The British Government also recognised this 'say' of ours, when it sealed up Abbeokuta by seizing upon Lagos. Some among us think it is about time that we should initiate this 'say,' by a combined expression of opinion emanating from our Northern States, in the form of a 'say' which shall find an echo in the West Indies, and on the African coast. Dr. Delany is of this opinion, and is it worth thinking about—'say?'

Yes, it is worth 'thinking about.' Let the 'combined expression of opinion' come forth, accompanied with, and sustained by the convincing proof of sincerity and ability, viz., ACTION.

When I see such men as Dr. Delany, who I consider has really done more for Africa than any other live man, as his 'report' and lectures show, with Dr. James McCune Smith, the Rev. H. H. Garnet, Rev. W. J. Alston, Rev. R. H. Cain, and a host of other intelligent and far-seeing men, working, 'shoulder to shoulder,' for the establishment of a great and fundamental principle of action, I entertain the strongest hope that their 'say' will be received with becoming deference. Nay, more, it will inscribe on the page of history a monument that will endure when the temples and monuments of art have fallen in dust. Unborn millions will celebrate the event in songs of joy, and bless the day of freedom's birth.

The finest continent possessed by man, rich in all the varied productions of earth, peopled by an ancient and noble race of two hundred millions; and her exiled children are to be redeemed, and neither the paw of the British Lion, nor clutches of the American Eagle shall hold them as prey any more. This is the work of the people. Let them put their "hands to the plough," and not "look back," till it is accomplished.

MR. EDITOR:—Blind men always think every man is blind, because they cannot see. So with that learned writer, Mr. "OBSERVER." He says in his last article that I attempted to make Bp. Nazrey responsible for what the Canadians said or did, when such is not the case. He further says, "The Bishop plainly shows all who are willing to be convinced that he claimed the right at the General Conference of 1860 to exercise his own will in going either with the A. M. E. Church or the B. M. E. Church." I ask Mr. OBSERVER why did not Bishop Nazrey tell the Episcopal Committee so? If he had, it would have been settled in five minutes—but, on the contrary, to a question put to him by one of the Committee, he said, (putting his hand in his pocket,) "Here I am, ready to go now;" and then, to another of the Committee, he said, "I am with you as formerly."

Mr. OBSERVER says, "The exercise of a man's own will is the legal right; but the General Conference, by a vote, denied him that right." I ask, Is that so? Did the General Conference deny to Bishop Nazrey the right to remain in Canada if he should have desired to do so? We answer, No! If he had told the General Conference that he desired to stay there, they would not have requested him to resign; and a majority of the Committee who recommended his resignation did not believe he would accept of it. It was only out of respect to him, not wishing to show any design upon their part to get rid of him.

The General Conference only requested him to resign whatever relation he sustained to the B. M. E. Church, (that of General Superintendent.) He was not compelled to do it, for it was only a request. He could then have said where he desired to go.

Mr. OBSERVER says that Bishop Nazrey yielded for the time being—that is to say, while the General Conference was in session in Pittsburgh—but when he got home to Canada and met the General Conference there, he no longer yielded—for the time being was past, and there was then nothing to yield.

This is what is called by Mr. OBSERVER truth, nothing more nor less. I do not think he intended to admit this; for, if he did, he places Bishop Nazrey in a very unfavorable light, for if the Bishop only yielded to a vote of the General Conference for the time being—that is to say, while the General Conference was in session, or for the present time, for that is the meaning of the phrase, for the time being—then he only yielded to satisfy the General Conference, and did not intend to do it.

The learned Mr. OBSERVER is not a good lawyer, for he admits the guilt of his client, which is, in law, equivalent to his having pleaded guilty.

He next refers to the Convention of 1816, and the powers granted to the General Conference. We say the General Conference of 1856 did not revoke or change our articles of religion, nor did they establish any new standard of doctrine, or destroy the Episcopacy. Mr. OBSERVER lays great stress upon the right of the General Conference to give away a Bishop, and yet he admits that it was a Bishop's right to go where he pleases. Oh, what consistency! The creator dare not say what the creature shall do; yet the creature has power to say to the creator, I'll go where I please. If this is what Mr. OBSERVER calls truth, nothing more nor less, he certainly has been to some other place than the feet of Gamaliel.

Mr. OBSERVER is so very learned that he thinks I have committed a great error when I say that the same General Conference that elected Bishop Nazrey said he might go to Canada, and to show my great error he tells you that New York is nine hundred miles from Cincinnati, and that 1852 was four years before 1856. Mr. OBSERVER is certainly acquainted with Geography and Astronomy when he tells these wonderful things. Does not every man know that it was the same General Conference, and although one session was held in New York and the other in Cincinnati, one at one time and the other at any other, still it is the same General Conference? RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.

Rev. ELISHA WEAVER, EDITOR:—Respected Friend:—I have been much interested in the perusal of the 51st number of "the Christian Recorder," and desire for it a successful continuance, believing, that if properly conducted, it may prove an instrument of great good in a direction where profitable reading is much needed for the encouragement of improvement in all that tends to religious and moral elevation, to the development of those inward resources, which are the gift of God to every rational, intelligent being. As this shall be made the aim of those interested in preparing the food which is to be handed forth to us readers, we cannot doubt that the blessing of Heaven will rest upon their labors.

It is a day of great unsettlement and outward-looking in the religious world, wherein God is robbed of his honor, by the exercise of human reason and wisdom, and a dependence upon them for religious advancement, as well as upon outward ceremonies and mere human inventions and performances, such as leave the heart at ease in an unregenerate condition, under the belief that mere outward observances are all that are required in order to secure the Divine blessing and favor. But what saith their holy Author? "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." And what is this new birth but a change of heart and affections, wrought out by a faithful co-operation with the spirit of grace, "which hath appeared to all men, teaching that denying all ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world?"

This great change, whereby we are qualified for religious service here on earth, and prepared for a happy hereafter, is no less than the purging of our souls of all their evil desires and lusts, and raising in our hearts fervent breathings of spirit unto the Father and fountain of all grace and goodness for help and preservation, whereby we may be enabled to work out our soul's salvation with fear and trembling. And "prayer is the soul's sincere desire, unuttered or expressed." True, inward, spiritual prayer, is the gift of God, whereby the soul is strengthened and made alive unto Him; and it was with feelings of concern and sorrow, that I observed in the "Recorder" an apparent endeavor to exalt the outward means above the inward power of the spirit of prayer, by the exercise of which the windows of Heaven are opened, and a blessing poured out.

The work of true religion is essentially an inward work between the soul of man and his Creator, and outward observances and performances may or may not be the result and representatives thereof. We may preach, and pray, and perform what we may call worship, by the observance of times and ceremonies, and yet be utterly destitute of the mediating power and influence of the Holy Spirit, whereby "intercession is made for us in groanings which cannot be uttered." Christ is the only Mediator between God and man, and without Him, or his Spirit, we can do nothing; so that I have desired that none may waste their time and strength in the fruitless endeavor to perform works that shall meet with Divine acceptance, without the influence and aid of the Spirit of our holy Redeemer.

The same Divine power which opened the eyes of Saul, enabling him to see the error and wickedness of his course, and to turn from the evil way in which he was walking, is alone able to enlighten and qualify us for service in the church of Christ, in the power and authority of the gospel, of which Paul was made an able minister; and it is a great mistake to say that calls, conversions, illuminations of the mind, and similar exhibitions of Divine grace, do not now occur as in the case of Paul, or any other apostle. By what power and means were the eyes of Luther opened to see that "it is neither by wisdom, nor by arms that the renovations of the church will be accomplished, but by humble prayers, by a faith full of courage, that puts Christ on our side?" By what influence was he led to deny the Pope and acknowledge Christ, and to labor to establish the truth, that without Christ, we are nothing, and can do nothing?

Is not every conversion of the sinner, and the spiritual enlightenment of every heart, an exhibition of the work of the same grace which illuminated the great apostle of the Gentiles, and turned him from his wicked purposes, to become a follower and advocate of Christ? Surely the same God ruleth and reigneth now, that sent Christ into the world, and raised up the prophets and apostles to do his will, and he is still at work in the hearts of his people every where, enlightening their understandings and committing unto them his gifts, through Him whom He hath appointed and exalted to be a mediator between us and Him—through Him, who it is declared, hath ascended on high, receiving gifts for men; so that it seems to savour of a denial of the faith of the saints, to question the continuance of the workings of the same Spirit by which the apostles were inspired and led.

I make not these remarks from any feeling of unkindness, but rather in defence of what I believe to be gospel truth, and with a desire to encourage a simple and humble reliance upon the power and teachings of the Holy Spirit, which has ever been the strength and guide of all who have been redeemed from the world, and its delusive, destroying spirit. By this was Luther led to see and declare, "We can do nothing of ourselves. It is impossible for a man to be a Christian without having Christ, and to find peace, save in him, by despairing of (or denying) ourselves; or to attain to an understanding of Scripture either by study or by the intellect; but our first duty is to begin by prayer," to which he gives a very high place as the fruit and means of grace. "None can believe," said he, "how powerful prayer is, and what it is able to effect, but those who have learned it by experience. The upright prayer of a godly Christian is a strong hedge; it is a strong wall and fortress, and preserves the church;" but, said he, "Trust solely in God, and in the influence of his Spirit, and hope for nothing from your own labors, from your own understanding."

He distinguishes between what he calls "external and bodily prayer,"—the mere fruit of the lips, and "prayer in spirit and in truth," which, says he, "is the inward desire, the motions, the sighs which issue from the depths of the heart." "This," said he, "is a godly Christian's weapon, which no man knows or finds, but only he who has the spirit of grace and of prayer." And he defines the bread for which we are taught to pray thus, "Give us this day our daily bread," to be Jesus Christ, or the Holy Spirit, and not any outward food. "To believe," said he, "is none other than to eat this bread from heaven." "By the word Father," said he, "the bowels of the Lord are moved,"—that is, by prayer, in which we are qualified to call him Father, even the fruit of the Spirit of adoption, known only to those who are born again, and are thereby enabled to cry, "Abba, Father." To as many as receive Christ in his inward, spiritual appearance, to them is given "the power to become the sons of God."

So that I would have as more fully persuaded to regard the saving religion of the gospel as [illegible] inward work, depending more upon the spirit, prayer and worship, than upon any or all outward forms, which are but mere types and shadows of the true and living substance, leading to outward-looking and dependence. Baptism, saving baptism, is described by Paul as "not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience;" and by John as the work of fire and of the Holy Ghost, whereby the heart is cleansed and purified. This is the work of which the cleansing by water, under the law, was only the type of which the work of the Spirit is the reality. The true Christian baptism is the work of separating the precious from the vile, wrought by the word of God, which "is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword,"—by the Spirit of our holy Redeemer, who himself was made perfect through suffering, and queried with his disciples, "Are ye able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of, and to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" which no doubt was that of great suffering.

And the communion of the saints was thus described through the evangelist: "Behold, I stand at the door, and knock; if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." This spiritual communion is the true supper of the Lamb, unto which we are called, and of which all may partake without money and without price. This is the true marriage supper, unto which all, without respect of persons, are bidden, and in which all may participate, by having on the wedding garment of gospel purity and love, wherein they are engaged to wait upon the Lord, with the heart and mind turned unto him in humble aspiration for the blessing of health and preservation—for the visitations of his power and love, whereby the hearts of the humble are made to rejoice.

Religion, when divested of all Jewish and Popish rites and ceremonies, is a very simple thing, and should be thus represented to the seekers after truth. The way-faring man, though a fool as to this world's wisdom, need not err therein, for the grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all, teaching them what to do, and what to avoid, or leave undone; and by this grace are we saved and not of ourselves, lest we might boast. The teachings of the Holy Spirit or grace of God is sufficient for our direction; for we need not, saith the Scriptures, that any man should teach us, save as this anointing teacheth, which is truth and no lie.

Wherefore it seemeth meet that all should be directed to this inward teacher, which "teacheth as never man taught," and "cannot be removed into a corner," but must have the chief and uppermost place in our hearts, if we would be led aright. "God will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images;" he will not allow any flesh to glory in his presence, nor any mere human invention or representation, any mere creaturely wisdom or work, to receive the praise which is due to him alone, but his works, either in or through us, alone will praise and glorify Him who worketh in the hearts of the faithful, both to will and to do of his good pleasure; and this by the Spirit of his dear Son, by whom in these last days, he is speaking unto us, as the secret of our souls.

Please receive this somewhat lengthy epistle, as coming from one who desires to behold the prosperity and triumph of the simple truth, and the dependence upon empty forms and ceremonies come to an end, by the embrace of the substance, of which these were, before the coming of Christ, the types and shadows. With sincere regard and well-wishing, thy friend,

WM. P. BANGS.

GRAND LODGE—ELECTION OF THE OFFICERS.

At the annual commencement of the Grand Lodge, held on St. John's, the Evangelist, Day, at their Hall, South Eleventh St., below Pine St., the following named brethren, having been elected on December 2d, were duly installed, to wit:—

Brother James Needham, R. W. G. M.,
" Nathaniel L. Durham, R. W. S. G. W.,
" Frederick C. Revels, R. W. J. G. W.,
" Theodore Young, R. W. G. T.,
" Aaron P. Faucett, R. W. G. S.,
" Jonathan Davis, M. D., R. W. D. G. M.

After the installation, the R. W. G. M. was pleased to announce the following appointments:—

Brother Redmon Faucett as District Deputy Grand Master for the county of Montgomery.

Brother Joseph C. Bustill, of Harrisburg, for the counties of Dauphin, Lycoming, Lancaster, and Cumberland.

Brother John F. Williams, of Harrisburg, for the counties of Franklin, Adams, and Perry.

Brother John L. Griffith, of Lewistown, for the counties of Juniata, Mifflin, Centre, Blair, and Huntingdon.

Brother George T. Vashon, of Pittsburgh, for the counties of Allegheny, Westmoreland, Fayette, and Washington.

Grand Chaplains:—Brothers James Prisby, William Douglass, James Underdue, and William G. Cooper.

Brother Jonathan C. Miller, Grand Marshal.
Brother George Tingley, Grand Sword Bearer.
Brother Uriah Kelly, Grand Senior Deacon.
Brother James Harris, Grand Junior Deacon.
Brother J. C. Green, Senior Grand Steward.
Brother James T. Robinson, Junior Grand Steward.

English Fortifications for Shelling American Towns.—Within a few weeks past a corps of English engineers arrived at Windsor, in Canada West, opposite Detroit, and proceeded to lay out fortifications, bringing that city within range. The works have been commenced, and if continued, will be ready for mounting the guns in a short time. The fort is situated on an eminence, and completely commands the whole river front, and the principal business portion of Detroit.

This is a circumstance of some significance. It seems to be more than a general defensive structure which is proposed to be erected. It is a fortification built for the express purpose, if need be, of bombarding and destroying the city of Detroit.

The Nation's Hopes.—A force of half a million Unionists is about to be launched from various points upon the defences of slaveholding treason. As we wait in solemn earnestness, but in reverent trust the shock of the opposing hosts, let us calmly, considerately note the grounds of our conviction that the ultimate result must be favorable—that the national integrity and authority are to be vindicated and restored by the events of 1862. These grounds are briefly as follows:

I. The danger of surprise is past. The Federal Metropolis, which was to have been captured in May, remains unfisited by a hostile shot, and in no serious danger of changing masters, at the close of December. It might have been seized in April; it could have been successfully assaulted in July. Henceforth, its safety is almost if not quite beyond contingency.

II. We must have reached the bottom of our disasters by imminent treachery. The forts, armories, and arsenals, now held for the Union are held by loyal and true men. We may be worsted in battle; but we shall no more see regiment after regiment basely surrendered to the rebels by Confederate traitors, who eat the bread and wear the uniform of the nation. It must be that the traitors in responsible, influential positions have been nearly or quite weeded out of the national service. What ships, what ports remain to us, are held by men who will not betray their trust.

III. The nation at length is armed, or very nearly so. The treason of Floyd and his confederates in the Cabinet of Mr. Buchanan had nearly stripped the loyal States of arms, when the cannon of Sumter pealed the knell of war. We had neither field-artillery, nor small arms, nor camp equipage, nor munitions, at all adequate or suitable for the contest so suddenly forced upon us. We have now all these, with the fit men to put them to use. Henceforth, whatever reverses we may encounter will have some other cause than our lack of arms. If not now nearly ready for the strife, we never shall be.

IV. We have measured and tested the strength of our adversaries. They have had the advantage of a most extraordinary and unexpected triumph. The prestige of success, the moral advantage of a menacing attitude, have been theirs for months. They have been expecting and preparing to seize Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and advance into the free States; but they have never been able to cross the slave line in any force. The tidings of Bull Run—grossly magnifying the extent of the rebel triumph, called to their camps every one disposed to fight for their cause. They enlisted expecting to be rewarded in the plunder of Philadelphia and New York before this time; they find themselves still shivering behind their breast-works around and in front of Manassas, awaiting and expecting an attack from General McClellan, no longer even meditating an assault on his lines. The morale of the offensive is lost to them.

V. The nation has gained ground in the confidence and co-operation of the Border States. Maryland, by a great majority of her votes, has placed herself unequivocally on the side of the Union. Kentucky, by the results of two popular elections, and the action of her Legislature, has done likewise. Missouri is two-thirds held by Unionists to-day, and her legitimate government is strongly for the Union. We are more likely to regain Tennessee than to lose Kentucky. The signal triumph at Port Royal, establishing a Union force solidly in the heart of rebellious South Carolina, is felt as a stunning blow throughout Jeff. Davis' dominions. At Fort Pickens, the Union flag has been solidly upheld. The new position of our forces at Ship Island threatens the whole Gulf-coast of Louisiana and Alabama. Western Virginia is silently relinquished by the traitors, after months of desperate efforts to subjugate it. And though the gallant uprising of the Unionists of East Tennessee has probably been ruthlessly crushed, the spirit that impelled it still lives in thousands of loyal Southern hearts, and will soon find new and fairer opportunities for decisive manifestation.

VI. Finally, the nation is at length fully aroused. It has measured itself with its implacable enemy, and seen reason to distrust its ability to conquer him. It realizes that victory is the soul of the rebellion, and is ready to strike telling blows at the very lifenest of this flagitious treason. Everything indicates sharp, decisive work at hand. It seems hardly possible that Spring shall again have put forth her buds before we may assemble around our several altars to thank God, the Father of Mercies, that the backbone of this atrocious conspiracy against right, law, and liberty is broken. God grant it, and His be the glory evermore!

Numbers of Men Able to Bear Arms.—In the nineteen millions of the thoroughly loyal States and Territories, there are 3,800,000 fighting men. New York has 778,000; Pennsylvania, 581,000; Ohio, 468,000; Illinois, 342,000; Indiana, 270,000; Massachusetts, 246,000. All the rest fall below 200,000 each.

"If the Constitution cannot be maintained without meeting these scenes of commotion and contest, however unwelcome, they must come. We cannot, we must not, omit to do that which, in our judgment, the safety of the Union requires. Not regardless of consequences, we must yet meet consequences; seeing the hazards which surround the discharge of public duty, it must yet be discharged."—Daniel Webster.

"Dark as are the Clouds upon our sky, and long and anxiously as we have watched for the light to penetrate them, my faith in the ultimate triumph of the Government remains unshaken. If I did not believe that our beneficent and glorious institutions would survive the atrocious treason by which they are now so remorselessly assailed, I would pray for the mountains to cover me, and for the grave to open at my feet."—Holt, of Kentucky.

On the Right of Secession.—No man, no association of men, no State, or set of States, has a right to withdraw itself from this Union of its own accord. The same power which knit us together can unknit. The same formality which formed the links of the Union is necessary to dissolve it. The majority of States which forms the Union must consent to the withdrawal of any one branch of it. Until that consent has been obtained, any attempt to dissolve the Union, or obstruct the efficacy of the constitutional laws, is treason—treason to all intents and purposes. —Richmond Inquirer, Nov. 1, 1814.

Gratifying News from our Troops in the South.—Late advices from the South, via Richmond, give us the gratifying intelligence of the further advance of our troops into the rebel domain.

While a portion of General Sherman's command were landed on Edisto Island, off the coast of South Carolina, and from thence penetrated inland to an important station upon the line of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad, of which they took possession, a portion of General Butler's Division have crossed the Mississippi Sound from Ship Island and taken possession of Biloxi, one of the fashionable watering places upon the Gulf coast.

Edisto Island is about twenty-five miles south-east of Charleston.

It is a flat sea-island, upon which long staple cotton, rice and sugar, are grown. It is ten miles in length, and about five in width. The waters of the North and South Edisto rivers, flowing eastwardly through the main land, mingle their waters in the narrow strait between the latter and the island. Seaside of Edisto is Hutchinson's island.

Edisto is occupied by about a hundred plantations, and has, moreover, a collection of houses upon the coast, where many of the planters reside during the summer, when the interior is unhealthy.

Adams' Run Station, Colleton District, which is undoubtedly the point upon the Charleston and Savannah Railroad occupied by our troops, is twenty-three miles south of Charleston, and has a population of less than two hundred.

Advices from Hilton Head, dated the 30th ult., stated that preparations were then being made for an expedition to an unknown point, which was to leave on the following day.

The seizure of Adams' Run places the Union troops in possession of an invaluable strategetical position, as it effectually severs the railroad communication between Charleston and Savannah. The water communication between Hilton Head and Adams' Run is perfect, and practicable for vessels of light draught.

Biloxi is a small village in Harrison county, Mississippi, about ninety miles to the eastward of New Orleans. Within a short distance of Biloxi are Pass Christian, Mississippi City, and Pascagoula,—all places of summer resort for the citizens of Mobile and New Orleans.

The War in South Carolina.—[From the Charleston Courier, December 14th.]—Our enemies are powerful on the water. Our navy, in comparison with theirs, is absolutely contemptible. They have determined to make the most vigorous use of this advantage. Thus far, notwithstanding their loud boasts and terrible threats, they have done nothing with their frigates and gun-boats that has justified their confident promises and intemperate exultation. Their first naval expedition was a miserable abortion. The second, far more expensive and formidable than the one under command of the illustrious Butler, though partially successful in attaining some of the cherished objects for which it was raised, has reflected no glory on their cause. But their naval force will enable them to disturb and damage us on our long line of sea-coast without giving us the opportunity to repel them. As they care nothing for glory, but only care to destroy and plunder, this mode of warfare exactly suits their natures. They will land at weak points, make raids upon plantations, burn houses, and commit all manner of depredations and atrocities, and, their work accomplished, they will hasten back to the protection of their vessels.

Fortress Monroe—Treatment of the Prisoners at Richmond.—The prisoners confirm all heretofore said concerning their hard treatment, and their stories only add to the barbarous doings and history of the pseudo-Southern Confederacy.

Reaction in the South—The Army Dissatisfied.—We learn from many of the prisoners the pleasing intelligence that there is a great reaction at present going on in the South in favor of the Federal Union, that Jeff. Davis and the Confederate Southern Army are both getting unpopular, and that there is a vast number of Union men in Richmond and the South who would gladly throw out the Stars and Stripes if they dared to do it.

The Southerners are very much vexed at present with the anticipation that their troops will refuse to re-enlist in the Spring, and that McClellan will have nothing to do but march into the South and re-establish Yankee supremacy. The term of enlistment of the entire Southern army expires in the Spring, and the desire of the men to re-enlist is about as strong as Philadelphia milk.

The Richmond papers, for some time past, have amused themselves by gloating over the prospects of a war between England and the United States, but the leaders of the rebellion, as well as the editors, are now biting their thumbs in despair since they have heard that Mason and Slidell have been given up. Many Southerners openly acknowledge that their cause and their Confederacy are in a wretched state.

Military Affairs in Richmond.—There are but about six hundred men in Richmond at present. All of the soldiers who have arms have been sent away—some to Yorktown, some to Manassas, and some West and South.

The guard around Richmond is worked to death. The six hundred have no relief but among themselves, and not half of them have arms, so that when new guard relief is sent upon duty, the men have to take those of the guards who are relieved, which certainly is a very unmilitary system of guard-mounting.

The Care of the Prisoners.—The care of the prisoners was left to persons picked from among their number, who were released on their parole of honor, and allowed to travel around the city, and get what they could from private citizens for the feeding of the prisoners.

Incendiarism.—There has been a fire almost every night in the towns of the South for some weeks past, and the people are very much terrified with a rumor that the South was full of Union incendiaries, and who are bent upon destroying every city, town and village of the South.

Negro Insubordination.—The slaves have been and are still most unruly, and large numbers have been shot, and hung, for insubordination.

Fears of a Federal Attack.—The rebels firmly believe that General Wool will take Yorktown this week, and that Burnside's Expedition is about to sail up the James River to make an attack, in conjunction with General Wool's forces, upon Norfolk in the rear, and after taking that place make a grand advance upon Richmond from all points.

Great Bethel Deserted—Advance of General Weber.—This morning General Weber, acting upon information received by a contraband on Sunday last, to the effect that a stampede of the rebels had taken place from Great Bethel, on Saturday last, proceeded to Hampton with about two thousand men, and thence across the Newmarket Bridge, as far as Great Bethel. He found the entire region vacated by the rebels, who had left for Yorktown, fearing an advance of our forces.

After making an extensive and useful reconnoissance, resting his troops and securing a considerable amount of forage, General Weber returned, without a casualty among his men, to his camp, this evening.

Praying for the Federal Government.—Many of the best people in the Valley of Virginia are united together in a covenant to pray every day for the success of the Federal Government. Brother Lambert and five brethren, ever since the 17th of July last, have been praying, at a set time each day, for the overthrow of treason and the triumph of the Federal cause. And they have persevered in this for months together, when not a ray of hope illumined the horizon. All the papers which they could read spoke only of the disasters and the villany of the Union cause; but, hoping against hope, they have not ceased to pray. For two or three weeks past the light has been breaking in a little. The secessionists in Virginia are becoming disheartened, and the faces of the Union men are beginning to brighten up a little.—Religious Telescope.

Important from Point of Rocks—Attack of the Rebels—The Federal Troops Retire—The Railroad and Telegraph Destroyed—An Artillery Fight.—Point of Rocks, January 5th.—Six thousand rebels attacked the Fifth Connecticut Regiment, near Hancock, yesterday, while protecting the railroad. After a slight skirmish, our men retired to this side of the Potomac to await reinforcements.

Meanwhile the rebels destroyed the railroad and telegraph lines, breaking our communication with Cumberland.

General Lardner is marching to the relief of the Fifth Regiment with a sufficient force. The loss on either side is unknown, but is believed to be trifling.

The rebels have been shelling our position at intervals all day. Our artillery has responded. The rebel shells did no mischief.

Destruction of the Richmond Theatre and other Buildings by Fire—Great Loss of Property.—The performance given at the Richmond Theatre on Wednesday night was destined, as subsequent events have proved, to be the last ever given in that "Temple of the Muses."

At 4 o'clock yesterday morning, just as the bell announced the hour, the theatre was discovered to be on fire in sundry places, and hardly before the astonished members of the Fire Brigade could draw a long breath, the flames burst forth from the building, casting a lurid glare over the sky, illuminating the whole.

Up to a very late hour on Wednesday night, as we learn, there were no traces of fire in the building, and as it burst out, when it did make its appearance, from every conceivable spot, and burnt, from the combustible nature of the building, with the rapidity of thought, the inference is that the author of the mischief knew his business, and performed it with a master's hand. In two hours' time nothing but the fragments of two of the massive walls of the theatre remained to tell the passer what it once was. We have seldom seen the "fire god" more energetic in the performance of his duties. If anything was saved, we did not learn the fact, and therefore suppose that, not only the building, but all of its adjuncts, in the way of scenery, decorations, wardrobe, manuscripts, old plays, costly furniture and pictures, went also by the board.

The Upper Potomac.—A gentleman arrived here this morning from Harper's Ferry. He says that the rebels are evidently concentrating a heavy force along the line of the Upper Potomac. It is believed that they have a force of twenty thousand at Leesburg.

Rev. Dr. Van Ingen, of St. Pauls', Minnesota, has accepted of the chaplaincy of Col. Curtis' Regiment, at Rochester, Minn.

Rev. Charles Woodward, of Rochester, has been elected chaplain of the 3d Regiment Minnesota Volunteers.

Ministers and Soldiers.—There are six Methodist preachers in the fifty-seventh Indiana Regiment. The Colonel is Rev. J. W. T. McMullin; Lieutenant-Colonel, Rev. F. A. Hardin, of the North Indiana Conference. Captain Bradford, and Rev. Messrs. Black, Hoback, and Charles Disbro, are also members of the same Conference.

Rev. J. C. Cromack, Chaplain to the Massachusetts Twenty-second, writes as follows to Zion's Herald: "Our social religious meetings are most profoundly interesting. Since my return from Massachusetts three hopeful conversions had occurred, and previously we had one anxious inquirer and one backslider reclaimed. Christians of all denominations are much encouraged and take hold cheerfully to sustain the meetings. I hope the churches at home will continue to pray for the soldiers."

A Soldier's Feeling.—A chaplain reported to the Fulton Street prayer meeting, a conversation he had held with a soldier in the regiment, which concludes as follows:—"Chaplain, I have been very thoughtless and wicked since I came into camp, but I am going to quit it. I will break off my wicked ways. My mother shall not pray in vain for me. I have got something to do about it." "And what are you going to do?" "Seek the Lord and be a better man." I know my mother prays for me. When you told us what kind of prayers you heard offered for us poor wicked soldiers, it seemed like a cannon-shot through my heart. I am going to seek the Lord and become a praying man."

Deaconesses.—In some quarters in this country there has been manifested quite a disposition to revive the office of Deaconesses. The design seems more specially to secure proper attention to the sick. The German Reformed Messenger gives the following particulars:

The care of the sick, which commenced in 1836, in a house at Kaiserwerth, with one sick person, by one deaconess, is now attended to in fifty-three hospitals, extending from Alexandria and Jerusalem to Pittsburgh, in North America, by deaconesses from Kaiserwerth Institute. Twenty-nine deaconesses, set apart to the work by the Church authorities, have been laboring for the relief of the poor and starving families which attach to our city like a cancerous affection. Besides these, a number have been entirely engaged at poor-houses, institutions for the blind, and female asylums, one of the latter of which at Berlin has, during the seven years of its existence, furnished shelter for over two thousand females. The care of the imprisoned was commenced already in 1833, before the founding of the Deaconess Institute by the asylum in Kaiserwerth for discharged female prisoners and reclaimed females, and is now carried forward abroad in prisons by deaconesses. The nurture, education, and instruction of children is attended to by deaconess-teachers, of whom there are sixty connected with the Institute, in schools, orphan houses, and seminaries, and also by more than nine hundred teachers and governesses, who have been educated in the Seminary at Kaiserwerth since 1836. The special success with which the Lord has crowned the work at Kaiserwerth, remarked the reporter, cannot fail to awaken to all who have been engaged in it, feelings of the deepest humility and gratitude. Still, it is to be admitted that the work was often carried forward in the midst of great difficulties, especially of a pecuniary nature.

Foreign.

The amount of TRAVEL abroad may be understood in some degree from the fact that during the usual travelling season of the past year, nine thousand persons visited Chamounix, the highest peak of the Alps, in Switzerland. Among these there were four thousand one hundred and sixty-nine from England and the United States, one thousand nine hundred and eighty-three from France, seven hundred and twelve from Germany, and three hundred and fifty-six from Russia.

A case of State interference with the rights of conscience has just occurred in England. A Mr. Charles Winkworth, a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and a laborer in the employment of a farmer at Beedon, refused to attend the Established Church as Mr. King, his employer, wished. This refusal was founded, as he said, upon conscientious objections to that Church; but on his persisting in it, he was arrested, tried before a bench of eight magistrates at Newberry, Berks, and fined five shillings, together with four shillings and sixpence, also, for costs. The case is exciting much attention. The dissenting portion of the community are taking it up, and meetings of much interest are being held in regard to it. Surely, the time is passed in Great Britain when a man is to be forced to attend a church contrary to his clear and determined conviction of duty.

The DEBT of England is enormous. At present it is about four thousand million of dollars—the interest of which (at as low a rate as 3½ per cent.) is about one hundred and thirty-four million three hundred thousand dollars per year, or three hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars a day, fifteen thousand three hundred and thirty-three dollars an hour, two hundred and fifty-five dollars a minute, or four dollars and twenty-four cents a second. Truly, such a debt must be a heavy burden. It began more especially as early as in the reign of Charles the Second, about two hundred years ago. About a hundred years later, in 1763, it was about six hundred and ninety-five millions of dollars. In 1802 it had become two thousand eight hundred and fifty-five millions of dollars. In 1856, at the close of the Russian war, it was about $4,000,000,000, which is about the amount at the present time. This would seem to most people a doubtful capital upon which a new and expensive war should be commenced.

A CONFERENCE of great interest has been recently held by prominent ministers of the Free Church of Scotland on the subject of Missions. The meeting was convened in Edinburgh, and Rev. Dr. Tweedie presided. It mainly considered the Missions of the Free Church in India, and especially the question as to whether a sufficient prominence had been given to the matter of preaching the gospel in India. Much has been done for Schools. Dr. Duff's efforts had been powerfully put forth at Calcutta to train up the young mind in the knowledge of the truth, but it was feared by the Conference that a sufficient reliance is not being placed upon simple preaching. And, therefore, while no resolutions were adopted and no discouragement was given to schools as now existing, it seemed to be the spirit of the meeting that more and more must be done to have the gospel preached. The proceedings are of a deeply interesting and important character, and occupy no less than fourteen columns of the Edinburgh Witness.

Scotland does honor, though sometimes slowly, to its noble men. An instance is lately seen in the placing of a tablet to the memory of THOMAS BOSTON, on the wall of the house in Duns where he was born. As a laborious pastor and faithful preacher, and especially as the author of such works as "The Fourfold State," "The Crook in the Lot," &c., Boston has a memory peculiarly precious in the hearts of thousands—both in the Old World and the New.

A somewhat unusual step has been proposed to be taken at the next General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland. It is to elect a layman to the Moderatorship. Usually, in all Presbyterian bodies, we believe, Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, and Assemblies, it is customary to give the presiding office to the Ministry—but in this case, as Murray Dunlop, Esq., member of Parliament, has rendered important services to the Church in various ways, it is urged this distinction should be conferred on him. Nothing of the kind has ever been done since the time when the memorable George Buchanan was made Moderator of the Church of Scotland. At present, however, it is finally concluded, we believe, to have Rev. Dr. Guthrie chosen.

PERRY & FITZGERALD'S
PROCESS FOR MAKING LIGHT, NUTRITIOUS, AND UNADULTERATED BREAD, WITHOUT FERMENTATION.
The new process of bread-making, patented by Perry & Fitzgerald, removes all the obstacles which have hitherto rendered it impossible to manufacture perfectly pure, sweet, and nutritious bread. The entire process is performed by mechanical means, and is eminently cleanly.
The process consists in mixing the flour in a closed vessel, and the application of pure carbonic acid, under pressure, by which the dough-room is made thoroughly light, and ready to be discharged into pans, for baking, in the brief space of fifteen or twenty minutes. The "change" is usually 200 pounds, and each machine completes the operation, in all its details, from the putting in of the flour to the discharging of the dough, in from twenty-five to forty minutes.
The Invention of Perry & Fitzgerald effects a revolution in the preparation of bread, by establishing a system of wholesale manufacture not subject to the vicissitudes and evils of fermentation, but exact and certain in its results:—1, because, by the substitution of mechanical for mental labor, and in the superior value of the article produced, it promises large profits upon the capital employed. 2. Because such employment of capital, as well as the protection afforded by the patent, gives adequate security against competition. But whilst preventing undue competition it produces none of the evils of a monopoly, because it leaves the consumer of all times in possession of his former means of supply, to be resorted to, should the monopoly become prejudicial.
The application of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, in a mechanically kneaded dough-room, on the plan invented by Perry & Fitzgerald, did not occur to Dr. Dye; though he seems to have had a clear foreshadowing of the importance of the artificial use of the gas, since he states, hypothetically, that "if water, highly impregnated with carbonic acid gas, be used for kneading the dough, the resulting bread will be somewhat spongy. Could a light article," he continues, "be produced in this way, then, as the sugar would remain undecomposed, the bread would be no much the sweeter and more nourishing."
What, to Dr. Dye, was evidently a merely comprehended chemical truth, has been practically developed by the brilliant invention of Perry & Fitzgerald. Posterity will hold their names in grateful remembrance, as among the most eminent benefactors of mankind.
ITS SUPERIORITY.—The superiority of unfermented bread is by no means new. Dr. Cullen, who wrote more than seventy years ago, says:—
"In Scotland, also (unlike to the lower class of people, and that is the greater part of the whole), live upon unfermented bread, and unfermented farinaceous in other forms, and there are not a more healthy people anywhere to be found. In the course of fifty years, that I have practised among them, I have had occasion to know this, and have hardly met with a disease, of any consequence, that I could impute to the use of unfermented farinacea."
At a later period, Professor Thompson, of Glasgow, in his work on the "Food of Animals," after alluding to the facts referred to above by Dr. Cullen, and other kindred facts, observes:—
"Such, then, being sufficient evidence in favor of the wholesomeness of unfermented bread, it becomes important to discover in what respects it differs from fermented bread. The result gained by this process (fermentation) may be considered to be merely the expansion of the particles of which the loaf is composed, so as to render the mass more readily divisible by the preparatory organs of digestion. But, as this object is gained at a sacrifice of the NUTRIMENT OF THE FLOUR, it becomes a matter of interest to ascertain the amount of the loss sustained in the process."
The result of Professor Thompson's experiments showed a difference in favor of unfermented bread of nearly seven per cent. over that made by the ordinary process. In other words, there was a loss of near one-fifteenth of the nutritive properties of the flour, which, by the process of fermentation, was driven into the air and lost.
We common to a more particular consideration of the superiority of the Bread made without fermentation, or the use of chemical agents over the Bread made by those processes. Although, from what has already been said, this superiority appears in most vivid contrast, yet the public will be better satisfied to have the points stated specifically; for it only needs that the advantages secured by this method be clearly understood in order to its universal introduction in the manufactures of Bread.
I. ITS CLEANLINESS.—Instead of the dough being mixed by the naked hands or feet the bread, from the putting of the flour to the completion of the baking, is cut, and scarcely can be touched by any one. "One deficiency attached to its manufacture," says Dr. Willard Parker, "is its entire cleanliness." Says Dr. Waterbury: "The process is not only purely scientific, but pre-eminently cleanly."
II. ITS PRESERVATION OF ALL THE NUTRITIVE PROPERTIES OF THE FLOUR.—As the raising of the dough is by the mechanical introduction of pure carbonic acid gas, under pressure, in a closed vessel or receiver, it takes a perfect vulcanizer or spongy texture. All the constituents of the flour remain wholly unchanged, while the process of raising bread by fermentation inevitably sacrifices some of them, as has been already shown.
III. ITS UNIFORM CHARACTER.—Bread made by the New Process is uniformly light, sweet, and nutritious. The conditions being simple, and not liable to variation, no failure can occur in always producing bread of the same quality. It retains its moisture much longer than fermented bread, and may be eaten warm with impunity. The process also hastens a perfect freedom from all acidity, even in the hottest weather. Says the London Times:—
"The objectionable consequences of fermentation being avoided, the constituents of the flour are left both unchanged and unmodified, and the resulting loaf being absolutely pure."
IV. ITS WHOLESOMENESS.—Being free from the deleterious substances which are the product of fermentation, or chemical reactions, by the old modes, the bread made by the New Process is easy of digestion, and agrees with the most delicate stomach. "Dyspepsia," says Dr. Coe, (late of the N. Y. Medical College) "will be inevitable, as they will be able to use it when the fermented manufactured bread has been found to have equally failed on an article of diet." Says the London Medical Times and Gazette:—
"Since the introduction of the new unfermented bread, there have already been received from members of the medical profession, who have recommended it in their practice as well as from non-professional persons, accounts of the really astonishing results that have followed its use in cases of deranged digestion and assimilation. Many persons have reported their recovery in health, after years of suffering and misery, by the simple use of the bread as a diet. Many cases have also been reported by medical men of position, in which certain distressing forms of dyspepsia, which had remained intractable under every kind of treatment, have yielded as if by magic, almost immediately after adopting the use of the unfermented bread.
"The beneficial effects of the new bread are attributable in two causes. The one to the absence of the peculiarly noxious ingredient to ordinary bread by the process of fermentation; and the other to the presence in the bread, unchanged, of those elements which are the essential agents of digestion and assimilation."
The most eminent members of the medical profession, both in Great Britain and in the United States, not only agree in the highest terms of the one with which it is clothed, and of its rich, nourishing qualities, but especially of its peculiar palatableness, and wonderful keeping properties. The absence of acidity and other strong flavors, which, in a greater or less degree, are characteristic of fermented bread, renders the new bread peculiarly delicate to the taste.
V. ITS ECONOMY AND ECONOMY.—By the use of mechanical means, instead of manual labor, a barrel of flour is converted into baked loaves in forty-five minutes; whereas, by the ordinary process, four or five hours are occupied in the formation of the "sponge," and a further time in kneading, raising, and baking the dough.
"The excellence of the consumption of bread," says a correspondent of the Journal of the Institute of Arts, "renders it an article peculiarly suitable to be prepared and supplied by a public company. And since the new process removes all the objections of manufacturers, and the expense of the machinery even a comparative monopoly, the supply of bread is placed at once in the same category with gas, water, or other articles of prime necessity."

VISIT
CLARK'

THE OLD SCHOOL-HOUSE ON THE CREEK.

(DAR ALT SCHULHAUS AN DER BRICK.)

[A free translation from the Pennsylvania German.]

To-day it is just twenty years
Since I sought Northern lands,
Now, living still, I come to seek
The quaint old school-house on the creek,
Near Arty's house that stands.

In hundred houses I have been,
Of marble, stone, or brick,
Yet of those mansions grand and tall,
I'd any day forget them all
For the school-house on the creek.

He who forsakes the good of home,
In peace I'd let him go;
Still, let me say, ere he sets forth,
It is all humbug in the North,
As he full soon will know.

To every corner I have been,
And traveled, well or sick,
But ne'er in any spot have found,
Such joy as caused my heart to bound,
In the school-house on the creek.

Sweet home-joys here I always found:
Now, as I stand and gaze,
Old scenes before my mem'ry wave—
Old forms arise as from the grave—
The ghosts of vanished days.

The stream plays by just as of old,
When I the blithely played;
And where you elder whistles the stream
The little fish still gladly gleam;
Time yet no change has made.

Still stands the white oak by the door,
And shades the old roof-tree;
The old grape-vine, too, still is green,
And look! the swallow's nest yet seen!
A strange thing seems to me.

Over the fields the swallows play
Their game of "Bat is base;"
From gable end, so quaint and old,
A house of straw and dirt behold!
That is a swallow's nest!

There lie the young birds very still,
In sleep all scattered round:
Wait till some worm the parent brings,
Then for their shrilly twitt'ring rings,
Till distance bears the sound.

Yes! all the scene is as it was
When here a boy I ranged,
Yet dearer things no more are here,
And all must change and disappear:
I too, myself have changed.

Like Ossian, by his desolate hall,
I watch the clouds flit by,
And half in joy, in sorrow half,
My tears come trickling, yet I laugh,
Your hearts can tell me why.

I used to go to this old school,
When but an urchin small;
There was the master on his stool,
There was his switch, and there his rule,
I seem to see them all.

The desks, the clothes-rings on the wall,
The school-room's ample bound,
And on this side the big girls sat,
The boys (but half so coy) on that—
See how they peep around.

The master's eye is on them now,
They'd better have a care;
That chap who writes the billets doux,
And he whose tricks the boys amuse,
And you lad laughing there!

For big and little, one and all,
Are 'neath one equal rule,
Which is most just, for who doth break
That canon must a licking take,
Or get turned out of school.

Inside, around the cozy stove,
Sit all the little chaps,
They study very hard, you see,
For who shall miss his A B C,
His care shall meet hard raps.

Uneasy are the benches high,
Which keep the feet from floor;
One's back feels often strained and sick,
In that old school-house on the creek,
And just about right sore.

Poor little souls, ah! there they sit;
Just think how ill at ease!
It is no wonder, I declare!
They learn so little, perched up there,
On forms so high as these.

With all the drawbacks, say how,
It was a first-rate school;
For pedagogue in vain you'd look
Like ours, he ciphered though the book,
And never skipped a rule.

Cross was he, yes! I can't deny,
He flogged us all around;
Yet he most equal rules observed:
Who felt the birch, the birch deserved
Completely!—I'll be bound.

At dinner time when school was out,
We felt "as good" just then,
And some the flying ball did chase,
While some amused them in the race,
And some played soldier men.

The big girls swept the school room out,
The boys hung round the spot,
Pretending but to help about;
But soon the master drove them out,
The rules allowed it not.

The girls did "Copenhagen" play
On yonder sod, so green,
But when the big girls crossed the ring,
Why, then, (it was a curious thing,)
The big boys, too, "pitched in."

Big boys did always big girls toy,
And small ones always woo.
How swiftly ran they up and down!
And this you may depend upon:
Who won did earnest kiss!

On Christmas was the right good time,
With memories gay 'tis blent;
When we did bar the master out,
From door and sill, with timber stout:
"Now master! gifts present!"

Thus did he struggle mightily,
By force to burst within,
But while he knocked, 'neath door so stout,
A written treaty we thrust out—
Sign this! we'll let you in!

Then cut the master launched his gifts,
With sheepish looks,—but he
Chestnuts and apples, and much more,
Spread out our joyous eyes before;
We swallowed them with glee.

Oh! where are now my school-mates all,
Who studied here of yore?
Ah! some have wandered far away,
With some did fickle fortune play,
And death took many more.

My heart is swelled with thankfulness,
Yet grief my voice makes thick,
Could weep o'er memories of the past:
And yet, a joy it brings at last,
This school-house on the creek.

Good bye! old school-house! echo's voice
"Good bye! Good bye!" calls back
Oh! school-house! school-house! must I go
And leave you standing lonely so,
You school-house on the creek?

Oh ye! who'll live when I am gone,
Yet once more hear me speak:
I beg, entreat you hear my prayer,
Oh! take forever kind good care
Of the school-house on the creek.

ZANZIBAR.—On the lowest portion of the Zanzibar coast is the mission established a few years ago by the devoted Pastor Harms, of Hermannsburg, Germany. The missionaries proper, of whom there are fifteen or twenty, are accompanied by about a hundred missionary colonists, men of deep piety, and trained expressly for this work, who have taken up land in the country, and serve their Master alike in the field, the family, and the house of God; and their influence on the natives has been very great, leading them to see and to desire to imitate the virtues of a Christian community, its industry and enterprise, and its integrity and God-fearing spirit. A mission-ship, owned by the church at Hermannsburg, plies regularly between the mission and their native country, bringing supplies and additional settlers, and carrying home the products of their toil.

TRAINING OF CHILDREN.

If we examine more closely what, at the present day, is called piety, in a special sense, our surprise at the poor success that attends the training of children will be greatly diminished. For it is particularly in this, that the difference between a Christianity, which consists merely in profession, and one which manifests itself in the power of example, is most apparent. If there be hypocrisy in the parent, much will certainly occur in the development of the child to condemn it. If the piety of the parent be unsound and sickly, which is the case with the prevailing religious tendencies of the age, by what, we may ask, can the malady be more certainly known, than by the morbid results of training? It must be openly confessed, that our austere ancestors laid a better foundation, even with their dry morality, than many of the pious-minded, in our day, with their verbose, religious sentimentalism, combined with absurd management and instability of character.

Hence we would say to every one who inquires concerning the principles and particular mode of the training of children, first be yourself that to which you would train others: be it with all your heart. If what you require of your children be in any way contradicted by your own conduct in secret, you need look for no success, no blessing; but, on the contrary, be assured, that your efforts in the training of children will prove abortive, and only reflect dishonor upon yourself. There are many parents who, without being religious themselves, would yet like to bring up their children in the ways of religion, like that class of statesmen who, whilst they regard religion as excellent thing for the people, allow a different rule of action for themselves. From parents and children of this description, nothing can be expected; they can only be pitied.

Before you assume the responsibility of training up others, be yourself, first of all, trained of God. This is the fundamental condition, and must be complied with, if your labors in behalf of your children are to be successful. And yet, nothing is more common than to meet with parents, who, whilst they are living in violation of the law of God, entertain the foolish and presumptuous expectation of raising obedient children. Ernest, the Pious, Duke of Goths, was wont to say: "A ruler who would have obedient subjects, should himself be obedient to God." But as there are rulers who expect loyalty from their subjects, whilst they themselves renounce allegiance to the King of kings, so also are there many fathers laboring under a similar delusion. But as that mode of governing undermines all obedience, loosens all ties, and is a certain means for preparing a people for revolution, so also is this mode of training nothing but a source of ever-increasing disorder. But this fundamental condition, so salutary in its effects on education, is not only disregarded in practice: it is frequently set aside even in theory. Machiavelli's system in politics is practically applied, by many, in pedagogical science.

It is unreasonable to expect our labors to be attended with moral success, as long as we do not ourselves render submission to the requirements of the moral law. For should children once entertain even only a suspicion as to our sincerity, all our admonitions, precepts, and disciplinary regulations will fail to produce the desired effect. Let no one presume it an easy thing to keep his own transgressions of the Divine commandments concealed from the knowledge of his children. They take many a look at that which transpires behind the scene, and though their reasoning powers may lack activity, they have an intuitive perception, that something is not right.

But such an attempt is not only foolish, it is also presumptuous. For, supposing it possible to guard the child against the evil influences of our inconsistent and deceptive conduct, what then? We have, indeed, succeeded in deceiving a child, but we have not succeeded in deceiving God. We presume to accomplish a moral master-piece, without having the author of all morality on our side. We act as if the fountain of blessing was not in God, but in ourselves. We labor, as if we could dispense with Him, who is alone able to influence the heart, and as if the moral law, by which he governs the moral world, had been surrendered to our keeping. We bid defiance to Him, and if we had intended to demolish the works of our own hands, we could not have taken a more effectual plan to do it.

Christ speaks of a man who built his house upon the sand. The building went up rapidly, and with ease; but when the floods came, and the winds blew, the house fell, and great was the fall of it. So it is with every one who hears his sayings without doing them." So also is it with him who undertakes the teaching of them to others, whilst he neglects to obey them himself. It is an easy and agreeable task to build up out of Christ's doctrines a beautiful system of knowledge, or to make a show of it before the world; but, on the day of trial, the fall comes suddenly; the entire fabric crumbling into pieces, to the disgrace and terror of its builder. No one should, therefore, permit himself to be deceived by the apparent success which seems to attend the pedagogical efforts of those, who endeavor to inculcate the principles of the Christian religion, without themselves obeying its precepts. The absence of piety in the teacher is the sandy foundation, which, though it may, perhaps, be concealed from human observation, will one day be brought to light by Him, from whom nothing can be concealed, and who will show wherein they have built.

He who is sincere will find, in all this, much to comfort and encourage him. A conscientious man might become greatly discouraged, in view of the manifold mistakes committed in the training of children. He inquires concerning the rules and regulations prescribed by pedagogical science, introducing him only more fully to what he is expected to perform, might cause him to distrust his own ability to exercise that care and watchfulness which may be necessary. The task imposed is so many-sided and so great, that parents are after all only able to train their children "according to their pleasure." Hebr. xii. 10. And whose condition will allow him to devote so much time and means to training? For most theories presuppose wealth and leisure, whilst many parents, who are deeply concerned for the welfare of their children, are neither wealthy nor independent.

In view of all this we are comforted and encouraged by the thought, that it is God, who trains by our instrumentality. This he will surely do, if we will only comply with this one fundamental condition, namely, permit ourselves to be taught of Him. He trains us by His providence. And to permit Him to do this, we must submit patiently to His severe dispensation, be grateful to Him for the good we enjoy, and bear willingly the burdens our domestic and other relations may lay upon us. Yea, more, we must permit Him to discipline our own hearts, and impart for us His consolations. We must listen to Him as often as His Spirit corrects us, either by His servants or His word. We must seek and hold fast the consolations of His grace, which are vouchsafed to us, either in the sanctuary or during the secret intercourse of our hearts with Him. This is meant by being trained of God. The wisdom which He displays in training up men is the most exalted and the only perfect. From Him alone can we learn how to do it aright. What human systems and books can communicate to us on the subject is very little. It lacks vitality. It is knowledge, but not wisdom. Wisdom is something that is ever present, something that accompanies him who is imbued with it wherever he goes, something that maintains a vigorous growth within him. It is action, even under new and trying circumstances; it can only come from above; it is only to be acquired in the school of the Spirit. Christ alone can change our pedagogical knowledge into wisdom. Whoever does not permit himself to be taught by Him, can be benefited, neither by any other educational system, nor by what we have written.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Literary Lady.—Did you ever see an old abbey?

Retired Tradesman.—O yes! There used to be one at Brighton who taught the Miss Browns to parly-voo.

Among the buildings that adorn London, no one is more worthy the visitor's attention than the Abbey Church of St. Peter, at Westminster. Without being able to allow the claims of the monks of former days, that their Church was originally consecrated by St Peter in person, and having nothing but dim tradition to connect the Abbey with the Christian Church which, in the seventh century, was standing on Thorney Island, and may have been called the Minster of the West, it is beyond controversy that an abbey was erected on the site by Edward the Confessor, eight hundred years ago, and that portions of that structure yet remain. The chief part of the building is somewhat less ancient, dating from the reign of Henry III., a little more than six hundred years since. But whoever the pious king to supply the requisite funds, the direction and care of the great work must be attributed to the mysterious guild of Freemasons, whose skill and taste have adorned all parts of Europe with, so-called, Gothic Abbeys and Cathedrals, dedicated to the service and glory of God.

Proceeding southward from the National Gallery, Nelson's Column, and the equestrian statue of King Charles, we pass the Horse Guards and Admiralty on our right hand, edifices of no architectural pretensions, and, on our left, the Banqueting House of Whitehall, a fine structure, in the Italian style, built by Inigo Jones, and in modern times repaired and restored. It was from one of the windows of this building that Charles I. stepped on to the scaffold where his earthly career was sadly closed. We come next to the Treasury Building, with its handsome modern front, adorned with columns and pilasters of, I think, the Corinthian order. We are now at the end of the celebrated Downing street, and here the street divides. Choosing the narrower division on the right, King street, we shall get one of the most picturesque views of the Abbey, especially of the beautiful Rose Window of the Northern Transept; and passing through St. Margaret's church-yard, literally paved with grave-stones, we find ourselves close to the Abbey walls. This portion of the Abbey, the northern aisle of the nave, has been recently repaired, and, with its new buttresses, wears rather a modern aspect. Returning from the church yard into Parliament street, we wind around the east end of Henry the Seventh's Chapel, now the extreme east of the Abbey, and by a narrow paved court, between St. Edmund's Chapel and the old Chapter House, whose walls show too evident traces of the fingers of Time, we enter the south transept through a narrow door, and find ourselves at once in Poets' Corner. How appropriate and poetical the name! Probably in no other spot on this earth's surface, can one-half the number of memorials of men of genius be shown. Here are monuments to Shakespeare, Milton, Ben Jonson, Spenser, Butler, Goldsmith, Gray, Prior, Dryden, Chaucer, Garrick, Handel, and a host of others, many of equal renown. Some of them are buried elsewhere, but this south transept covers the earthly remains of a large proportion of these honored men. Here the visitor is tempted to linger; often have I stayed so long amid these memorials of the glorious dead, that, unable to explore the other parts of the Abbey, I have been compelled to return at once to the busy world without.

Proceeding along the southern aisle of the choir, we enter the nave with its two aisles, formed by lofty clustered columns, that seem, with their groinings, to lose themselves in the dim vault of the roof, carrying the spectator's eye up and up, till his thoughts perforce transcend the limits of the earthly structure, and mount to the throne of God; while the lettered pavement beneath his feet soon calls to his remembrance that his every step is on a grave. Over these portions of the Abbey the visitor is permitted to roam as he pleases, excepting on Sundays, and during the time of the daily morning and evening services; but for the chapels and some of the more ancient monuments, he must be accompanied by a verger, to whom a small fee has to be paid. But here is enough to occupy the contemplative mind for hours; and I should not envy the man who could walk through these solemn aisles without becoming wiser and better. For though the obscurity of some whose names are to be read on the sculptured tablets, was an appropriate theme for the satire of Addison and Goldsmith, the only wonder being, as of the fly in gold in amber, how they ever got there, there is still a great preponderance of names familiar in our mouths as household words. And if perchance the organ of the choir should begin to play, the dullest ear must feel the power of the almost celestial music—

> Here where the fretted aisles prolong
> The silent notes of holy song,
> As if some angel spoke again,
> All peace on earth, good will to men.

It has, of course, been understood from what I have said, that the ground plan of the Abbey is cruciform. The choir is situated west of the transepts, and the head of the cross, beyond the transepts, is occupied by chapels; the chapel and shrine of Edward the Confessor being in the centre, and, beyond the whole, the most elaborate specimen of the florid Gothic in the world, Henry the Seventh's chapel. The length of the whole structure is 530 feet.

Accompanied by the guide we proceed to examine the curiosities of the various chapels, and in them Mosaic pavements, sculptured screens, monumental brasses, and full-length recumbent statues crowd upon us. Under these chapels lie buried several of the ancient kings of England, and many of the ancient abbots of Westminster; and though much injury was done when Cromwell's troopers stabled their horses in these chapels, and to deface the monument of a saint was to do the State good service, we may rejoice that so much that is interesting has escaped the hand of the spoiler. One of the most striking of the monuments is that of Mrs. Nightingale, by the great sculptor Roubilise, representing Death in the form of a skeleton, coming forth from the opening door of a tomb, pointing his dart at the breast of the lady who has fallen, in the agonies of dissolution, into her husband's arms, while he vainly strives, with his hand, to turn aside the fatal weapon. The figure of the dying wife, and the countenance of the agonized husband, exhibit the very perfection of the sculptor's skill. Close by it stands the monument of Sir Francis Vere, the canopy supported by four kneeling knights; and it is related that while Roubilise was superintending the erection of the Nightingale monument, the Abbey mason, happening to enter, found the enthusiastic artist standing, lost in contemplation of one of the kneeling figures; and, as the mason drew nearer, Roubilise laid his hand upon his arm, and pointing towards the figure, exclaimed: "Hush! he will speak soon."

In the chapel of Edward the Confessor, we see two common-looking old wooden chairs; these are the coronation chairs which, covered with crimson velvet and gold, are the regal seats of sovereigns at their coronation. One of them is nearly six hundred years old, having been made by order of Edward I., and has a block of sand-stone fastened to its seat by iron clamps. This rough stone, about two feet long, is one of the historic stones of the world. Scotch antiquarians tell us that it is the very same stone that Jacob took for his pillow at Bethel: it is, at least, certain that, centuries before the Christian era, it was the mystic coronation seat of the kings of the Picts; that it was removed by Kenneth II. from Dunstaffnage, where it had long been kept, to Scone; and that Edward I., after his defeat of the Scotch, removed it to Westminster, and fastened it to the coronation seat of the English kings, and there it has since remained. Every English monarch, at the coronation ceremony, from Edward I. to Victoria, has been seated on the stone which was supposed to give title to the sovereignty of Scotland. But we must pass on to the north transept, which might be called "Statesmen's Corner" with almost as much propriety as the south has been named Poets'. Here, among a multitude of others, lie entombed Chatham, Pitt, Fox, Grattan, Canning, Castlereagh, Mansfield, Follett, and Warren Hastings. Here friend and foe lie side by side, their ashes commingling; Pitt and Fox, whose contest in life agitated the whole British empire, in death rest close together.

Drop upon Fox's grave the tear,
'Twill trickle to his rival's bier;
O'er Pitt's the mournful requiem sound,
And Fox's will the notes rebound.
The solemn echo seems to cry,
"Here let their discord with them die."

Should it not also cry to us to lessen the bitterness of party strife, and make us anticipate the not very far distant time when, forgetting all our hatreds and enmities, we shall lie down, each in his narrow house, awaiting in silence the coming of the great Judge, who shall render unto every man according to his works?

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL TEACHER

Should be diligent and zealous. To be successful in anything, it is as necessary to be diligent and zealous, as to be punctual. The Apostle says, "It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing." It is not necessary for us to say a word to teachers as to the goodness of the cause in which they are engaged. We hope all who are engaged in it, know that they are engaged in a good work. Before we engage in any work, we should examine if it is right, and then go to work with diligence and zeal. We should not be diligent in its, and then give up; but should be steady in our application to the work.

We should make constant effort in the good work. And if we are diligent, no exertion of body or mind will be considered too much. How many refuse to teach in the Sabbath School, on the ground that it is too much to attend the church services, and teach Sabbath School! And how many teachers think they have done enough if they teach Sabbath School in the morning, when they are asked to teach in any of the mission schools in the afternoon. This is not being zealously affected in a good thing. If the teacher has a due appreciation of the work, he will be attentive, industrious, and assiduous. Diligence, it is said, is the celebrated philosopher's stone, that turns everything into gold. The wise man, has said, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings."

Teacher, be diligent, be zealous for the success of the cause of Sabbath-schools; for the salvation of the souls of the little ones committed to your care and for the glory of your Master. You should be diligent in improving the opportunity you have every Sabbath, of telling your scholars of the love of Christ, as you do not know but your next Sabbath may be the last time you will enjoy the privilege. We visited a mission school last Sabbath, and the Superintendent announced, in appropriate terms, the death of a little girl, who had been in the school, on the previous Sabbath, and urged the teachers to be diligent in the performance of their duties to the scholars.

In view of the importance of the work in which you are engaged, and in view of the fact that you may not long enjoy the privilege of being engaged in this work, is it necessary for us to urge you to be diligent and zealous in it? May God enable us all to be faithful to the trust he has committed to us.

DOMESTIC MARKETS.

The Breadstuffs market is without any material change since the receipt of the foreign news, and Flour meets a steady inquiry, both for export and home consumption, at full prices. Sales, in lots, to the retailers and bakers are reported at $5.25 and 5.50 for superfine, 5.50 and 5.75 for extras, 5.75 and 6.25 for extra family, and 6.50 and 6.75 for fancy lots, as in quality. Rye Flour is steady but dull at four dollars per barrel. In Corn Meal there is nothing doing, and Pennsylvania is held firmly at $3 per barrel, and very scarce.

WHEAT.—The receipts have fallen off, and it is held with more firmness at an advance on last week's rates. Western and Pennsylvania reds at 1.30 and 1.35 per bushel. Mixed red and white at 1.35; Southern at the same rate; and white at from 1.38 to 1.45. Rye comes forward slowly, and Pennsylvania commands 70 and 71 cts. New Corn is in good demand, and prices are fairly maintained, with sales of twenty-five thousand bushels yellow at 56 and 61 cents, including some mixed, with new at 59 and 61 cents, and old at 62 and 64 c. Oats are dull; twenty thousand bushels sold at thirty-eight cents per bus. for Delaware, and thirty-eight and thirty-nine c. for Pennsylvania.

PROVISIONS.—There has been some movement to fill Government contracts, but otherwise the transactions are extremely limited. Butter—The receipts are light, and it is in moderate demand; sales of solid-packed at 8½ and 9½ c.; prime Ohio, in kegs, at 12 c.; tubs, 15 c.; and roll at 13 and 16 c. Cheese is steady at 7 and 8½ cents, and Eggs at 17 cts. per dozen.

BARK comes forward very slowly, and meets a steady demand. Sales of fifty hogsheads 1st No. 1 Quercitron at thirty dollars per ton. In Tanners' Bark there is nothing doing.

BEESWAX is scarce. One thousand five hundred pounds prime yellow sold at thirty-two cents per pound.

CANDLES are dull; Sperm ranges from 29½ to 30 cts., and Adamantine from 16 to 18 cents, four months. Tallow candles are dull at 11 and 12 c. per pound.

COTTON.—The market is firmer, but very quiet, there being very little inquiry from the manufacturers.

COFFEE.—There is very little in first hands, and the market is firm at the advance, with sales of about 800 bags to note at 18½ and 20 cents for Rio, 22 cts. for Jamaica, and 22½ and 22¾ c. for Laguayra, cash and time.

DRUGS AND DYES.—The excitement noted in some articles has subsided. Nitrate of Soda and Saltpetre are lower. Opium is firmer. The demand for Brimstone has fallen off. Sales of Soda Ash have been made at 2¾ and 3 cts. six mos.

FEATHERS are unchanged, with sales of three thousand pounds good Kentucky at 38 cents per pound.

FISH.—The demand for Mackerel, as usual at this season, is limited, and the only sales reported are small lots from store at $10 and 10.50 for 1s, 12 for extra do., 6 for 2s, 6.50 for large, 5 for medium, and 4 for small 3s. Of Codfish, some 800 qtls. sold at $3, now held higher. Pickled Herring sell at 1.75 and 2.50 per barrel, as to quality.

FRUIT.—There is less doing in foreign, but prices remain without change, sales of fifteen hundred pkgs. bunch and layer Raisins on private terms. Green Apples sell at 3.87½ and 4 per barrel, as to quality. Dried Apples range from 5 to 7 c. for old and new; one hundred bags unpared Peaches, halves, sold at 10 cents, and quarters at 8 and 9 c. Pared Peaches are scarce. Cranberries are worth $7 and 10 per barrel.

GINSENG is quiet; a small sale of crude at 50 c., cash.

HEMP is rather higher, and Jute has advanced considerably the last month.

HIDES are but little inquired for, and prices are unchanged. The last sales of Carocoas were at 21 and 21½ c. per pound.

HOPS are dull; sales at 20 and 31 c. per pound or Eastern and Western.

SHUTTLE MACHINE.

PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.

Salesroom—510 Broadway, New York.

This MACHINE is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements—having been examined by the most profound experts and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION combined.

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—

1.—Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2.—Liability to get out of order.
3.—Expense, trouble, and loss of time in repairing.
4.—Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5.—Disagreeable noise while in operation.

THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither rip nor ravel, and is alike on both sides—performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Cambric Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the most number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires fifty per cent. less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of 12 years can run it steadily without fatigue or injury to health.

Its strength and Wonderful Simplicity of Construction render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is Guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this

UNRIVALLED MACHINE.

But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of

MERCHANT TAILORS, COACH MAKERS, HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS, SHIRT & BOSOM MAKERS, DRESS MAKERS, CORSET MAKERS, GAITER FITTERS, SHOE-BINDERS, VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS.

SEWING & GIBBS'
WILCOX & MACHINES.

Price with Hemmer and Feller,

$35 00.

THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.

Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread.

It forms a flat, even, and elastic seam, which is REMARKABLE NOT TO RIP in wear, even if the seam is cut at frequent intervals, and also under all circumstances "IS CERTAIN TO WASH."

A Patented device of great utility to learners, prevents the possibility of the machine being run on the wrong direction, or the balance-wheel swing a lady's dress.

Another feature which deserves particular attention is that THE WILCOX PATENT NEEDLE cannot be set wrong.

Two thousand stitches or two yards of work, can be done in one minute without dropping a stitch.

These Machines so simple and accurate in their construction, surpass the sum of the shuttle; and with one thread produce all the practical results of the two thread machine; and more, for these fail without hemmer, and hem the finest muslin without puckering.

Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the work in a given time.

"It is emphatically the good, low priced Family Sewing Machine that the public have long been waiting for."—Boston Transcript.

"It is indeed a wonderful production, and for Families more especially, no other will lose any comparison with it."—Philadelphia Evening Journal.

"A mechanical wonder."—Scientific American.

"Among the best and most serviceable Sewing machines. Light and elegantly finished, and so simple in its construction that it seems almost impossible for it to get out of repair."—Pittsburg Christian.

"Has combined with its own peculiar merits all the really valuable improvements of the higher priced machines."—Pennsylvanian.

"This machine, in the opinion of the committee, fills more nearly the requirements of a perfect family machine than any on exhibition."—Franklin Institute Exhibition Report of 1858.

"Taking into consideration simplicity, cheapness, durability, and doing all work, the committee are unanimously in favor of the Wilcox & Gibbs new single thread machine."—Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society's Report.

"We must, in justice, express our confidence in the merits of the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine. We consider that a great desideratum has been supplied by it, in proving beyond doubt, that two threads are not, as was supposed, necessary to a good instrument."—Christian Advocate and Journal, June 21, 1860.

"We have one of these machines in use, and think more highly of it than of any of the number we have tried."—Richmond Whig.

"The Wilcox & Gibbs Machinery in Constantinople has exercised more than twenty different kinds of Sewing Machines, and after six weeks' experience with Wilcox & Gibbs' Patent, for the purchased one of them, as the best adapted to the needs of his family, and as the least liable to require repair. OLIVER CRANE.

Boston, July 3, 1860.

The undersigned, during eighteen months, has had in almost constant use, in his family, a Wilcox & Gibbs sewing Machine, upon which has been made the clothes of his large family—from muslin to pilot cloth—including the stitching required by his several boys; and in no case have the seams failed, although in hard service. The machine now in use in his family has required no repair, and is, in all respects, well appointed and durable. JACOB CHICKERING, Boston.

Selections.

"THIS YEAR THOU SHALT DIE."

This is the language of God to the false prophet Hananiah. Still, if we were able to read God's sentence with reference to the eight or ten thousand readers of the paper now in your hands, the great probability is, that the sentence of from three to five hundred of them would be, "This year thou shalt die." Would it not, therefore, be well for each one, as we are just beginning a new year, to inquire, "Lord, is it I?"

The beginning of each new year is usually a period of great rejoicing. And, truly, we have great reason to rejoice, when we remember God's goodness to us during the past year. We should rejoice, with thankfulness to God, when we remember the manner in which he has watched over us, and guarded us from dangers which we could not have foreseen. We should rejoice in the means of grace he has afforded us during the past year;—that we have been permitted to live in religious families, where the word of God has been enjoyed;—that we have been permitted to spend Sabbath after Sabbath in God's house.

But while we should rejoice over the mercies of the past year, still the return of a new year is well calculated to produce serious reflection. When we remember the sad misimprovement we have made of the mercies enjoyed, the inquiry, How will this misimprovement of privileges appear in God's sight? is worthy our serious thought. When we remember, that, possibly, this year may close upon us in the eternal world;—that before it closes we may be called to appear before God to account for our conduct in life, should it not be matter of very serious thought how we shall then appear?

The book of men's destiny is in God's keeping. The wisest cannot tell what will happen him on to-morrow. This arrangement is a striking evidence of God's goodness to us, and his care over us. Man is often striving to know what is in the future. He has planned some scheme by which he hopes, at some future time, to become enriched in the world's goods, and he is very anxious to know how he will succeed.

Had man the power of reading the pages of his future history, he would thereby be incapacitated for present duty and present enjoyment. Perhaps, dear readers, many of you, as you butter upon this [illegible] like to know how it will terminate with you. Perhaps you have some darling scheme before you, for the success of which you are extremely anxious. Perhaps you are particularly anxious to know how our country will succeed in its present terrible struggle. But God, out of kindness to you, has hidden those things from you.

Suppose the book of your destiny, for the year upon which you have just entered, was placed in your hand, and each one was allowed to read an account of the course marked out for you, in the providence of God, do you think you would be any the better prepared for the performance of the duties of the year? One would behold in that book a record of personal affliction. He would read of sickness and suffering, which he must endure. Or he would read an account of the suffering and death of some dear friend. Another, who is now prospering in his worldly business, would there read an account of the sudden change which his business would take, reducing him, perhaps, to poverty. Another would see written in that awful book the sentence, "This year thou shalt die." He would learn, that the material for his winding sheet was already woven;—that the plank for his coffin was already dried. Another still, would learn how he would grieve away the Spirit of God, and he be given up to hardness and impenitence of heart. Now, would accounts of this kind fit you any better for the enjoyment of the blessings of the year? Would it fit you any the better for doing the work God has given you to do? By no means; just the reverse would be the case.

Since there is a probability, nay a certainty, that some of you, kind readers, will have to meet this sentence during the year upon which you have just entered, it would be well to inquire into the probabilities, that such will be your case, and the effect which such probability should exert upon you. It is probable that such will be the sentence of some of you, from the doubtful tenure by which life is held. When we remember, that disease and death has as many doors by which to enter the body, as there are pores in our skin, the great wonder is, not why we should die, but why we should live. This probability is increased by the indications of old age. What mean those gray hairs; those trembling limbs; that tottering gait; your dimness of sight?

The probability that some of you will die this year should lead to serious inquiry. You should inquire what it is to die, and from what death removes you. It removes you from the world in which you now live; from the society of kind friends; from the sanctuary and means of grace. There will be no churches for you to attend then. No minister to care for you. No Saviour to entreat you. No Spirit to strive with you. You should remember that death introduces you into the immediate presence of God. Thence to heaven or hell. To heaven, where are mansions prepared for the people of God; where is nothing impure or unholy; where is an eternal rest remaining for the people of God. Or to hell, where is nothing but misery; the worm that never dies, and the fire that is never quenched.

We do not like to think of death—are disposed to look upon it as something away in the future. When God, in his providence, calls to our mind the solemn thought, we endeavor to banish it as soon as possible. How foolish! One desire to forget it will not keep it away. Death will come sooner or later. The part of wisdom is to prepare to meet it.

Should any impenitent one read this, let such a one reflect, how awful if you should die in unbelief! If you have never been born again; if you have never believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, how can you appear before God to answer for your conduct? "He that believeth not the Son of God, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." How terrible! The wrath of God abideth on him. Friends, we beseech you, consider your ways, and be wise. Think of death—your meeting with God after death—your appearance at the judgment bar—the awful sentence you must receive, unless you flee to the Saviour. Repent of your unbelief. Flee to the Lord Jesus Christ. His arms are stretched out to receive you. His call is, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." His Spirit is striving with you. Deceive not yourselves with the thought, that there is time enough yet. You know not but your sentence may be written in the declaration, "This year thou shalt die." Your Judge may be even at the door, and this night you may be summoned to appear before your God. Hence, as you value your immortal souls, delay not to come to Jesus.

THE CONVICT'S RETURN.

A CLERGYMAN'S NARRATIVE.

"When I first settled in this village," said the old gentleman, "which is now just five-and-twenty years ago, the most notorious person among my parishioners was a man of the name of Edmunds, who leased a small farm near this spot. He was a morose, savage-hearted, bad man: idle and dissolute in his habits; cruel and ferocious in his disposition. Beyond the few lazy and reckless vagabonds with whom he sauntered away his time in the fields, or sotted in the ale-house, he had not a single friend or acquaintance; no one cared to speak to the man whom many feared, and every one detested—and Edmunds was shunned by all.

"This man had a wife and one son, who, when I first came here, was about twelve years old. Of the acuteness of that woman's sufferings, of the gentle and enduring manner in which she bore them, of the agony of solicitude with which she reared that boy, no one can form an adequate conception. Heaven forgive me the supposition, if it be an uncharitable one, but I do firmly and in my soul believe, that the man systematically tried for many years to break her heart; but she bore it all for her child's sake, and, however strange it may seem to many, for his father's too; for brute as he was, and cruelly as he treated her, she had loved him once; and the recollection of what he had been to her, awakened feelings of forbearance and meekness under suffering in her bosom, to which all God's creatures, but women, are strangers.

"They were poor—they could not be otherwise when the man pursued such courses; but the woman's unceasing and unwearied exertions, early and late, morning, noon, and night, kept them above actual want. Those exertions were but ill repaid. People who passed the spot in the evening—sometimes at a late hour of the night—reported that they had heard the moans and sobs of a woman in distress, and the sound of blows; and more than once, when it was past midnight, the boy knocked softly at the door of a neighbor's house, whither he had been sent, to escape the drunken fury of his unnatural father.

"During the whole of this time, and when the poor creature bore about her marks of ill usage and violence which she would not wholly conceal, she was a constant attendant at our little church. Regularly every Sunday, morning and afternoon, she occupied the same seat with the boy at her side, and though they were both poorly dressed, much more so than many of their neighbors who were in a lower station—they were always neat and clean. Every one had a friendly nod and a kind word for 'poor Mrs. Edmunds;' and sometimes, when she stopped to exchange a few words with a neighbor at the conclusion of the service, the little row of elm trees which leads to the church porch, or lingered behind to gaze with a mother's pride and fondness upon her healthy boy, as he sported before her with some little companions, her care-worn face would lighten up with an expression of heartfelt gratitude; and she would look, if not cheerful and happy, at least tranquil and contented.

"Five or six years passed away: the boy had become a robust and well-grown youth. The time that had strengthened the child's light frame, and knit his weak limbs into the strength of manhood, had bowed his mother's form, and enfeebled her steps: but the arm that should have supported her was no longer locked in hers; the face that should have cheered her, no more looked upon her own. She occupied her old seat, but there was a vacant one beside her. The Bible was kept as carefully as ever, the places were found and folded down as they used to be; but there was no one to read it with her—and the tears fell thick and fast upon the book, and blotted the words from her eyes. Neighbors were as kind as they were wont to be of old, but she shunned their greetings with averted head. There was no lingering among the old elm trees now—no cheering anticipations of happiness yet in store. The desolate woman drew her bonnet closer over her face, and walked hurriedly away.

"Shall I tell you, that the young man, who looking back to the earliest of his childhood's days to which memory and consciousness extended, and carrying his recollection down to that moment, could remember nothing which was not in some way connected with a long series of voluntary privations suffered by his mother for his sake, with ill-usage, and insult, and violence, and all endured for him; shall I tell you, that he, with a reckless disregard of her breaking heart, and a sullen wilful forgetfulness of all she had done and borne for him, had linked himself with depraved and abandoned men, and was madly pursuing a headlong career, which must bring death to him, and shame to her? Alas for human nature! You have anticipated it long since.

"The measure of the unhappy woman's misery and misfortune was about to be completed. Numerous offences had been committed in the neighborhood: the perpetrators remained undiscovered, and their boldness increased. A robbery of a daring and aggravated nature occasioned a vigilance of pursuit, and strictness of search, they had not calculated on. Young Edmunds was suspected with three companions. He was apprehended—committed—tried—condemned to die.

"The wild and piercing shriek from a woman's voice, which resounded through the court when the solemn sentence was pronounced, rings in my ears at this moment. That cry struck a terror to the culprit's heart, which trial, condemnation, the approach of death itself, had failed to awaken. The lips, which had been compressed in dogged sullenness throughout, quivered and parted involuntarily; the face turned ashy pale, as the cold perspiration broke forth from every pore; the sturdy limbs of the felon trembled, and he staggered in the dock.

"In the first transports of her mental anguish, the suffering mother threw herself upon her knees at my feet, and fervently besought the Almighty Being, who had hitherto supported her in all her troubles, to release her from a world of woe and misery, and to spare the life of her only child. A burst of grief, and a violent struggle, such as I hope I may never have to witness again, succeeded. I knew that her heart was breaking from that hour; but I never once heard complaint or murmur escape her lips.

"It was a piteous spectacle to see that woman in the prison-yard from day to day, eagerly and fervently attempting, by affection and entreaty, to soften the hard heart of her obdurate son. It was in vain. He remained moody, obstinate and unmoved. Not even the unlooked-for commutation of his sentence to transportation for fourteen years, softened for an instant the sullen hardihood of his demeanor.

"But the spirit of resignation and endurance that had so long upheld her, was unable to contend against bodily weakness and infirmity. She fell sick. She dragged her tottering limbs from the bed to visit her son once more, but her strength failed her, and she sank powerless on the ground.

"And now the boasted coldness and indifference of the young man were tested indeed; and the retribution that fell heavily upon him, nearly drove him mad. A day passed away, and his mother was not there; another flew by, and she came not near him: a third evening arrived, and yet he had not seen her; and in four-and-twenty hours, he was to be separated from her—perhaps for ever. Oh! how the long-forgotten thoughts of former days rushed upon his mind, as he almost ran up and down the narrow yard—as if intelligence would arrive the sooner for his hurrying: and how bitterly a sense of his helplessness and desolation rushed upon him, when he heard the truth! His mother, the only parent he had ever known; lay ill—it might be, dying—within one mile of the ground he stood on; were he free and unfettered, a few minutes would place him by her side. He rushed to the gate, and grasping the iron rails with the energy of desperation, shook it till it rang again, and threw himself against the thick wall as if to force a passage through the stone; but the strong building mocked his feeble efforts, and he beat his hands together and wept like a child.

"I bore the mother's forgiveness and blessing to her son in prison; and I carried his solemn assurance of repentance, and his fervent supplication for pardon, to her sick bed. I heard, with pity and compassion, the repentant man devise a thousand little plans for her comfort and support, when he returned; but I knew that many months before he could reach his place of destination, his mother would be no longer of this world.

"He was removed by night. A few weeks afterwards the poor woman's soul took its flight, I confidently hope, and solemnly believe, to a place of eternal happiness and rest. I performed the burial service over her remains. She lies in our little church-yard. There is no stone at her grave's head. Her sorrows were known to man: her virtues to God.

"It had been arranged previously to the convict's departure, that he should write to his mother as soon as he could obtain permission, and that the letter should be addressed to me. The father had positively refused to see his son from the moment of his apprehension, and it was a matter of indifference to him whether he lived or died. Many years passed over without any intelligence of him; and when more than half his term of transportation had expired, and I had received no letter, I concluded him to be dead, as, indeed, I almost hoped he might be.

"Edmunds, however, had been sent a considerable distance up the country, on his arrival at the settlement; and to this circumstance, perhaps, may be attributed the fact, that though several letters were despatched, none of them ever reached my hands. He remained in the same place during the whole fourteen years. At the expiration of the term, steadily adhering to his old resolution, and the pledge he gave his mother, he made his way back to England amidst innumerable difficulties, and returned, on foot to his native place.

"On a fine Sunday evening, in the month of August, John Edmunds set foot in the village he had left with shame and disgrace seventeen years before. His nearest way lay through the church-yard. The man's heart swelled as he crossed the stile. The tall old elms, through whose branches the declining sun cast here and there a rich ray of light upon the shady path, awakened the associations of his earliest days. His pictured himself as he was then, clinging to his mother's hand, and walking peacefully to church. He remembered how he used to look up into her pale face; and how her eyes would sometimes fill with tears as she gazed upon his features—tears, which fell hot upon his forehead as she stooped to kiss him, and made him weep too, although he little knew then what bitter tears hers were. He thought how often he had run merrily down that path with some childish playfellow, looking back, over and again, to catch his mother's smile, or hear her gentle voice; and then a veil seemed lifted from his memory, and words of kindness unrequited, and warnings despised, and promises broken, thronged upon his recollection till his heart failed him, and he could bear it no longer.

"He entered the church. The evening service was concluded, and the congregation had dispersed, but it was not yet closed. His steps echoed through the low building with a hollow sound, and he almost feared to be alone, it was so still and quiet. He looked round him. Nothing was changed. The place seemed smaller than it used to be; but there were the old monuments on which he had gazed with childish awe a thousand times; the little pulpit, with its faded cushion; the Communion table, before which he had so often repeated the commandments he had reverenced as a child, and forgotten as a man. He approached the old seat; it looked cold and desolate. The cushion had been removed, and the Bible was not there. Perhaps his mother now occupied a poorer seat, or possibly she had grown infirm, and could not reach the church alone. He dared not think of what he feared. A cold feeling crept over him, and he trembled violently, as he turned away. An old man entered the porch just as he reached it. Edmunds started back, for he knew him well; many a time had he watched him digging graves in the church-yard. What would he say to the returned convict? The old man raised his eye to the stranger's face, bid him 'good evening,' and walked slowly on. He had forgotten him.

"He walked down the hill, and through the village. The weather was warm, and the people were sitting at their doors, or strolling in their little gardens, as he passed, enjoying the serenity of the evening, and their rest from labor. Many a look was turned towards him, and many a doubtful glance he cast on either side to see whether any knew and shunned him. There were strange faces in almost every house, in some, he recognized the burly form of some old school-fellow—a boy when he last saw him—surrounded by a troop of merry children; in others he saw seated in an easy-chair at the cottage door, a feeble and infirm old man, whom he only recollected as a hale and hearty laborer, but they had all forgotten him, and he passed on unknown.

"The last soft light of the setting sun had fallen on the earth, casting a rich glow on the yellow corn sheaves, and lengthening the shadows of the orchard trees, as he stood before the old house, the home of his infancy, to which his heart had yearned with an intensity of affection not to be described, through long and weary years of captivity and sorrow. The paling was low—though he well remembered the time when it had seemed a high wall to him; and he looked over into the old garden. There were more seeds and gayer flowers than there used to be, but there were the old trees still—the very tree under which he had lain a thousand times when tired with playing in the sun, and felt the soft, mild sleep of happy boyhood steal gently upon him. There were voices within the house. He listened, but they fell strangely upon his ear; he knew them not. They were merry, too; and he well knew that his poor old mother could not be so cheerful, and he away. The door opened, and a group of little children bounded out, shouting and romping. The father, with a little boy in his arms, appeared at the door, and they crowded around him, clapping their tiny hands, and dragging him out to join their joyous sports. The convict thought on the many times he had shrunk from his father's sight in that very place. He remembered how often he had buried his trembling head beneath the bed-clothes, and heard the harsh word and the hard stripe, and his mother's wailing; and though the man sobbed aloud with agony of mind as he left the spot, his fist was clenched, and his teeth were set, in fierce and deadly passion.

"And such was the return to which he had looked through the perspective of many years, and for which he had undergone so much suffering! No face of welcome, no look of forgiveness, no house to receive, no hand to help him—and this, too, in the old village. What was his loneliness in the wild thick woods where man was never seen, to this!

"He felt that, in the distant land of his bondage and infamy, he had thought of his native place as it was when he left it—not as it would be, when he returned. The sad reality struck coldly at his heart, and his spirit sank within him. He had not courage to make inquiries, or to present himself to the only person who was likely to receive him with kindness and compassion. He walked slowly on; and shunning the roadside, like a guilty man, turned into a meadow he well remembered; and covering his face with his hands, threw himself upon the grass.

"He had not observed that a man was lying on the bank beside him; his garments rustled as he turned round to steal a look at the new comer; and Edmunds raised his head.

"The man had moved into a sitting posture. His body was much bent, and his face was wrinkled and yellow. His dress denoted him an inmate of the workhouse; he had the appearance of being very old, but it looked more the effect of dissipation or disease, than length of years. He was staring hard at the stranger—and though his eyes were lustreless and heavy at first, they appeared to glow with an unnatural and alarmed expression after they had been fixed upon him for a short time, until they seemed to be starting from their sockets. Edmunds gradually raised himself to his knees, and looked more and more earnestly upon the old man's face. They gazed upon each other in silence.

"The old man was ghastly pale. He shuddered, and tottered to his feet. Edmunds sprang to his. He stepped back a pace or two. Edmunds advanced.

"'Let me hear you speak,' said the convict, in a thick, broken voice.

"'Stand off,' cried the old man, with a dreadful oath. The convict drew closer to him.

"'Stand off,' shrieked the old man. Furious with terror he raised his stick, and struck Edmunds a heavy blow across the face.

"'Father—devil,' murmured the convict, between his set teeth. He rushed wildly forward, and clenched the old man by the throat—but he was his father; and his arm fell powerless by his side.

"The old man uttered a loud yell which rang through the lonely fields like the howl of an evil spirit. His face turned black; the gore gushed from his mouth and nose, and dyed the grass a deep dark red, as he staggered and fell. He had ruptured a blood vessel: and he was a dead man before his son could raise him from the thick, sluggish pool.

* * * * * * *

"In that corner of the church-yard," said the old gentleman, after a silence of a few moments—"in that corner of the church-yard, of which I have before spoken, there lies buried a man, who was to my employment for three years after this event; and who was truly contrite, penitent, and humbled, if ever man was. No one save myself knew, in that man's lifetime, who he was, or whence he came. It was John Edmunds, the returned convict."

THE NUMBER SEVEN.

BY REV. R. C. TRENCH, D. D.

I will take the opportunity of a pause here between this, the Introduction to the seven Epistles, and the seven Epistles themselves, to say a few needful words on the mystery of the number seven; which only I have left unsaid so long, because unwilling to interrupt the exposition by any thing in the shape of dissertation; not to say that I found it difficult to attach to any one of those important sevens which have already occurred, considerations which properly belonged to them all.

Even the most careless reader of the Apocalypse must be struck with the manner in which almost every thing there is ordered by sevens. Thus, besides the seven Churches, and their seven Angels, we have already in this first chapter the seven Spirits (ver. 4,) the seven candlesticks (ver. 12,) the seven stars (ver. 16;) and then further, the seven lamps of fire (iv 5,) the seven seals (v. 1,) the seven horns and seven eyes of the Lamb (v. 6,) the seven heavenly Angels and the seven trumpets (viii. 2,) the seven thunders (x 3,) the seven heads of the dragon, and the seven crowns upon these heads (xii. 3,) the same of the beast rising out of the sea (xiii. 1,) the seven last plagues (xv. 1,) the seven vials (xv. 7,) the seven mountains (xvii. 9,) the seven kings (xvii. 10;) not to speak of other recurrences, not so obvious, of this number seven as the signature of the Book; as, for instance, the distribution of it into seven visions, the sevenfold ascription of glory to the Lamb (v. 12,) and to God (vii. 12.)

But indeed the recurrence, and, as I shall seek to show, the symbolic dignity of the number seven runs through the whole of Scripture from first to last—to say nothing of the echoes of this sense of its significance which abound in every religion of heathendom; and if it is more strongly marked in the Apocalypse than in any other book of Scripture, it is only that this, like so much else, has culminated here. Should it be asked, What is the special significance, and what the sacredness and peculiar dignity of seven, of what is it the signature, the answer is not very hard to give. A careful induction from all the passages where this number cannot be regarded as fortuitous, but is evidently of Divine ordinance and appointment (I call fortuitous such sevens as occur, Acts xix. 14; xx. 6.) will leave no doubt that it claims throughout Scripture to be considered as the covenant number, the sign and signature of God's covenant relation to mankind, and above all to that portion of mankind with which this relation is not potential merely, but actual, namely, the Church.

The evidences of this reach back to the very beginning. We meet them first in the hallowing of the seventh day, in pledge and token of the covenant of God with man (Gen. ii. 3; cf. Ezek. xx 12,) as indeed is the binding up of seven in the very word Sabbath. So too circumcision, being the sign of a covenant, is accomplished on the eighth, or after seven days (Gen xvii. 12; Lev. xii. 3.) And as seven is the signature of God's covenant with man, so of all man's covenants with his fellows, resting as these do and must, on the anterior covenant with God; thus of treaties of peace (Gen. xxi. 20.) of marriages (Judg. xiv. 12.) Nor should it be left unnoticed that the word seven is again bound up in the Hebrew word signifying an oath, or a covenant, confirmed with an oath. Seven is the number of sacrifice, by aid of which the covenant once established, is continually maintained in its vigor and strength, and the relations between God and man, which else is evermore disturbing, and threatening to bring to an end, are restored (2 Chron. xxix. 21; Job xlii 8; cf. Num. xxiii. 1, 14, 29.) It is the number of purification and consecration, as the fruits of the sacrifice (Lev. iv. 6, 17; viii. 11, 33; xiv. 9, 51; xvi. 14, 19; Num. xix. 12, 19,) of forgiveness (Matt. xviii. 21, 22; Luke xvii. 4.) Then, again, seven in the number of every grace and benefit bestowed upon Israel; which is thus marked as flowing out of the covenant and a consequence of it. The priests compass Jericho seven days, and on the seventh day seven times, that all Israel may know that the city is given into their hands by their God; and that its conquest is a direct and immediate result of their covenant relation to Him (Josh vi. 4, 15, 16.) Naaman is to dip in Jordan seven times, that he may acknowledge the God of Israel the author of his cure (2 Kings v. 10.) It is the number of reward to those that are faithful to the covenant (Deut. xxviii. 7; 1 Sam ii. 5;) of punishment to those that are froward in the covenant (Lev. xxvi. 21, 24, 28; Deut. xxviii. 25; 2 Sam. xii. 8; xxiv. 13,) or to those who injure the people in it (Gen iv. 15, 24; Ps. lxxix. 12; Exod. vii. 25;) or again of punishment, regarded in the light of a making of amends, a readjusting of the disturbed balances of justice, and so a restoring of harmony between the sinner and the outraged law of God (Prov. vi. 31.) All the feasts, as must be obvious to every one, are ordered by seven, or else by seven multiplied into seven (7 by 7,) and thus made intenser still. Thus it is, not to recur again to Sabbath, the mother of all feasts, with the passover (Exod. xii. 15, 16,) the feast of weeks (Deut. xvi. 9,) of tabernacles (Deut. xvi. 13, 15,) the Sabbath-year (Lev. xxv. 2, 3; Deut. xv. 1,) and the jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8.)

Further, we may observe that wherever God is at work in the history of other nations outside of the covenant, while yet He would make it plainly to appear that it is for Israel's sake, and having respect to the covenant, that he is so working, this signature of seven in his dealing with these nations is never wanting. Thus it is the number of the years of plenty and of the years of famine, in sign that these were sent not so much for Egypt's sake, as for Israel's, and as conducing to the divine preparation through which the chosen people were to pass (Gen. xli. 26, 27.) Seven times pass over Nebuchadnezzar, that he may learn in his abasement how that the God of his Jewish captives is indeed the King over all the earth (Dan iv 16, 23, 25.) But it would be endless to go through all passages in proof; it would need to quote or refer to a great part of Scripture. I prefer leaving to the Student of God's Word to fill up the sketch which I have drawn, and to find for himself further confirmation of what has been asserted here.

But if it should be further asked, Why has seven been selected for this, what are the grounds of its adoption to this high dignity and honor, the answer does not seem very far to seek. I am indeed aware that in all speculations upon numbers we may very profitably lay to heart the wise caution of Fuller, clothed, as is ever the case with his wisdom, in witty words: "For matter of numbers fancy is never at a loss, like a beggar never out of his way, but hath some haunts where to repose itself. But such as in expounding of Scripture reap more than God did sow there, never eat what they reap thence, because such grainless husks, when seriously threshed out, vanish all into chaff." And yet I feel very sure that in this matter we need not dread lest we should be threshing barren ears, with only chaff for our pains.

To the question then asked above it may be replied by first calling attention to the fact that the number seven results from the combinations of three and four. But can it be shown that these in Scripture have severally any symbolic significance of their own? Assuredly yes. Three, the signature of God; four, that of the world; and thus seven, or those numbers brought into contact and relation, the token and signature of the covenant between these two.

That three is the number of God, of the ever-blessed Trinity, this of itself needs no proof. And it is so recognised in Scripture. There are vestiges of this in the Old Testament, in the Trisagion of Isai vi. 3; in the blessing as from three distinct persons, Num vi. 24–26; in the prominent position assumed there by the Angel of the Covenant, hereafter to be acknowledged as the second person of the Trinity, in the often mention not of God, but of the Spirit of God, hereafter to be acknowledged as the third (Gen. i. 2; Ps. li. 11.) These footprints of the Trinity are purposely more or less obscure, and only clear when they are read in the light of a later revelation; for the office of the Church of the Old Testament was to guard the truth of the unity of the Godhead, not to declare the Trinity; which indeed, so long as polytheism was not overcome, but still had its roots even in the minds of the chosen people itself, could not yet have been safely declared. Here is explanation amply sufficient, of the reserve with which the number three is employed in the Old Testament as the signature of Deity; the reason why this is only perfectly plain and clear in the New.

Four, the next number to three, and growing immediately out of it, is the signature of the world—of the world, not indeed as a rude undigested mass, but as a cosmos, as the revelation, so far as nature can be the revelation, of God. Four is stamped everywhere on this the organized world. Thus, not to speak of the four elements, the four seasons, neither of which are recognised in Scripture, we have there the four winds (Ezek. xxxvii. 9; Matt. xxiv. 31; Rev. vii. 1;) the four corners of the earth (Rev. vii. 1; xx. 8;) the four living creatures, emblems of all creaturely life (Rev. iv. 6,) and each of these with four faces and four wings (Ezek. i. 5, 6;) the four beasts coming up from the sea, and representing the four great world-empires, which in the providence of God should succeed one another (Dan. vii. 3;) the four metals composing the image which sets forth the same phases of empire (Dan. ii. 32, 33;) the four Gospels, or the four-sided Gospel, in sign of its designation for all the world; the sheet tied at the four corners (Acts x. 11; xi. 5;) the four horns, the sum total of the forces of the world as arrayed against the Church (Zech. i. 18;) the enumeration, wherever this is wished to be exhaustive, of the inhabitants of the world by four, kindreds, tongues, peoples, and nations (Rev. v. 9; cf. vii. 9; x. 11; xi. 9; xiv. 6; xvii. 15.)

These are reasons then amply sufficient why seven, being thus, as it is, made up of three and four, should be itself the signature of the covenant. No mere accident or caprice dictated the selection of it. And if this number of the covenant, then we can account for its constant recurrence in this Book; for admitting, as few would refuse to do, that the idea of God's covenant with his Church as the key to all history, comes to its head in the Apocalypse, it is nothing wonderful that this book should be more markedly ordered by seven, and have this number stamped upon it even more strongly, than any other portion of Scripture.

DAYS are lost in lamentation over the loss of days.

GOOD READING.

"The English clergy are taught most things except English, and can do most things except read." This sharply turned, epigrammatic sentence, we quote from one of the literary journals of London, not to endorse it—for we suspect the writer sacrificed truth to point, and we cannot forget that among the clergy stigmatized as so ignorant of their own tongue, is to be found that master of the English language, Dean Trench—but to say a few words concerning the occasion of its utterance, and the general subject which drew it forth.

The Bishop of Rochester, one of the prelates of the English Establishment, lately issued an order, that every candidate for holy orders in his diocese, shall produce a certificate to the effect that "he has powers of voice sufficient for his public ministrations, that he has no impediment or hesitation in his speech, and that his manner of reading is not heavy or monotonous, but such as is well fitted for the sacred functions he will have to discharge." He further gave notice that he would require "every candidate to read before him previous to ordination."

We suppose that these regulations, sensible as they seem to be, would have the effect, if strictly adhered to, of diminishing somewhat the annual crop of young divines in the English Church, or in any church in which they might be put in force. But it is obvious from the manner in which the promulgation of the rule has been received in England, that it did not come forth from the Episcopal palace a day too soon. It is just as if the English nation, long silent, as becomes the proprieties of the house of God, had suddenly found an opportunity to tell their clergymen what they thought of the pulpit performances to which they had listened so uncomplainingly. The rescript of the Bishop has been made the theme of innumerable editorials, and of communications to the newspapers as abundant almost as the autumn leaves which are falling around us. The London Times, which has an unfailing scent for a popular subject, "thunders" in the following style concerning the manner in which the service is performed by the clergy in the English Church.

"Some simply grind through the service, sermon and all. Some raise their voices, or drop it, by some rule best known to themselves, but fatal to the meaning. Some read so thick that half the words are reduced to one unintelligible mass. Some uniformly misplace the emphasis, and so ruin, and even alter the sense. Some consider the ceremony an exhibition of sound lungs, and bawl the service much in the same tone as a man recommends to a street the contents of his truck-load of vegetables or fish. It is 'Yarmouth Bloaters' or 'Caller Ou' with them from beginning to end. Some, on the other hand, whine the service, as if it were a penal exercise delivered on a pillory. Some are content with an audacious irreverence, as if to show that they are, at least, no hypocrites, and will not be too devout even when they have to lead the devotion of the people. Some are nasal, some drone, some mince, some intone, some stammer; all of them faults of education and early habit, and capable at least, of mitigation by care. The misfortune now is, that these are thought matters of indifference by many clergymen. It may be a matter of indifference to a good many. They may have a succession to a living, or the means of buying one, or very powerful and partial patrons. It is not a matter of indifference to congregations, or to incumbents who wish for good assistance in their work. Accordingly, many a clergyman who, in early life, would take no steps to improve his elocution, and who thought good reading foppery, and good preaching hypocrisy, has, at a later age, the mortification of being denied curacies, and even livings, on the ground of his bad voice and delivery."

This sudden and wide-spread exhibition of popular feeling upon this subject is an intimation to the clergy of all churches, that there is a defect in the public services of the Sabbath, to which they would do well to take heed; and a hint also of a method by which their ministrations might receive new or additional attractiveness. They will give fresh interest to their pulpit, and to the services of God's house, by simply learning to read well—by getting rid of the mincing, and stammering, and bawling, and nasal whining, which the Times catalogues among the elocutionary sins in England, and which are not, by any means, unknown on this side of the water. And if they go beyond a mere negative excellence, and aspire after positive perfection in one of the most delightful of all arts, they will be able to send their people home often with new and vivid impressions of the truth and beauty which there is in God's holy word.

It is a matter of real concern that so many of those whose business it is to read the sacred Scriptures in the hearing of all the people, should totally neglect all endeavors to fit themselves for the performance of this duty. Some consider any attempt at improvement, in this respect, as tending to artificialness of manner, and do not give sufficient attention to it, to cure their own glaring faults, while others content themselves with ridiculing those who think worth while to make the trial. But the great masters of the art of preaching have not so thought or acted. One of the greatest of these was the late Dr John M. Mason, an eloquent man, and mighty in the Scriptures. But we have the authority of Mr. L. G. White, (a teacher of elocution still living in Philadelphia, and beyond all comparison the best instructor in his art we have ever known,) for saying that he has been with Dr Mason in his study until the night was far spent, discussing various readings of portions of holy writ, and the most effective methods of delivering truth in the presence of the great congregation. The consequence of this labour was, that the students of Dr. Mason who survive, all testify that his simple reading of the word of God threw a flood of light upon it, such as the expositions of other men could not at all equal. We could wish that many, in our day, would give the same study to the blessed word, in the same spirit, and with the same end in view. They would find their reward in the freshened interest with which their people would listen to what is now, too often, a tame and lifeless part of the public service of God.

ADVICE ON PULPIT SPEAKING.

We find the following sensible remarks in an English paper with regard to pulpit speaking—a subject which is sadly neglected among us:

"Allow me to add one or two suggestions on pulpit vocal efficiency:—1. The pulpits of more than half the churches of England are too high. The maximum force of the voice naturally rises at an angle of forty-five degrees. The consequence is that the voice of a preacher stuck up in a very high pulpit exerts its greatest effort on the roof and among the rafters. Conscious of this, the preacher bends his head downwards, and, if he produces no other result, he turns for himself what is technically called 'the clergyman's sore throat.' In the House of Commons, in courts of justice, in lecture halls, and wherever common sense rules, the speaker is on the floor or slightly elevated, and the audience rises above the level of his head. I preach from a low pulpit in a church not the best adapted for hearing, and 1,700 people can hear a whisper. 2. More than half the churches are built and arranged in utter defiance of all the laws of acoustics. A Gothic building, with its broken surfaces and protruding lines and angles, arrests and shatters the waves of sound, and thereby proves that however well adapted for saying mass, which it is not necessary for people to hear, it is not adapted to hearing sermons. A Protestant place of worship is meant to enable the people to hear and the preacher to be seen. No mediæval beauty can compensate for the absence of these essential elements. 3. A preacher should not raise his voice into a key louder than that of his ordinary conversation. Some preachers mar out their sermons, and others intone them, and the people that listen do not hear, and they that do not listen are lulled to with them. Common people require this. Age requires it. Young men require it.

Differing as I do from Channing, and protesting as I do against him, I can never cease to honor and admire him for this; that he always wrote and preached on those things which he considered the great things.

There is as real an order in the evolution of parts in a tree, as in the successive additions which build a house; and if a discourse proceeds by an inward law, which disregards symmetrical plans, it may have more coherence and vitality than could be produced by rule and square.

Constant perusal and re-perusal of Scripture is the great preparation for preaching. You get good even when you know it not.

Where there is more voice, more emphasis or more gesture than there is feeling, there is waste, and worse, powder beyond the shot.

Dr. J. W. Alexander.

WEBSTER'S BELIEF.

The following inscription was, in brief, Mr Webster's confession of faith, or testimony in favor of Christianity. It was dictated by Mr. Webster a fortnight before his death, and may now be read on his monument:

"Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief."
Philosophical Argument, especially that drawn from the vastness of the Universe, in comparison with the apparent insignificance of this globe, has sometimes shaken my reason for the faith which is in me; but my heart has always assured and re-assured me, that the gospel of Jesus Christ must be a divine reality. The Sermon on the Mount cannot be merely human production. This belief enters into the very depth of my consciousness.
The whole history of man proves it.
DANIEL WEBSTER.

THE SABBATH.

The Sabbath is a divine institution, appointed and instituted by the Almighty directly, and that it did not cease at the introduction of Christianity, but was then re-established or re-appointed by the Church. The Church only incorporated the institution of the Sabbath into her system, the same as she did matrimony and other original institutions, and all the designs and uses that were designed in its institution, at the beginning, have entered with it into the system of Christianity, leaving out all the appendages and ceremonials that entered the Jewish Church with it!

God rested, he sanctified and hallowed it, set it apart for holy purposes. And it becomes a holy rest to us, when we are made holy, wise and good, by the use of the means that are placed before us, and in the use of those means we sanctify and keep holy the day.

The design, obviously, of fixing the time, by the Almighty, to the seventh day, was, that uniformity and harmony might everywhere prevail. Were it not so, every one might select his own day, and while some would be attending to the secular affairs of life, others would be engaged in worship, and their devotions interrupted by the noise and clamor around them.

How lovely, when the first rays of the morning sun begin to beam over a world just emerging from darkness and inactivity, how forcible the impression on the Christian's soul, that Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, rose from the dead, and dispels the gloom of night, and scatters the shades of night from the soul! How full the sensation, when like the calmness of morning, the quiet of the rest of eternity is foreshad

NOTICES OF ANNUAL CONFERENCES

The Philadelphia Annual Conference will meet in Trenton, N. J., on the 10th day of May, 1862, in the Mount Zion Church, at 9 o'clock

The New England Annual Conference will meet on the 31st day of May, at New Bedford, at 9 o'clock, A. M., in the A. M. E. Church

The members of these Conferences will strictly attend to the financial duties as laid down in the Discipline, and without which our itinerant progress will be impeded. Punctual attendance is requested.

A notice of my visits will be given in the future. W. NAZRET

REV. RICHARD ALLEN'S BIRTH DAY

The birth-day of Rev. Richard Allen, the Founder of the A. M. E. Church, comes, this year, on Friday, which is the fourteenth day of February. Now, as his name ought to be held in remembrance, by the young as well as the old, we would suggest to all of our Sabbath School Superintendents and Teachers that they have their schools to give an exhibition for the benefit of the Christian Recorder

We have some three hundred dollars to raise, and in the event that all our Sabbath Schools hold exhibitions on that day, or on the Thursday preceding, or the Tuesday following, we entertain strong hopes of being able to liquidate the debt. If our call is met by all our Sabbath Schools, or complied with, the not will be worthy of handing down as a bright example to future generations. We earnestly hope that the managers of the Sabbath Schools will see to the matter, and we shall take great pleasure in publishing the name of each school, and the amount contributed by them for the benefit of the Recorder.

NOTICE.

There will be a Quarterly Meeting in Union Church, Coates Street, on the 19th instant At 10 o'clock, A. M., Rev. Bishop Nazrey; at 3 o'clock, the Rev. Elisha Weaver; at 7 o'clock, P. M., Rev. A. L. Stanford.

REVIVALS.

The Good Spirit seems to be visiting many of the churches. The power of the Holy Ghost, Rev. F. Myers, of Bloomington circuit, Ill., says, has fallen upon many souls, and converted them to God, and thus added materially to the Church. The Rev. Wm. J. Davis, of Jacksonville, Ill., writes quite encouragingly. We would refer our readers to his letter in another column, for full details.

NORTH-WESTERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND JOURNAL.

This is one of our exchanges, and it is always received with a welcome hand. We entered into a fraternal relation when under the administration of that great and noble-hearted, freedom loving divine, the sainted WATSON, who is gone to rest with kindred angels. After his departure, our old friend and brother, Rev. T. H. Eddy, was promoted to the editorial chair, and since then he has attained to the degree of D. D. We think we like the paper equally as well under his management as when conducted by brother Watson. May it continue to prosper, and have a long life.

We copy the following interesting items from one of its columns in relation to Missionary effort We recommend the one from Rev. Bishop Burns, of Africa, as every way worthy of special attention:—

Arrival of Missionaries out.—Rev. R. S. Maclay, in a letter to the corresponding Secretary, dated Foh Chau, September 28th, 1861, says:—"We have at last reached the end of our long voyage. On Thursday, September 19th, we arrived safely in this city, and were permitted to greet all our friends and associates in this field of labor. Brother and Sister Sites are more than pleased with their situation and prospects For the present, and until their house is prepared for their occupancy, they find comfortable quarters and a cordial welcome with Brother and Sister Martin, of our mission. Their health is good, and they commence their missionary career in China under the most encouraging auspices. Allow me again to solicit for them an abiding interest in the prayers of God's people."

Africa.—Bishop Burns, under date of October 5d, writes to the Corresponding Secretary:—"I have nothing of special general interest at this moment to communicate, beyond the information that we are now having a season of refreshing in the Church in Monrovia. Several have experienced the forgiveness of their sins, among these a number of natives. The work has principally been with the Baptists, with whom many of our people have united in carrying on the meetings. We are now endeavoring to 'bless our own household' by having meetings twice a day in our church. At eleven o'clock last night James Midwinter Freeman, one of our youth on Bishop Scott's plan, a lad of fifteen years, came to our bed-room door, and told us, with streaming eyes, that 'God had given him religion.' The native portion of our city is sharing largely in this revival. Oh, where are the holy men and women for this work! O Lord, if thou help not, we are in trouble. This lad, a little over four years from the forest in the Vey country, now reads the Bible with ourselves and children in the family every morning, with another fellow of Vey, about the same age and opportunity. They both attend the primary department of the seminary, and will, I think, next year enter the higher department with several, principally Bassas Oh! if with our present prospects we had but the number of intelligent, disinterested, devoted workers required, to live at the points at which such service is now the requirement, I would say—oh yes! with a glad heart, I would say—'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.' On the last Sabbath I baptized three natives, and received them into the church."

A Life Directorship.—The standing of a man among his brethren, and of a pastor with his flock, is fairly inferrible from the honor they choose to bestow upon him through the missionary cause The Frank Street Church, Rochester, started a subscription last Sabbath to constitute S. S. Wood, Esq., a Life Director of the Parent Society, and determined not to leave the house until it was accomplished. Of course they did not detain themselves very long, though they took the good brother by such a "surprise" as caused him to find that he had forgotten to bring his "cambric" with him. Somebody was amusingly telling us that he actually had to borrow one. We do not pity him at all; he is used to serving other people just so. We only wish that a thousand other congregations in the land would moisten the eyes of their beloved brethren by just such service to the missionary cause

We also observed a very interesting statement from a very dear friend of ours, who is a missionary to India—JAMES HAVEN We used to meet together at the Preachers' Meeting in Chicago. We give the closing sentences of his letter, which read as follows:

Speaking of the troubles of his country, he says: "May the great God of nations bless our country, bring good out of evil, restore lasting peace as the fruit of the sore conflict and baptism of blood, nerve the arm that must strike for good government, humble the proud and exalt the lowly, give us back the days of the years of our fathers, and cause the wrath of man to praise him for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen"

A CARD

We call attention to the advertisement in our third column, of Mrs. S. Shorter Hawkins Mrs. Hawkins is a lady who has been in the hosiery, trimming and domestic goods business for a number of years. She is now disposing of goods at a reduced price, and lower than they can be bought elsewhere. Let everybody go to No 615 Lombard Street, and get a bargain

SPEECH OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS

As there are many who desire to see his speech in full, we take great pleasure in laying before our readers in the issue of this week the masterly address of FREDERICK DOUGLASS on the War, delivered in National Hall, Market Street, on Tuesday evening, the 14th inst

When Mr. Douglass came upon the platform, at 8 o'clock, P. M., precisely, he was greeted with the most enthusiastic applause by the large and respectable audience that had gathered, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, to hear the great orator. For ourself, we confess to an agreeable surprise as to his physique We had heard that his tall and manly form, his grand and kingly bearing, his dignified carriage, were bent beneath the weight of heavy care and thought—that the flash of his eye, the fire of his countenance, all lit up with the blaze of intellect, were gone—and, more than all, that the magnetism and melody of his wonderfully elastic voice, the soft and bewitching cadences, or the towering and majestic swell, in which it was wont to fall upon the ear in former days, were no more. But we saw, almost at a glance, that the Frederick Douglass before us was the Frederick Douglass of former days—and even more: his majestic bearing and dignity were not gone—the fire of his eye and the glow of his face were there—the power and influence of his voice, the cutting logic and lofty eloquence of other days, were not diminished. And to all these were added the depth and breadth of thought, and the candor of expression which constant investigation and increasing years cannot fail to bring. The printed words of his address will give our readers a fair view of the ideas, but no printed sentences can convey any adequate idea of the manner, the tone of voice, the gesticulation, the action, the round, soft, swelling pronunciation with which Frederick Douglass spoke, and which no orator we have ever heard can use with such grace, eloquence and effect as he.

EXPLANATION AND CORRECTION.

We are desired to state that the letter which appeared in the Recorder of last week, headed by us "Religious Instruction," was published without the authority of the writer, and that it was addressed to the editor by way of encouragement, and to point out to him what was deemed an error in the 51st No. of the Recorder, headed, "The means of grace," in which prayer seemed to be assigned a secondary place, and the continued inspiration power and workings of the Holy Spirit called in question

In the first paragraph of the letter as readers should read its readers, and "calls, conversions, illuminations of the mind, and similar exhibitions of Divine grace, do not now occur as in the case of Paul, or any other apostle," in the fifth paragraph, should have been credited to the author of the article on "The means of Grace," by quotation marks, as in the original.

HOW WE SPENT LAST SABBATH

In the morning we were at Bethel Church, and heard a sermon from these words:—"Behold, I will come quickly, to judge every man according to his deeds." Brother Eddy, who is a local deacon, not being well, spoke but a few moments, and we were requested to close after him At 3 o'clock, P. M., Mrs Weaver and myself attended the Union Church, Coates St. We had a sermon from the elder in charge, Rev. Henry Davis, from the following blessed words: "We would see Jesus." The speaker was truly doctrinal in his elucidation of the subject We don't know that ever we heard a sermon more appropriate for the occasion. There was a feeling of deep solemnity, and as for the doctrine and the plan of arrangement in which the speaker laid out his subject, we would judge from our feelings, and from the appearance of the audience, that all felt the power of truth dealt out to us. The only objection we found to it, it was a little too long for a sacramental occasion; but this is the fault, we think, generally down East. After sermon we were invited to consecrate the Sacrament of the Lord, after which there was a general rush for the table, among white and colored. O, blessed Jesus, it was a time, we think, long to be remembered! There was one thing about the administering of the Lord's Supper that we like, and ought to be observed on all occasions of this kind,—it is—brother Davis would not suffer the bread and wine to be served while the congregation were singing After they would stop, then the communicant would be supplied. This is what we believe is. At night we were at Little Wesley Church. The Rev. A. L. Stanford is in charge. We heard another very good sermon from Rev. Henry Davis again, as our ministers change pulpits occasionally; and had a very good meeting; On Monday night we were at Little Wesley's love feast, and they had one of the old time love feasts Nearly everybody seemed to have been full of the Holy Ghost

SUBSCRIPTION LIST

Our subscription is swelling some, but not near so fast as it ought to. Will the subscribers in our city and friends generally send in their subscription, at once, and not delay? We cannot work without money, you all know.

LETTER FROM REV W. W. GRIMES.

New Bedford, Jan 10th, 1862.

REV AND DEAR BROTHER —I have not written anything for the Christian Recorder for some time, but my much esteemed brother, H J. Johnson, has furnished you with all the news of importance from this quarter Dear brother, I wish you and your family a happy new year, and as you have been re-appointed by the Executive Committee to the editorial department, I hope you will meet with great success, and that the brethren from the East, West, North and South, will respond to your call, that the Recorder may live. One year has passed away; the prophecy of many has failed, and the paper still lives. May it continue to live a long life!

The Rev. Jacob Mitchell has come home, and is very sick, and has been, for the last three weeks. I am sorry to inform you that he is quite sick at this time. Christmas morning we had a glorious meeting; we had cause to rejoice, for God was with us; we had also a glorious watch meeting. The services commenced with a prayer meeting, short sermons by brother John Brown and Dr. Thomas Bayne, and at 11 o'clock I spoke from Deuteronomy v 3: "Who are all of us here alive this day." The Lord was with us. After watching the old year out in silent prayer, the members and friends presented the church with a donation of $41.59, as a new year's gift.

The Juvenile Sewing Circle, attached to the Sabbath school of this charge, held a fair for the benefit of the church during Christmas week, notwithstanding the hardness of the times, and the sister churches in the city had entertainments in some way or other. The young ladies did well: they presented to the trustees the sum of $25, for which they returned a vote of thanks. Great praise is due to the President of the Sewing Circle, Miss Mary Jane Banton, and the ladies that assisted her, Miss F. Ames, Miss Frances Banton Miss Columbia Wilkins, Miss H. Reame, Miss Mary C. Wilkins, and Miss Caroline Wilkins. May the Lord bless the young ladies!

Our Choir held a concert on Christmas night, but did not do so well. The singing was excellent, but met with poor patronage, so you see that we are not asleep in the East.

The Recorder for 1862 has come to hand, and I am trying to do more this year than last for its support. I think I will be successful. The times are hard, no work for the people to get, money scarce, those that would subscribe have not the money to do so. I will get them after awhile. Next Wednesday, the 15th, our annual election of trustees comes off Pray for us.

Yours fraternally,
WM. W. GRIMES.

LETTER FROM REV. W. J. DAVIS.

Jacksonville, Ill., Jan. 4th, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—Permit me, through your paper, to say something about this part of the Lord's vineyard I was very much discouraged when my appointment was read out to take charge of Jacksonville station, knowing that Jacksonville had no regular minister last year, but I entered immediately on my work, and truly I never was received more kindly on any station or circuit before. Our first quarterly meeting was held on the 2d and 3d of November. I wrote to Rev. B. Bridges, in Springfield, Ill., to come and help me, but owing to the embarrassed state of the church, he could not come. I then called on Rev. Charles Adams, President of the Female Academy, to assist me, which he did; and on Sabbath morning his text was in Luke xv. 17—19. His sermon was accompanied by the Holy Spirit. We protracted our meeting some five weeks. Six professed religion and joined church. Dr. Adams preached some three or four times for me, and other ministers assisted me. Truly the God of Jacob is our refuge.

I will now say something about the Christian Recorder. I have been rather discouraged about the Recorder, for I have not seen one for three months until this week. My paper stopped coming the last of October. I kept waiting for it to come, and at last I wrote to brother E. Weaver about my paper; so I have just received some six back numbers, for which I thank him. Such is my love for the Recorder, I expect to take it as long as it is in existence, and expect to keep it before my people. I expect to send you some money next month, and also some new subscribers for the paper.

AN UNKIND SPIRIT.

There are those who, if they see colored persons begging, point to it as evidence that they are incapable of taking care of themselves, and also as evidence of inferiority. Then again, if they are seen respectable in appearance, it is said that they are impudent and cunning; if they apply for work, the answer is that they don't give work to negroes. Such is the case at the present, notwithstanding the large amount of government contracts, for army clothing, and the necessary haste, in some respects, for the comfort of the soldier in the field. If colored women apply for work, they are answered that they give no work to colored people. We would have no complaint to make in this respect were the women incompetent to the task; but, through some liberal-hearted friends, some few have been furnished with work of every kind for the Government, and it is in evidence that they have invariably turned out the best work And now that, perhaps, the contracts of these friends have run out, these women are told when they call at other places—even where hands are published for—that they can have no work, though they may have the evidence of good workmanship on hand.

If such feelings were universal, property-holders would soon have cause to complain of increased rate of poor tax. To say the least of it, it is exceedingly thoughtless and unkind for its tendency is only to lighten the weights above, and increase the depths below.

BISHOP NAZREY, OR THE TRUE STATE OF THE CASE.

Within a few months past the peace and quietude of the A. M. E. Church, in some quarters, has been not a little disturbed, by a discussion of the question, What relationship does Bishop Nazrey sustain to the A. M. E. Church in the United States?

Much has been said and written within the time to which we have alluded, concerning the Bishop, all of which, we think, may be fairly reduced to the above stated question.

To this question three general answers have been returned by parties differing; one of which, and only one, can be true. 1st. It is assumed that Bishop Nazrey is legally one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church,—that he was duly elected and ordained to that office in 1852—and that he has occupied, and faithfully performed the duties of that office, in the said church, without any the least interruption from that time unto the present—that there has been no time whatever, when he for one moment ceased to be a Bishop in the said church—and that he is not now a Bishop in any other church whatsoever—that whatever relationship he may have sustained to the B. M. E. Church, in Canada, prior to the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church for 1860, ceased with his resignation, presented subsequently to the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church for 1860, and that since that resignation, and that time, he sustains no episcopal relationship to that church, and now is only one of the Bishops in common of the A. M. E. Church as formerly, prior to the formation of the B. M. E. Church. But, 2d It is assumed that Bishop Nazrey is the Bishop, and the only Bishop of the B. M. E. Church—that he was, upon the request of that church, according to her wishes expressed by an election in her General Convention for 1856, and in accordance with an expressed provision made for the same by the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church for 1856, elected and installed their Bishop, by the Bishops and delegates appointed for the purpose by the A. M. E. Church. It was understood by that church, that Bishop Nazrey was granted to the B. M. E. Church for all time to come—during his natural life, in view of which fact that church does not and will not quit claim to the mother church. It is claimed, that the A. M. E. Church having once granted to the B. M. E. Church one of her Bishops, in accordance with the wishes of the said B. M. E. Church, the said A. M. E. Church has no moral right, under heaven, to recall a Bishop so given—that Bishop Nazrey was in this way, and no other, given to the B. M. E. Church by the A. M. E. Church, therefore, he is the Bishop of the B. M. E. Church by and with the consent of the A. M. E. Church. But again, 3d. It is assumed, that Bishop Nazrey is legally and lawfully a Bishop in both of these churches for the following reasons: 1st. He is a Bishop in the A. M. E. Church because he was duly elected, and regularly ordained to fill that office in 1852, the duties of which he has faithfully performed from that time until the present When the Canadian Church asked the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church, in 1856, to allow Bishop Nazrey to resign his relationship to said Church, that he might be able to serve the church in Canada, the A. M. E. Church granted that request. While it is certainly true that she did pass a unanimous vote to grant the Canada Church one of her Bishops, that General Conference did not provide that the said Bishop, chosen by the Canadian Church, should cease to be a Bishop in the A. M. E. Church whenever he might become the Bishop of the Canadian Church So far from this, it is a well known fact, that Bishop Nazrey did become the Bishop of the B. M. E Church, and after that did exercise the episcopal office, as formerly, in the A. M. E. Church without interruption.

The two Associate Bishops, in all the Conferences which they held from 1856 to 1860, decided that Bishop Nazrey was legally and lawfully a Bishop in both the A. M. E. and B. M. E. Churches. In this capacity, they not only acknowledged him, but did also labor and act with him. This state of things continued until the General Conference of 1860. That Conference did not decide that Bishop Nazrey was not a Bishop of the A. M. E. Church, but rather decided he was one of her Bishops, and requested him to resign his official relation to the B. M. E. Church, and give them the form of his letter of resignation, to be presented at the next ensuing General Conference; this he did in accordance with their request He would have left the A. M. E. Conference, but she would not let him go. He came to the Pittsburgh Conference, expecting nothing less than to receive the blessings of his brethren, and like Paul and Barnabas be separated for the work to which the Holy Ghost appointed him. But no, says the Pittsburgh Conference, we cannot let you go, you must remain with us yet awhile longer, and resign your relationship as Bishop to the other church, to take effect after you have met with the church in General Conference. Here is no alteration in the relationship of Bishop Nazrey to the A. M. E. Church up to this period. The Conference adjourned, and we have heard of his making no alteration from that time until the present. Therefore, he is a Bishop of the A. M. E. Church in common with Bishops Quinn and Payne. He is not dead. He has not been expelled. He has not withdrawn, nor has he removed by certificate. In none of the above stated ways has Bishop Nazrey gone out of the A. M. E. Church. But these are the only ways in which he could be removed, therefore he is a member and a Bishop in the A. M. E. Church.

Secondly. But the B. M. E. Church claims Bishop Nazrey, legally and lawfully, by and with the consent and will of the A. M. E. Church, to be her Bishop, because he was given to her in accordance with her wishes, 1856, as provided by the General Conference at Cincinnati in that year. This grant was without limitation, restriction, or reservation The B. M. E Church General Conference of 1860, in view of the previous action of the A. M. E Church in 1856, and their own action in consequence of and upon the authority of that, and at that time, now refuse to receive and approve of the resignation of Bishop Nazrey from the B. M. E Church, but still hold him as their legal and lawful Bishop in accordance with the doings of both these bodies of Christians in their official capacity for 1856. Therefore Bishop Nazrey is the Bishop of the B. M. E. Church according to her own acts for 1860.

That Bishop Nazrey now sustains the double relation of Bishop, in both the A. M. E. Church and the B. M. E. Church, will appear from the following actions

First The A. M. E General Conference passed the following resolutions:—1st. Resolved, That Bishop Willis Nazrey alone is the General Superintendent of the B. M. E. Church in Canada 2d. Resolved, That the General Conference must respectfully request Bishop Nazrey to resign whatever relation he sustains to the B. M. E Church. 3d Resolved, That this resignation take effect immediately upon the passage of these resolutions, provided, nevertheless, that he shall have sufficient time to meet the General and Annual Conferences of the B. M. E. Church

To all whom it may concern: This is to certify that I do hereby resign my official relation as General Superintendent of the B. M. Church in Canada West. The above resignation is to take effect on and after the rise of the General Conference, which will sit in Toronto, Canada West, on the first Monday of September, 1861

(Signed,) WILLIS NAZREY

By these acts Bishop Nazrey's relationship to the A. M. E Church, as one of her Bishops, was perpetuated, and continueth until the present hour

Secondly. Bishop Nazrey met the B. M. E General Conference, and offered that body his resignation, whereupon they received it and laid it upon the table. After which they passed a resolution declaring him to be the permanent Bishop of the B. M. E. Church, in accordance with their own previous action, approved and confirmed by the action of the A. M. E. Church in General Conference assembled. The last acts of the B. M. E. Church needed one thing only to make them legal and permanent acts binding upon all men; that one thing was, the consent of Bishop Nazrey to allow them to use his name as formerly in connexion with their publications, though he might not, for the time being, exercise the episcopal functions, as the active General Superintendent of that body This they obtained He granted to them the use of his name, with the distinct understanding that he would not exercise or perform the active duties of the office of a General Superintendent, only for the time being. This agreement between the Bishop and the B. M. E. General Conference, confirmed him as the legal Bishop of the B. M. E. Church. It should also be taken into the account that the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church at that session, provided that any one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church should be invited, and have full power to hold the Annual Conferences of the B. M. E. Church.

Now it follows, necessarily, that if the General Conference of the A. M. E Church of 1860 had the more right to request Bishop Nazrey to resign from the B. M. E. Church to serve the A. M. E Church, then the B. M. E. Church had the more right to request Bishop Nazrey to allow them to use his name in their publications, and also to request any one of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church to hold their annual Conferences from time to time during the then ensuing four years And, moreover, they had it in their power to make the acts of those Bishops legal within their own border, during that term of four years, all of which they have done. Bishops Quinn and Payne have both the moral and legal right to accept of an invitation to hold the next ensuing Annual Conference of the B. M. E. Church, and their acts in that Conference, upon such invitation, will be lawful beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt

Does not this state of things require that the Bishops and members of the A. M. E. Church should come together, in the name of the Lord, and make a friendly settlement of these disputed questions? It can be done, it should be done, and the men who love the cause of God and his Church more than they do endless disputations, should meet together and settle them.

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE OVER MAN.

The instant a woman tries to manage a man for herself, she has begun to win him. The lovely creeper clings in its feebleness with grace to the stately tree; but if it outgrow, as if to protect or conceal its supporter, it speedily destroys what it would otherwise adorn. When the serpent had persuaded Eve that she should induce her husband to take her advice, and become as knowing as herself, she no longer felt made for him, and both for God, but rather that he was made to admire her. When she prevailed, they soon bickered out their right places, no doubt, for God's law was lost sight of by both. One grand purpose of woman's power over man's heart, now that both are falling, is the maintenance of man's self respect A man who loves a true hearted woman aims to sustain in himself whatever such a woman can love and reverence. They mutually put each other in mind of what each ought to be to the other. To the formation of manly character, the love and reverence of the virtuous feminine character is essential. One must see in the other's love the reflection of the character desired. Hence, the pertinacity of true love and reverence often recovers a character that otherwise would be lost forever. If once mutual respect depart, then farewell the love that once can rectify what is wrong; then farewell the heart rest, without which life becomes a delirium and an agony. If it be the faculty of woman to love more tenaciously than man, hers might surpass his, so far as he is ever showing it. In expressing love, without at the same time indicating her faith in the inherent dignity of man, however obscured, she only repels him to a worse condition, by exciting a reckless sense of his own worthlessness, together with a hatred of her forgiving patronage. When man hates himself, what can he love? Give him time, and he will love the soul that clings to him to save him. MISS R. A. JACKSON

THE LETTER FROM REV J. P CAMPBELL.

The letter from Rev. J. P. Campbell, one of our corresponding editors, on the relation of Bishop Nazrey, will be read with much interest As it has just come, we have no time to comment on it, it having been the last piece set up

A SAD CASUALTY

The body of Mr. Samuel Woodlin, who resided in Thirty-ninth Street, and was employed as waiter on the steamer Isaac Newton, was found in the ice near Castleton, on the 26th ult. It is supposed that he was walking on the railroad, and the night being dark and stormy, he fell through an opening on said road, and thus met his terrible fate. He was a native of Philadelphia, where, we understand, he has relatives living. A wife and two small children are left to mourn his loss

THE GREAT SPEECH.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS ON THE WAR.

My purpose to-night is not to win applause. I have no high-sounding professions of patriotism to make. He is the best friend of this country, who at this tremendous crisis, dares tell his countrymen the truth, however disagreeable that truth may be.

Many things have been said against the free colored people of the north, and a strong current is turned against them; but I believe that up to this time, no man, however malignant, has cast the shadow of a doubt upon the loyalty and patriotism of the free colored people, in this the hour of the nation's trial

Without exulting, but with thankfulness, I may say it, while treason and rebellion have counted upon aid and comfort all over the North, among those who have every reason to be true and faithful to the State, no rebel or traitor has dared look at the free colored man of the North, but as an enemy.

Ladies and Gentlemen:—I am to speak to you of the civil war, by which this vast country—this continent is convulsed.

The theme is most solemn. The fate of the greatest of all modern Republics trembles in the balance. To be, or not to be, that is the question. The lesson of the hour is written down in characters of blood and fire.

We are taught, as with the emphasis of an earthquake, that nations, not less than individuals, are subjects of the moral government of the universe, and that flagrant, long continued, and persistent transgression of the laws of this Divine Government will certainly bring national sorrow, shame, suffering and death.

Hitherto, we have been content to study this lesson in the history of ancient governments and nationalities. To-day, every thoughtful American citizen is compelled to look at home. Egypt, Palestine, Greece, and Rome, all had their warnings. They disregarded them, and they perished

To-day, we have our warning, not in comets blazing through the troubled sky, but in the terrible calamity of wide-spread rebellion.

The American Republic is not yet a single century from the date of its birth. Measuring its age by that of other great nations, our great Republic, for such it truly is—great in commerce, great in numbers, great in mechanical skill, great in mental, moral, and physical resources, great in all the elements of national greatness—fills but a speck on the dial plate of time, and stands within the inner circle of childhood.

In the brief space of three quarters of a century, this young nation, full of promise and the hope of political liberty throughout the world, rose from three millions to thirty millions. Its mighty heart beats with the blood of all nations. It was literally sown in weakness and raised in power. It began life in toil and poverty, and up to the present moment, it is conspicuous among the nations of the earth for opulence and ease.

In the fulness of our national strength and glory, we had already begun to congratulate ourselves upon the wisdom and stability of our government. When all Europe, a few years ago, was convulsed with revolution and bloodshed, America was secure, and sat as a queen among the nations of the earth, knowing no sorrow and fearing none.

To-day, all is changed The face of every loyal citizen is sickled over with the pale cast of thought. Every pillar in the national temple is shaken. The nation itself has fallen asunder in the centre. A million of armed men confront each other. Hostile flags wave defiance in sight of the national capital. Our riches take wings. Credit is disturbed, business is interrupted, national debt—the mill-stone on the neck of nations—and heavy taxation, which breaks the back of loyalty, loom in the distance. As the war progresses, property is wantonly destroyed, the wires are broken down, bridges demolished, railroads are pulled up and barricaded by fallen trees; still more and worse, the great writ of habeas corpus is suspended from necessity, liberty of speech and of the press have ceased to exist. An order from Richmond or Washington,—one stroke of the pen from Davis or Lincoln, sends any citizen to prison, as in England three centuries ago, British subjects were sent to the Tower of London. A hateful system of espionage is in process of formation, while war and blood mantles the whole land as with the shadow of death. The scene need not be further portrayed. It is dismal and terrible beyond all description We have it burnt into our very souls. I will not mock you by further painting this dreadful calamity.

The spoilers of the Republic have dealt with the nation like burglars—stealing all they could carry away and burning the residue. They have emptied your treasury, plundered your arsenals, scattered your navy, corrupted your army, seduced your officers, seized your forts, severed the sea with pirates, heated your enemies, cooled your friends, insulted your flag, defied your government, and have converted the national defences into instruments of national destruction. All this and more has been done by the very men whom you have honored, paid, and trusted, and that too, while they were solemnly sworn to protect, support, and defend your constitution and government against all foes at home and abroad

To what cause may we trace our present sad and deplorable condition? A man of flighty brain and flippant tongue will tell you that the cause of all our national trouble lies solely in the election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency of the Republic To the superficial this is final. Before Lincoln there was peace, after Lincoln there was rebellion. It stands to reason, that Lincoln and Rebellion are related as cause and effect. I hardly need waste your time in showing the folly and falsehood of this explanation. Beyond all question the facts show that this rebellion was planned and prepared long before the name of Abraham Lincoln was mentioned in connexion with the office he now holds, and that though the catastrophe might have been postponed, it could not have been long prevented, nor long delayed

In dealing with the cause of our present troubles, we find in quarters high and low, the most painful evidences of dishonesty. It would seem in the language of Isaiah, that the whole head is sick, and the whole heart is faint, that there is no soundness in it. After-coming generations will remark with astonishment this feature in this dark chapter in our national history. They will find in no part the document emanating from the Loyal Government, anything like a frank and full statement of the real causes which have plunged us into the whirlpool of civil war. On the other hand, they will find the most studied and absurd attempts at concealment. Jefferson Davis is reticent. He seems ashamed to tell the world just what he is fighting for. Abraham Lincoln seems equally so, and is ashamed to tell the world what he is fighting against

Our astute Secretary of State is careful to enjoin it upon our foreign ministers to remain dumb in respect to the real causes of the rebellion They are to say nothing of the moral differences existing between the two sections of the country. There must be no calling things by their right names, no going straight to any point, which can be reached by a crooked path. When slaves are referred to, they must be called persons held to service or labor. When in the hands of the Federal Government, they are called contrabands—a name that will apply better to a pistol, than to a person. The preservation of slavery is called the preservation of the rights of the South under the Constitution. This concealment is one of the most contemptible features of the crisis. Every cause for the rebellion but the right one is pointed out and dwelt upon Some make it Geographical, others make it Ethnographical

"Land-locked, seized by a narrow frith abhor each other,
Mountains interposed make enemies of nations,
Which else like kindred drops had mingled into one."

But even this cause does not hold here. There is no geographical reason for national division Every stream is bridged, and every mountain is tunnelled. All our rivers and mountains point to union, not division, to oneness, not to warfare. There is no earthly reason why the corn fields of Pennsylvania should quarrel with the cotton fields of South Carolina. The physical and climatic differences bind them together, instead of putting them asunder.

A very large class of persons charge all our national calamities upon the busy tongues and pens of the abolitionists. These according to a handful of men and women everywhere despised, a power superior to all other classes in the country.

Others still explain the whole matter, by telling us that it is the work of defeated and disappointed politicians at the South. I shall waste no time upon either. The cause of this rebellion is deeper down than either Southern politicians or Northern abolitionists They are but the hands of the clock The machinery moves not because of the hands, but the hands because of the machinery. The ship may be great, but the ocean that bears it is greater. The Southern politicians and the Northern abolitionists are the fruits, not the trees. They indicate, but are not original causes. The trouble is deeper down, and is fundamental; there is nothing strange about it. The conflict is in every way natural. "How can two walk together except they be agreed? "No man can serve two masters." "A house divided against itself cannot stand" It is something of a feat to ride two horses going the same way, and at the same pace, but a still greater feat when going in opposite directions.

Just here lies the true explanation of our troubles. We have made the mistake, the great and deplorable mistake of supposing that we could sow to the wind without reaping the whirlwind. We have attempted to maintain our Union in utter defiance of the moral chemistry of the universe. We have endeavored to join together things which to their nature stand eternally asunder. We have sought to bind the chains of slavery on the limbs of the black man, without thinking that at last we should find the other end of that hateful chain about our own necks.

A glance at the history of the settlement of the two sections of this country, will show that the causes which produced the present rebellion, reach back to the dawn of civilization on this continent.

In the same year that the Mayflower landed her liberty-seeking passengers on the bleak New England shore, a Dutch galliot landed a cargo of African slaves on the banks of James River, Virginia. The Mayflower planted liberty in the North, and the Dutch galliot slavery at the South. There is the fire, and there is the gunpowder. Contact has produced the explosion.

The statesmanship of the last half century has been mainly taxed to perpetuate the American Union. A system of compromises and concessions has been adopted. A double-dealing policy—a facing-both-ways statesmanship, naturally sprung up, and became fashionable—so that political success was often made to depend upon political cheating. One section or the other must be deceived. Before railroads and electric wires were spread over the country, this trickery and fraud had a chance of success. The lightning made deception more difficult, and the Union by compromise impossible.

In order to have Union, either in the family, in the church, or in the state, there must be unity of idea and sentiment in all essential interests. Find a man's treasure, and you have found his heart. Now, in the North, freedom is the grand and all-comprehensive condition of comfort, prosperity, and happiness. All our ideas and sentiments grow out of this free element. Free speech, free soil, free men, free schools, free inquiry, free suffrage, equality before the law, are the natural outgrowths of freedom. Freedom is the centre of our Northern social system. It warms into life every other interest, and makes it beautiful in our eyes.

What freedom is to the North as a generator of sentiment and ideas, slavery is to the South. It is the treasure to which the Southern heart is fastened. It fashions all their ideas, and moulds all their sentiments. Politics, education, literature, morals, and religion in the South, all bear the bloody image and superscription of slavery. Here, then, are two direct, point-blank, and irreconcilable antagonisms under the same form of government. The marvel is not that civil war has come, but that it did not come sooner.

But the evil is now upon us, and the question as to the causes which produce it, is of less consequence than the question as to how it ought to and can be thrown off. How shall the civil war be ended?

It can be ended for a time in one of two ways. One by recognising the complete independence of the Southern Confederacy, and indemnifying her for all the expense to which she has been put, in carrying out this tremendous slaveholding rebellion; and the second is by receiving the slaveholding states back into the Union, with such guarantees for slavery as they may demand

In either of these two ways it may be put down for a time; but God forbid that any such methods of obtaining peace shall be adopted; for neither the one nor the other would bring any permanent peace

I take it that these United States are to remain united. National honor requires national unity. To abandon that idea would be a disgraceful, scandalous, and cowardly surrender of the majority to a rebellious minority and would draw after it a train of disasters, such as would heap curses on the very graves of the present generation.

As to giving the slave states new guarantees for the safety of slavery, that I take to be entirely out of the question. The South does not want them—and the North could not give them, if they could accept them To concede anything to these slaveholding traitors and rebels in arms, all their atrocious crimes against justice, humanity, and every sentiment of loyalty, would be tantamount to the nation's defeat; and would substitute in the future, the bayonet for the ballot, and cannon balls for Congress—revolution and anarchy for govern ment.

There is therefore no escape. The only road to national honor, and permanent peace to us, is to meet, fight, dislodge, drive back conquer, and subdue the rebels.

When a man and woman are lawfully joined together for life, the only conditions upon which there can be anything like peace in the family, are that they shall love or fear each other

Now, during the last fifty years the North has been endeavoring, by all sorts of services and kindnesses, to win and secure the affection of the South. It has stepped sometimes a little beyond the requirements of true manly dignity to accomplish this, but all in vain

At this hour there is everywhere at the South, nursed and cherished, the most deadly hate towards every man and woman of Northern birth We, here at the North, do not begin to understand the strength, and bitter intensity of this slaveholding malice. Mingled with it is a supercilious sense of superiority—a scornful contempt—the strutting pride of the turkey—with the cunning and poison of the rattlesnake.

I say again, we must meet them, defeat them, and conquer them. Do I hear you say that this is more easily said than done? I admit it Nevertheless there is a way to do it, and to do it effectually

I have not a very exalted opinion of Southern courage, notwithstanding the successes attending their arms, thus far, during the rebellion. Their domestic habits make them passionate and cruel, but not calm and brave. They will readily fight when they have every advantage. They can whip a negro with his hands tied, catch a Connecticut peddler a thousand miles from home, beat and ride him out of town on a rail—capture a hospital full of sick folks—bombard, with ten thousand men, a starving garrison of seventy men

I never got into a dispute with one of these Southern braves yet, but that he expressed the wish that he had me in the South—where, of course, he would have every advantage.

But how shall the rebellion be put down? I will tell you; but before I do so you must allow me to say, that the plan thus far pursued does not correspond with my humble notion of fitness.

Thus far, it must be confessed, we have struck wide of the mark, and very feebly withal. The temper of our steel has proved better than the temper of our minds. While I do not charge, as some have done, that the Government at Washington is conducting the war upon peace principles, it is very plain that the war is not being conducted on war principles.

We are fighting the rebels with only one hand, when we ought to be fighting them with both. We are recruiting our troops in the towns and villages of the north, when we ought to be recruiting them on the plantations of the South. We are striking the guilty rebels with our soft, white hand, when we should be striking with the iron hand of the black man, which we keep chained behind us. We have been catching flies instead of arming them. We have thus far neglected our natural friends to win the worthless and hellish friendship of our unnatural enemies. We have been endeavoring to heal over the rotten cancer of slavery, instead of cutting out its death-dealing roots and fibres. We pay more attention to the advice of the half-rebel state of Kentucky, than to any suggestion coming from the loyal North. We have abandoned all the burdens of slavery, and given the slaveholders and traitors all its benefits; and robbed our cause of half its dignity in the eyes of an on-looking world.

I say here and now, that if this nation is destroyed—if the government shall, after all, be broken to pieces, and degraded in the eyes of the world—if the Union shall be shattered into fragments, it will neither be for the want of men, nor of money, nor even physical courage, for we have all these in abundance; but it will be solely owing to the want of moral courage and wise statesmanship in dealing with slavery, the cause and motive of the rebellion.

Witness the treatment of Fremont's proclamation. When that memorable document was given to the public, all truly loyal men felt that the path-finder of the Rocky mountains had found the true path out of our national trouble. His words were few and simple, but strong enough to vibrate the heart of a continent. The weakness and imbecility of the letter of the President condemning that proclamation, have thus far characterized the war The President attests that he approved of the proclamation generally, but disapproved of one feature of it. What was the proclamation generally? Why this: the establishment of martial law in Missouri. The President approved of that. I have been often asked since this war began, why I am not at the South battling for Freedom.

My answer is with the government. The Washington Government wants men for its army, but thus far, it has not had the boldness to recognise the manhood of the race to which I belong. It only sees in the slave an article of commerce, a contraband.

I do not wish to say aught against our government, for good or bad; it is all we have to save us from anarchy and ruin; but I owe to my race, in view of the cruel aspersions cast upon it, to affirm that, in denying them the privilege to fight for their country, they have been most deeply and grievously wronged

Neither in the revolution, nor in the last war did any such narrow and contemptible policy obtain It shows the deep degeneracy of our times—the height from which we have fallen—that, while Washington, in 1776, and Jackson, in 1814, could fight side by side with negroes, now, not even the best of our generals are willing so to fight. Is McClellan better than Washington? Is Halleck better than Jackson?

One situation only has been offered me. We have recently had a solemn fast, and have offered up innumerable prayers for the deliverance of the nation from its manifold perils and calamities. I say nothing against these prayers Their subjugative power is indispensable; but I know also, that the work of making and the work of answering them, must be performed by the same hands If the loyal North shall succeed in suppressing this foul and scandalous rebellion, that achievement will be due to the amount of wisdom and force they bring against the rebels to arms

Thus far we have shown no lack of force. A call for men is answered by half a million. A call for money brings down a hundred millions. A call for prayers brings a nation to its altars But still the rebellion rages. Washington is menaced The Potomac is blockaded Jeff Davis is still proud and defiant, and the rebels are looking forward hopefully to a recognition of their independence, the breaking of the blockade, and their final severance from the North

Now, what is the remedy for all this?

The answer is ready. Have done at once and forever, with the wild and guilty phantasy, that any one man can have a right of property in the body and soul of another man

Have done with the now exploded idea, that the old Union, which has hobbled along through seventy years upon the crutches of compromise, is either desirable or possible, now, or in the future.

Accept the incontestible truth of the irrepressible conflict. It was spoken when temptations to compromise were less strong than now.

Banish from your political dreams the last lingering adumbration that this great American nation can ever rest firmly and securely upon a mixed basis, part of iron clay—part free, and part slave. The experiment has been tried, and tried under more favorable circumstances than any which the future is likely to offer, and has deplorably failed. Now lay the axe at the root of the tree, and give it—root, top, body, and branches to the consuming fire. You have now the opportunity

> "There is a tide in the affairs of men
> Which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.
> Omitted, all the voyage of their lives
> Is bound in shallows and in miseries.
> On such a full sea, are we now afloat
> We must take the current when it serves,
> Or lose our ventures."

To let this occasion pass unimproved, for getting rid of slavery, would be a sin against unborn generations. The cup of its iniquity is full and running over—now let it be disposed of and finished forever Reason, common sense, justice and humanity alike concur with this necessary step for the national safety

But it is contended that the nation at large has no right to interfere with slavery in the States. That the Constitution gives no power to abolish slavery. This pretext is flung at us at every corner, by the same men, who, a few months ago told us we had no Constitutional right to coerce a seceded State, no right to collect revenue in the harbors of such States, and it is part and parcel of the same nonsense.

In the first place, slavery has no Constitutional existence in this country. There is not a provision of that instrument which would be contravened by its abolition

But if every line and syllable of the Constitution contained an explicit prohibition of the abolition of slavery, the right of the nation to abolish it would still remain in full force. In virtue of a principle underlying all government—that of national self-preservation, the nation can no more be bound to disregard this, than a man can be bound to commit suicide. This law of self-preservation is the great end and object of all government and constitutions. The means can never be superior to the end. But will our Government ever arrive at this conclusion? That will depend upon two very opposite elements

First, as to the sum of Northern virtue

Secondly, as to the extent of Southern villany.

I have much confidence in Northern virtue, but much more in Southern villany. Events are greater than either party to the conflict. We are fighting not only a wicked and determined foe, but a maddened and desperate foe. We are not fighting serviles, but our masters; men who have ruled over us for fifty years. If hard-pushed, we may expect them to break through all the restraints of civilized warfare.

I am still hopeful that the Government will take direct and powerful abolition measures That hope is founded upon the fact that the Government has already travelled further in that direction, than is promised. I have great hope that the Government will come to this We have seen great changes—everybody has changed—the North has changed—Democrats have changed,—Republicans have changed—and even the Garrisonians, of whom it has been said that repentance is not among their virtues, even they have changed; and from being the stern advocates of a dissolution of the Union, they have become the uncompromising advocates of the perpetuity of the Union. I believed ten years ago that liberty was safer in the Union than out of the Union, but my Garrisonian friends could not then accept it, and of consequence dealt me some heavy blows My crime was in being ten years in advance of them But whether the Government shall directly abolish slavery or not, the war is essentially an abolition war. When the storm clouds of this rebellion shall be lifted from the land—the slave power, broken and humbled, will be revealed Slavery will be a conquered power in the land. I am therefore for the war, for the Government, for the Union, for the Constitution in any and every event

Personal.

Hon. Anson Burlingame, United States Minister to China, has safely arrived at London and would in a few days proceed to the capital. He was well received

Wm. M Brown, an Englishman and formerly editor of the New York Journal of Commerce, it is stated in the Richmond Enquirer, is the acting Secretary of State in the Cabinet of the Southern Confederacy, in the temporary absence of R M T Hunter. If this be true, it favors the report at one time current that Messrs Hunter and J C Breckinridge have by some means left this country as new Confederate commissioners to Europe.

Sir Joseph Paxton of England has been returned by the Imperial Government of France, to superintend the erection of the building for the great exhibition in Paris in 1866—a building whose dome shall be 500 feet high, and all the rest of the structure shall be of proper proportions with it.

Hon. H J Raymond, of the New York Times has been elected Speaker of the House of Assembly in the Legislature of New York.

P T Barnum, so well known in connexion with the New York Museum, recently tendered the use of the lecture room of his Museum to the Christian Alliance for a Union Prayer Meeting, on the last night of the old year, and was to allow meetings in the same room every Sabbath, commencing at 3 o'clock. P M

Ex-Governor Moorehead, of Kentucky, who has for some time been confined at Fort Warren, Boston, for complicity with the Southern rebellion, was released on the 8th inst.

Africa—Catholicism and Protestantism in Africa.—In the official report of the Niger Valley Exploring Party, Mr. Delany, the editor, says, in all his travels in Africa, he never saw or heard of Roman Catholic missionaries; but that it is a surprising fact, that at every slave-trading point where the traffic is carried on, is either a Roman Catholic trading post, or a native agency protected by Roman Catholics. The slave trade is carried on in its worst forms at all those places where the Jesuit missionaries are stationed, and slaves are held by white foreigners at the old Portuguese settlements along the southern and eastern coasts, though the King of Portugal, three years ago, proclaimed liberty to all the people in his dominions. Roman Catholic Spain, the only professing Christian government which still tolerates this inhuman traffic, has expelled every Protestant missionary from the island of Fernando Po, that they might command it unmolested as an export mart for the African slave-trade. The other hand, he states that wherever Protestant missionaries are found in Africa, there are visible evidences of a higher and purer civilization, in the Sabbath and secular schools, in the introduction of the manners and customs, the arts and sciences of civilized life, and in the high regard set upon the Christian religion, and the faith reposed in the moral integrity of the missionaries.

For Liberia.—It is supposed that between one and two hundred colored people from the neighborhood of Wilmington, Delaware, will leave for Liberia in the bark Mary Caroline Stephens, on the first of April Religion in our Navy.—It is remarked, with satisfaction, that the navy displays strong evidences of religious convictions. It is stated that Com. Stringham would never fire a salute on Sunday; but when one was due on that day, would send word that he would do so on Monday. Three other commanders, whom recent events have brought into notice, are also said to be men of consistent Christian character. The Observer states that the Niagara has enjoyed an almost constant revival since she left the country to convey to their homes the Japanese Ambassadors, and has had some seventy praying men among her company, twelve of them being officers. The same authority also states that there are members of the Mariners' Church, in New York, on nearly thirty ships of war, as many of which the daily prayer meeting is observed, and that the pastor of that church has correspondents on board nearly fifty of these national ships.

France—A writer in Mac Millan's Magazine, London, says of France, that "Germany was far less prepared for religious reform when the Monk of Wittenburg placarded his thesis on Indulgences. A single man would, probably, not do now a work which needs to go farther than his, which must be more reconstructive than destructive. But a single earnest Bishop, and half a dozen earnest priests might, I believe, under God's Spirit, entirely change the face of Christianity in France, and give a noble nation that which, most of all things, it wants, a truly Christian, but at the same time truly national church."

Rev S. F Mines, who was taken prisoner at the battle of Bull Run, while he was acting as chaplain of the Second Maine Regiment, has been released from his long imprisonment at Richmond, on an exchange with Rev. N. G. North of Charlestown, Va., who was captured by the Federal troops in a battle near Harper's Ferry, and had been confined at Fort Warren.

Rev M. P Parmelee has resigned the chaplaincy of the Third Regiment of Vermont Volunteers, for the purpose of entering the foreign missionary field, under the direction of the American Board

The Rev Henry Ward Beecher's Church.—The Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, had its annual pew renting on the 7th inst. The highest premium paid was $100, and the lowest $1—the average being $30 to $40 for each choice. Between thirty and forty pews were left over unsold—a circumstance without precedent. Among those who paid the higher premiums I see the names of Moses S. Beach, of the New York Sun; A. Claflin, of the firm of Claflin & Miller, and Charles Gould, the publisher. The total sum realised by the sale is $12,050

Our Army and Navy.—Their Movements.—Army of the West.—The several detachments of the powerful column of General Buell, in Kentucky, from different points, are closing around the rebel inland stronghold of Bowling Green; while from our own stronghold of Cairo a formidable flotilla, with a corresponding land force, is on the eve of starting towards the fortified rebel camp at Columbus, on the Mississippi River. The rebel army at Bowling Green is supposed to be not less than sixty-five thousand men, and their army at Columbus is set down at about twenty thousand. On our side, the advancing forces of General Buell will, it is believed, present an aggregate of not less than seventy thousand men; and that the column of General McClernand, from Cairo, with some important reinforcements from General Smith, at Paducah, will amount to full thirty thousand men. Both of these moving columns are admirably equipped, and amply provided with good artillery; and from the splendid fighting qualities already displayed in every sort of encounter by our Western Union troops, we have no hesitation in submitting the prediction that before the end of the present month we shall have some grand and decisive Union victories in the West.

Our Navy.—The Burnside naval expedition has moved down from Annapolis to Hampton Roads, (Fortress Monroe) and is only waiting the signal for a dash upon the enemy at some important point or two on the Southern seaboard. The practical knowledge derived from the Cape Hatteras and Port Royal expeditions has contributed materially to make this expedition of Burnside a certain success against any point which it may assail, and to justify the opinion that Burnside, having dislodged his enemy from his first position, will instantly follow him up, disperse his forces or capture them, and strike at their main arteries of inland communication between Virginia and the cotton States. Simultaneously with the thunders of our artillery in the West, we may expect to hear of the shelling out of the enemy somewhere in the South-east by the Burnside expedition.

Army of the Potomac.—Is General McClellan, with his two hundred thousand men, to remain stationary all this time? Beauregard, it appears, is under this impression; for he has put his troops at Centreville, and along Bull Run and the Occoquan, actively to work in the erection of log huts for their winter quarters. But this signifies nothing. We presume, on the contrary, that, as General McClellan has not proceeded to the building of log huts, he as soon as he put his army in motion. We think, too, that the intelligent reader will be able to discover, from the other army movements indicated, that they are but parts of a grand system of combined operations, in which the army of the Potomac will strike the heaviest and finishing blows. The facts we have recited are sufficient to show that the grand winter campaign of our army and navy which will inevitably crush this rebellion, has already begun, and that, so far as our army and navy are concerned, there is no longer any ground for complaint of a wasteful and demoralising inactivity. The army and navy are in motion, and we shall not have to wait much longer for some decisive results

Financial Difficulties—Their Cause and Cure.—The House of Representatives, paid off in gold, appears still to be ignorant of the fact that gold is selling at three to four per cent premium And why this premium, with a specie basis of three hundred millions in the country? Is it risen from the absence of any provision on the part of Congress for the ultimate and final redemption of the present and prospective paper money issues on the part of the government An expenditure of six hundred millions a year upon a cash basis of sixty millions of receipt is shaking the confidence of the country in Treasury paper and all other sorts of paper money. The safety of the Treasury and the interests of the financial, commercial, and all other business classes of the country demand a cash basis for these war expenses of the Treasury of two hundred millions, or additional direct and indirect taxation on the part of Congress equal to one hundred and fifty millions income to the Treasury.

Southern Despondency.—It seems to be the popular impression—we see it in men's faces when we do not hear it in their words—that the military affairs of the Confederacy are not very cheering just now. The affair at Dranesville contributed its mite to the depression of public spirit. We are so unused to adversity, that any thing which is not a brilliant success seems defeat. They have crossed that river, which many thought would be their Styx, and are advancing in force. In Missouri, too, our banner seems to trail, for the telegraph tells us that Price is in full retreat. Thus the enemy seems to be progressing along our northern frontier, while all around us he lords it on our coast, organising his expeditions on our soil and threatening us with future invasion These are the points of the situation

A lull, a pause, a suspense ensues preceded by minor events which cause a feeling of apprehension more than of confidence, as to the future. Perhaps we are to part for too long hours suggested by the Trent affair in the troubling dependence which it seems in case of disappointment as to the result This will be a profitable lesson, teaching us last the reliance of the South is in its own stout arms, not on the uncertain hope of a short road to independence through foreign intervention

Mobile Register and Advertiser.

Southern conjectures on the Union policy

"The public mind has been puzzled for a solution of M'Clellan's long-continued inaction upon the Potomac. That he has a large and well-appointed army is a well-ascertained fact. For three months the North has had a force at Washington which, according to its own account, outnumbered our own, ten to one, which has had abundant time for discipline, and has at its command an immense amount and infinite variety of arms, ammunition, and equipments of war.

Among the variety of speculations upon the real cause of this long-continued delay, the theory is going round that M'Clellan does not intend to advance till the period arrives when the term of enlistment of our volunteers expires, and when, in consequence of their return to their homes, the Southern army will be so reduced in numbers as to present but a feeble barrier to his immense masses. The belief is now gaining ground that M'Clellan will await that moment before making his onward movement, and that then, when our camps are deserted, or the vacant places supplied by troops who cannot, by any possibility, in the interval now remaining, be made the equals of the present volunteer army in drill and efficiency, the Federal forces will make their grand and long-promised onward movement.

We are aware that Congress has legislated with a view to encourage re-enlistment, but we have not learned that its legislation has, to any great extent, secured the object designed. Our volunteers did not enter the army for money, though they have had a right to expect the treatment due to gentlemen and to soldiers—treatment which would have been of far more service in attaching them to their cause, than any pecuniary advantage. This treatment they have not always received. There have been civil and military officials whose heartless and brutal neglect have put the Southern cause in more peril than all the armed legions of the North —Richmond Dispatch, Jan 2.

The Cherokee Indians.—The Cherokee Indians, having become about equally divided on the question of loyalty and rebellion, are now fighting among themselves. The loyal party—headed by John Ross, who has for so long a time been their faithful chief recently gained two victories over the rebels. The Cherokees at first evinced a strong desire to remain neutral in regard to the present disturbances, and the Government was disposed to allow them to maintain such a position, but some wicked and unscrupulous emissaries of Jeff. Davis went among them and succeeded in getting a large number to forswear their allegiance to the government that has fostered them, and the result is that they are now engaged in slaughtering each other.

Present tone of Feeling in England No English journals of a sufficiently late date, to describe the effect of the reception in that country of the news of the surrender of Mason and Slidell, have yet been received; but there are strong indications that that intelligence will be hailed with joy by the great majority of the English people. Public opinion there undoubtedly demands a war if the Trent affair is not satisfactorily settled, but signs of deep reluctance to wage hostilities against us if they can honorably be avoided, have rapidly been increasing in number and significance

The mails by the Canada, however, bring a far different feeling in Great Britain than has heretofore been manifested since the receipt by them of the news of the seizure of the rebel emissaries. The hot-headed rush to arms has cooled down, and the dread of the horrors of war and dangers to commerce, are making themselves manifest, while some are considering the chances of "no war at all," and begin to count the cost of their hostile demonstration. It is asserted that the money expended, would have relaid the Atlantic cable, by which means no vast a waste of cash would have been saved Deputations from several religious bodies, peace societies, and other corporations, have waited on the Premier, and memorials have been presented, to induce him, if possible, to refrain from war, and arbitration, if not recommended, is broadly hinted at. England is very anxiously awaiting the arrival of the answer from this country relative to Mason and Slidell, to relieve them of an intolerable suspense, and decide the question of either peace or war between England and America.

The people of England will exhibit far more of real joy at the release of Mason and Slidell than they did of indignation at their arrest; because it will deprive those who were bent on plunging them, against their true interests, and, to a great extent, against their will, into a war with us, of a plausible pretext for hostilities. And having thus narrowly escaped a desperate conflict by the prudence and magnanimity of our Government, they will not easily again suffer themselves to be misled into a foolish, false, and dangerous attitude towards us.

John Bright on the Rebellion.—Mr. Bright, in his address to his fellow-townsmen, in Rochdale, said:

"There may be those persons in England who are jealous of the States. There may be men who dislike democracy, and who hate a republic. There may even be those whose sympathies warm toward the slave oligarchy of the South. But of this I am certain, that misrepresentation the most gross, or calumny the most wicked, cannot sever the tie which unites the great mass of the people in this country with their friends and brethren beyond the Atlantic (Applause.) Whether the Union will be restored or not, or the South will achieve an unhonored independence or not, I know not, and I predict not. But this I think I know, that in a few years, a very few years, the twenty millions of free men in the North will be thirty millions or fifty millions—a population equal to or exceeding that of this kingdom. When that time comes, I pray that it may not be said among them that, in the darkest hour of their country's trials, England, the land of their fathers, looked on with icy coldness, and saw, unmoved, the perils and calamities of her children. As for me, I have but this to say: I am one in this audience, and but one in the citizenship of this country. But if all other tongues are silent, mine shall speak for that policy which gives hope to the bondsmen of the South, and binds in generous thoughts, and generous words, and generous deeds, between the two great nations who speak the English language, and, from their origin, are alike entitled to the English name."

France.—An article in the French Opinion Nationale, shows that France considers that a war made by England upon the United States, would disturb the whole of the other Powers in Europe, and calls on the French nation not to aid England in such an act.

Austria.—Austria has sent a courteous but decided protest against the capture of Mason and Slidell, declaring that the act is not in accordance with international law.

A Bloodless Victory in Eastern Kentucky.—Cincinnati, Jan. 11.—The Gazette says

"On Monday last, Colonel Garfield's forces, including the Forty second Ohio, Tenth Kentucky, and one thousand eight hundred cavalry, had proceeded up the Big Sandy to Painesville, within seven miles of the rebel encampment, when they were met by a flag of truce bearing a message from Humphrey Marshall, asking if matters could not be arranged without a fight

Colonel Garfield immediately replied that he could offer no arrangements except either to fight or to surrender unconditionally

Marshall then addressed his men, informing them that they had no alternative except to surrender or disband, and giving them their choice, they immediately collected and set fire to all their wagons, tents, camp equipage, supplies, etc., and then each man was permitted to take care of himself, the whole force scattering in confusion No attempt was made to save anything except their cannon, which were hauled off

Col. Garfield despatched his cavalry in pursuit They expect to capture the guns, and perhaps pick up many of the flying rebels.

The rebels in North-eastern Kentucky, from the high estimation in which Humphrey Marshall's military abilities were held, had strong hopes of success under his leadership. A sufficient Federal force will be left in that region to secure its future peace and safety."

Resignation of Secretary Cameron.—Edwin M. Stanton Nominated as Secretary of War.—January 14th.—Our present relations with Europe are deemed highly important and interesting, and as Russia seems to be a strong friendly Power the President was anxious that some one should act as Minister to the Court of St. Petersburg to whom he had entire confidence, who can ably and fairly represent his views, and aid our cause in Europe

General Cameron accepted the office of Secretary of War with great reluctance, preferring to retain his seat in the Senate, and has always declared his intention to vacate the place when the interests of the country would allow, and he could have a proper successor. The gentleman selected, Edwin M Stanton, is a warm personal friend of Gen'l Cameron, is from his own State, and has accepted the position at the latter's solicitation. Mr Stanton it will be recollected was Attorney-General toward the conclusion of President Buchanan's Administration. In taking the arduous position he must sacrifice immense private business to serve the Government. His appointment is popular as it is generally conceded that he is a man of sterling integrity, will act any political affiliations to the contrary notwithstanding, and will prove an able counsellor as the Cabinet, and most reliable officer in his Department.

The change in the Cabinet creates much consternation

TRAINING OF CHILDREN

The fundamental and only condition upon which domestic happiness and prosperity can be secured, must first of all be exhibited by father and mother, in their conduct to each other Where this is not the case, where parents are ill-assorted in their marriage relations, however we expect to find their offspring well bred The development of our children is by no means an isolated process, which may arrive at a successful termination in spite of surrounding circumstances. They are members of a moral organism, and their welfare can only be ensured by their understanding to comprehend the relation they sustain towards it, and to perform the duties required of them by it." They are entirely dependent on the family; they form part of it, and are incorporated with it, and hence, in order that they may be preserved from harm of any kind, the foundation upon which they rest as their support must necessarily be sound Now, this foundation is entire agreement between father and mother; and this again is based on the conscientious conviction, on their part, that each occupies the position assigned to them by God himself. History records many tragical instances where the dire effects of unhappy discord, between father and mother, continued to operate as a curse on their descendants down to remote generations

But there is no need of actual crime in the parents to prevent their children from being properly trained. The most trifling inconsistencies in their conduct are not unfrequently attended with the same result. Yes, even though they live in peace, yet if this peace does not rest on the proper foundation, their influence on children is already crippled. Wherever we find a family of disobedient children, we may almost invariably conclude that the mother is in the habit of contradicting the father, of disregarding his wishes, or of thwarting them behind his back Now, for all this she is made to suffer the penalty in her children, who are as disobedient to her as she is disobedient to her husband. She tried to assume an authority which did not belong to her, and thereby forfeited that which was rightfully her own, and this utmost endeavoring to exert, improperly, her influence in a position where she has no right, she loses it in that in which it should ever remain unimpaired

A mother can never weaken a father's authority, without undermining at the same time her own, for whatever authority she possesses depends on that of her husband and hence though that of the wife is subordinate to that of the husband, it is yet, in fact, only one authority, which neither of the parties exercising it may abuse without inflicting injury on both Every mother must, therefore lay it down as a fixed and inviolable law of family discipline never to contradict her husband, even in affairs of trifling moment, in presence of their children except in cases admitting of no compromise, and then only with a modest abnegation of her superiority, and a discreet acknowledgment of his prerogative to decide finally in all cases of difference But it is on the other hand, no less the solemn duty of the husband to respect the authority of his wife in presence of his household, and in all cases where he cannot be honorably obliged to overrule or silence her decisions, to do it in a spirit of kindness, tenderness and forbearance Should he neglect this important duty as head of the family, children's carelessness, or heatiness in his disposition and behavior, he will not only augment the affliction of his wife, but weaken the power of that moral influence by which children should ever surround themselves surrounded In that moment in which a mother is denounced in their presence, as foolish and refractory, and is thereby placed on one and the same level with children and servants, from that moment vanishes that halo which, in the eye of the child, surrounds the heads of father and mother alike

Every Divine institution has its origin in heaven, whence, also, it derives its increase This is the case with the Church, whose chief corner stone is in heaven This is also the case with the family. The blessing does not flow from children to parents, but from parents to children They are the chosen instruments by whom the power of God is most effectual in the training and preservation of children If the relation these sustain to one another to in any way disturbed, the supply of the blessings will be interrupted. For, though children should remain in entire ignorance of a mother's refractory spirit, and a father's severe and disdainful behavior, secretly manifested to each other, they can never escape the blighting effects they produce

All these are requirements with which every Christian can comply to whatever degree of culture they may have attained, or whatever their calling or condition in life may be; in this the humblest may equal the highest, for the necessary measure of discernment and grace may be found, in the Christian Church, by one as well as by the other. If the bond of union between husband and wife resembles that which exists between Christ and his Church the training of children will be successful. It is on this account that the New Testament says so much about the Christian marriage relation, and so little about the training of children; for if the former is not what it ought to be, the latter will prove a failure; but if its ideal is realized, the Christian family-life will unfold itself also in children, as it were, of its own accord

MANY have puzzled themselves about the origin of evil. I observe that to avoid that difficulty is easy to escape it, and with this I propose to end the Notion.

THERE are persons who forgive injuries, but cannot forget; they bury provocations, but not at the gate.

GATHERED TO REST

BY OPHELIA RAINEY.

Gathered to rest.—life's weary journey o'er,
Another soul has reached the eternal shore,
Gone home at last, from cares a sweet release,
From earth's long pilgrimage to rest in peace.

Gathered to rest—the soul has spurned the clay,
And soared rejoicing to the realms of day,
Eternal day, where God is life and love,
Where dwells the ransomed soul in heaven above.

Gathered to rest—oh! fleet that long have trod
The way so long and steep, yet leads to God,
Pierced by the thorns affliction's hand had spread
Rest, weary feet—no cares disturb the dead

Gathered to rest—oh! meekly cross the hands
O'er the still heart—no more it [illegible] the hands
Of life's frail armor—trembling fingers rest
In voiceless prayer above the pulseless breast.

Gathered to rest—close the dim eyes to earth,
No more surcharged by tears of sorrow's birth,
Close them to weary life—The light of perfect day
Beams on the vision, from along the heavenly way.

Gathered to rest,—oh! lips where grief is mute;
Oh! perished voice, (what phrase shall anguish suit)
Forever hushed to earth, all fears, and strivings cease,
Sorrow no more shall utterance find, for all is peace

Gathered to rest,—thy God hath called thee home:
What are the joys of earth, to thy blest recompence,
Ransomed, and glorified, to swell the song of praise
Angelic hosts, above, eternally shall raise

EASTERN CORRESPONDENCE

BOOLAK.

Boolak is situated about a mile west of the city of Cairo, and is connected with it by a broad, level, and well-shaded avenue. It is located close upon the bank of the Nile, and to the port of the city. The shore is crowded with the river craft which is necessary to take to market the great production of this fertile country. There are a few steamers owned by government, and used for go[illegible] purposes, but with these exceptions, there is [illegible] but one style of vessel, a kind of sloop, varying from thirty to perhaps eighty feet in length, propelled by a huge lateen sail. Some of the best of these have, in the stern, a very comfortable cabin, twenty-five or thirty feet long, so as to accommodate four or six passengers for the usual two-months trip of the upper Nile. There is no dock, or graded quay, or any kind or manner of facility for loading or unloading vessels. Everything must be carried up and down a steep and dusty bank, upon the backs of men. Camels, donkeys, and men, are the universal carriers of this country.

This place was burnt by the French under Napoleon, but has been entirely rebuilt, and is a place of very considerable bustle and activity. Mohammed Ali established many of his government works here, and these give employment to thousands of laborers. The government has here a boat-yard, a school for engineers, a large establishment for spinning, weaving, printing, and dyeing cotton, a very extensive foundry for the casting of cannon, a printing press, &c. Between this and Kostat, the land is almost entirely monopolized by Egyptian grandees, who have congregated their residences here. Private enterprise has also largely grown up around the government centre, so that this place exhibits a life and activity very unusual for this land of sloth and indolence.

NILOMETER.

Opposite to Boolak, and for two miles above, lies the island of Rhoda, upon which the late Ibrahim Pasha had his palace, and the whole island was elaborately laid out in pleasure grounds, and planted full of all kinds of shrubbery and fruit trees. Since the Pasha's death, both palace and garden have been somewhat neglected. At the upper point of this island, and immediately adjoining the palace, is the famous Nilometer, for indicating the height of water during the annual inundation. This Nilometer consists simply of a square well of perhaps fifteen feet in diameter, in the midst of which stands a graduated stone pillar, divided into spaces of about twenty-two inches; across the open mouth of this well lies a square beam which receives the upper end of the stone pillar. During the rise of the inundation, the height of water as indicated by this pillar, is publicly proclaimed by criers every morning in the streets of Cairo. The river begins to rise during the latter part of June, and attains to its maximum about the middle of October, when it begins gradually to recede, and falls to its minimum the last of May. The whole fertility of Egypt depends upon this overflow. If the rise of water at Cairo should exceed thirty feet, immense damage must be the result, for houses, cattle, and everything throughout the valley of the Nile and the Delta must be swept away; whereas if the rise should not reach eighteen feet, then the harvest must fail, and all Egypt suffer a famine. When the rise is about twenty-four feet it is regarded as the most favorable. The large canals which conduct the water during the period of inundation all over the face of the country, are not permitted to be opened until the water rises eighteen feet, when the canal running from Kostat to Cairo is opened with great pomp and rejoicing.

When standing upon the portico of Ibrahim's palace, close by the Nilometer, with my face turned to the South, I saw the Nile in all its majesty, for the first time. And a noble river it is. I have seen no river in Europe [illegible] Mississippi, which is a still nobler river, of longer sweep, and greater volume. Its water is turbid, but very sweet and palatable, in color and taste very similar to that of the Mississippi. The making of this Nilometer is attributed by the best authorities to the reign of Caliph Amin, somewhere between [illegible] and it is rude enough in construction to be the product of that date.

Opposite the head of this island, on the mainland, is a spot to which the local guide will always call the traveller's attention, and assure [illegible] it was there that [illegible] Moses was found amid the rushes by Pharaoh's daughter. But as we have no [illegible] to believe that [illegible] was within ten miles of [illegible] place, it is to be supposed that the [illegible] would that distance for her daily bath.

THE MONKS.

There are the monks of Mohammedanism, and are to be found everywhere throughout Islam. [illegible] in convents, and are under [illegible] an austere piety, religious [illegible] population, poverty, chastity, modesty, patience, humility, and charity. They are not permitted to beg but are required to live by the labor of their hands. Their convents are, however, generally endowed, so that they live without labor, and are to be found lying around in lazy vagabonds [illegible] imposed. Their dress consists ordinarily of a coarse robe, which leaves the breast and legs uncovered. Most of them are said to be intemperate, and many of them are [illegible] notwithstanding their high professions ab[illegible] the vilest portion of the community.

In the northern suburb of Kostat, these monks have a convent, or as it is styled here, a college, where from eighty to a hundred have their residence. Having read much of their strange mode of worship, and their apparently superhuman endurance in the manner of its performance, I resolved to see for myself. So when Friday, the Mohammedan's day of worship came round, I rode out in company with several others. In a large hall, I found some sixty or seventy rough-looking fellows, arranged in a semi-circle around the [illegible] point toward Mecca. Several musical instruments were used as an accompaniment to the religious services; these were mainly of the flageolet and tambourine kind. The service itself consisted in swinging forward and backward in concert, keeping time with a leader who is within the circle, and every time the body swung forward a violent groan was uttered. This swinging motion, as performed by most of the circle, was no half-way affair, for with their long hair they would sweep the floor when bowed forward, and then they would throw themselves back until they would sweep the floor again. This motion was kept up with all the regularity of machinery, and with a rapidity that was really fearful, for the hair never rested for one moment upon the head, but was continually extended by the centrifugal force arising from the motion, so as to describe larger circles than the head. This extremely violent motion was kept up for an hour and a quarter, and I was told that frequently it exceeded that very considerably. When the services ended, all the performers seemed to be very much exhausted, and ten or a dozen fell to the floor in convulsions. As a mere physical feat, the whole thing was a perfect marvel. How heads filled with a reasonable amount of brains, could go through with such protracted gyrations, was more than I could clearly comprehend. And it was, if possible, a greater mystery to understand how God, even the Mussulman's God, could be worshipped by such a perfectly senseless ceremony. And yet I did not see it all, for unfortunately for me none of the whirlers happened to be present. Ordinarily, there is within this semi-circle a whirler, who wears a long hooped dress, which is tight at the waist, and more than twenty feet in circumference at the bottom of the skirt where the hoop is. This person will spin himself like a top, with a velocity of from fifty to sixty revolutions in a minute, and will continue this whirl uninterruptedly for more than an hour. The power of endurance necessary for such a performance must be not only constitutional, but also of a long and laborious practice, for practice can accomplish almost everything. I remember once, while stopping at the Union Hotel, in Saratoga, of seeing a delicate, fragile young lady waltz down three strong men, one after the other, and still she seemed not fatigued in the least; and yet she was so delicate that I question whether she could dress herself in the morning without the assistance of a waiting maid.

SALADIN'S AQUEDUCT.

Returning from Kostat, I rode most of the way to the city along Saladin's Aqueduct. This is a stone canal elevated some seventy or a hundred feet high, resting upon three hundred stone arches, running from the Nile at Kostat to the Citadel, a distance of about three miles. The water is raised from the Nile by the usual wheel and jars, and poured into the end of this aqueduct, along which it flows to the base of the Citadel, where it is again elevated to the Pasha's palace, and distributed to the various buildings located there. This aqueduct is called Saladin's, and is popularly attributed to him, upon the common principle of attributing all great works to their greatest Caliph. It was built, however, at least three hundred years after Saladin's death, and most probably by one of the Mameluke Caliphs. It was a great work, and still serves a noble purpose.

NECROPOLIS.

Near the end of this aqueduct, at the South west of the Citadel, is the city of [illegible] dead, is the great Necropolis of Cairo. Here the dead, small and great, noble and ignoble, have been largely buried for the last thousand years. They are all surrounded by the same lifeless waste, although they [illegible] form. The tombs of the multitude are very simple. The commoner is placed, without any coffin, in a vault, over which is a platform about a foot high, and on this platform is turned a semi-cylinder of brick work, perhaps two feet high, and the length of the vault, and the whole plastered and white-washed. While wandering among these tombs, I saw a company of half-a-dozen bring their friend to the sepulchre. They set down the bier at the family vault, and with a pick-axe soon broke a hole into the end of the vault, slipped in the corpse feet foremost, built up the vault, threw a few shovelsful of sand against it, and departed. Thus daily, for a thousand years, have the millions of the dead been deposited here.

A little further on, many of the tombs are enclosed with stone walls, showing that the wealthy sleep there, a little apart from the commoner. Still farther on in the desert, are more splendid and costly monuments, consisting of stone or marble quadrangles of twenty or thirty feet square, covered with cupolas, or airy canopies resting upon graceful, but very slender columns. Here, the brave and the powerful rest, separated from the multitude. Near to this is the family mausoleum, built by Mohammed Ali, where his wives, and sons, and grand-sons are buried. This is a large irregular enclosure, covered with a number of flat domes, resting upon arches. Beneath these domes, in raised and costly sarcophagi, lie the members of the builder's family. The favorite Toussoun, the great Ibrahim, and the dearly-loved and favorite wife of his youth, are there. Near the tomb of the latter is a wide space, which Mohammed Ali left for himself, but even the great know not where they shall be buried, for while the great Pasha prepared his own tomb, [illegible] buried there. The tomb of Ibrahim is regarded as the most superb sepulchral monument in the world, with the [illegible] which doubtless remain forever without a rival. I doubt very much whether all the [illegible] of the world could produce its equal. The situation and surroundings of this great mausoleum certainly harmonize with its design, for everything speaks of desolation and death. Vegetation and life are ignored: not even one blade of grass testifies of their existence. The stricken one [illegible] the shady tree, the verdant grass, and the blooming flower whose the dead [illegible] to speak of life and joy, of a land of pure delight beyond the grave. While the marble tells of pain and death, they tell of life and immortality brought to light in the gospel [illegible]

BRIEF REMARKS

He saith unto them, But whom say ye that I am? And Simon Peter said unto him, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. Also I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my Church and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Matt. xvi. 15–18.

The infallible rule for the interpretation of Scripture, is Scripture. Verbal criticism may be [illegible] is his own best expositor—a better expositor than [illegible] Captain or Lieutenant who [illegible] men, were among the first to mislead the church by a false exposition of the passage which we have quoted from Matthew; to which they were tempted, in order that, by magnifying the office of the Bishop of Rome as "the successor of St. Peter," his authority might be available for the suppression of sects and heresies, instead of relying, as they should have done, on the "word of God and prayer." Having more confidence in Peter, than in a whole Synod of his pretended "successors," we are willing to leave the question of the "supremacy" to [illegible]

Peter was right. To whom can we go but unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God and precious, ye, also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Wherefore, also, it is contained in Scripture. Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded."—1 Peter ii. 4—6. The "Scripture" to which he evidently refers us, is Isaiah xxviii. 16.

Now, Peter says that those who come to the Lord Jesus (Christ) as to "a living stone," are built up "as lively stones, a spiritual house." They are built up in the house, are the materials of which the building is composed. The Temple at Jerusalem was built of stones brought from the quarry; but this is "a spiritual house." The materials which enter into it are far different. The stones of which the temple was built, were dressed, and each one fitted for its place before they were brought to the spot; the materials of this spiritual house are also prepared before-hand: they are "begotten again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." Chap. i. 3.

Peter was one of those who are best fitted as "coming to Christ, as to a living stone:" for he testifies that he was "with him in the holy mount," and was an "eye witness of his Majesty;" he includes himself among those who were "begotten again to a lively hope;" and Christ testifies, that flesh and blood had not revealed to him the faith which he professed, but his Father in heaven. Peter was, therefore, taught of God; but Christ further testifies, (John vi. 45.) "Every one that hath heard and learned of the Father cometh unto me." Peter, therefore, was built up in the house as a "lively stone." He was a part of the building, and so could not be the foundation on which the building rested.

Peter testifies that Christ is laid in Zion, a chief corner-stone, (for a foundation, see the passage in Isaiah to which he refers us,) "and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded." But faith rests on Christ. He is a sure foundation. And other foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid. Now, if Peter had been the rock on which the church was built, what would have become of the Church when Peter denied his Master, saying, "I know not the man?" If his fellow disciples had believed that Peter was the "rock," which was to give stability to the church, the house of God, though the rains should descend, and the floods come, and the winds blow and beat upon it, how would they have been "ashamed or confounded," when a word from a servant girl, threw him into such a fright!

When exhorting the elders or Presbyters among the churches, Peter speaks of himself as "also an elder," or Presbyter, (chapter v. 1,) that is, a fellow-elder or co-presbyter. When he wrote this, he was certainly ignorant of his "supremacy," or he was not so fond of claiming it as his successors have been.

And now, if any good, honest Romanist happens to cast his eye on what I have just written, I want [illegible]

DR. KILLEN, professor of Ecclesiastical History and Pastoral Theology to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, in his work entitled THE ANCIENT CHURCH, speaking of the Council at Jerusalem, says: "When the question concerning the circumcision of the Gentile converts began to be discussed at Antioch, there were individuals in the city, quite as well qualified as any to Jerusalem to pronounce upon its merits; for the Church there, enjoyed the ministry of prophets: and Paul, its most distinguished teacher, [illegible] of the Apostles.' But the parties proceeded in the matter in much the same way as Israelites were accustomed to act under similar circumstances.

An appeal, or a reference, is not made from an inferior, to a superior court, because the superior [illegible] of deciding on the merits of the question, though this may sometimes happen to be true, but because

1. In difficult cases, men naturally wish to hear the opinion of others.

2. It is often well to let important cases have a second hearing.

3. The question, or the decision on it, may concern the whole body, in which case it is proper that the voice of the whole body should be heard.

4. The question may have excited a good deal of heat and temper in a particular locality, and therefore it may be proper that it should come before men who can look at it coolly and with an unprejudiced eye.

The decision of the superior court is regarded as final, not because it possesses superior wisdom; this is not the formal reason, for in some cases, it is not true; but because it is necessary that there [illegible] must terminate. It cannot but be of evil tendency to teach that the reason is because the superior court possesses some peculiar wisdom. It encourages litigious persons to act at caught the judgment of the session or Presbytery to which they are immediately, or in the first instance, accountable, to which they are always sufficiently [illegible] Without any such encouragement, [illegible] become men are apt enough to despise the minister and session, or the Presbytery which has the immediate oversight of them; imagining that, as far off fowls are far-fetchered, if they can only [illegible] carried to some body of wise men [illegible] they will come off with flying colors.

ENDLESS REST

"There remaineth [illegible] rest to the people of God." Heb. [illegible]

How sweet is rest to the weary, yet how little rest do many of the Lord's people enjoy here! But the troubled spirit shall rest in the presence and enjoyment of its God, and the poor wearied and diseased body shall find rest in the grave. Weariness is limited to time, but our rest will be lasting as eternity. There are no weary heads, or weary limbs, or weary hearts, on the other side of Jordan. The rest of heaven will be the sweeter for the toils of earth. The value of eternal rest will be [illegible] hanced by the troubles of time. Jesus now [illegible] bring us to rest in His Father's house. His rest will be glorious. A rest from sin. A rest from suffering. A rest from conflict. A rest from toil. A rest from sorrow. The very rest that Jesus enjoys himself. We shall not only rest with Him, we shall rest like Him. How many of earth's weary ones are resting in [illegible] undisturbed rest. Here the rest of the body is disturbed; but there are no troublesome dreams or alarming occurrences there. Thanks be unto God for the rest we now enjoy in Christ! Ten thousand [illegible] Christ for [illegible] Christ! Weaver [illegible] of success in the charge He [illegible] them. He indeed requires [illegible] but He gives much, and has engaged himself to [illegible] with His [illegible] very tool ends [illegible] sacrifice [illegible] lered, in reliance on Him in this cause.

A mother who considers the care of her children to other hands, in order the better to follow her own pleasure, stands already condemned by the prevailing moral sentiment. And that, too, most deservedly—most justly. A mother who prefers ease, pleasure, and amusement to the care of her own children, is infinitely more unfeeling, more inhuman than a brute. Whatever she may outwardly be, however polished, however attractive, intelligent, amiable, she is within inwardly a monster. Nor is that father deserving of less censure, who, for the sake of accumulating wealth, or obtaining honorable distinction to which no duty urges him, would [illegible] part of the responsibility attached to the training of his children. Who has told him to choose a position in life, which prevents him from attending to their spiritual welfare, or who has given him the right to devote himself to his chosen or appointed calling exclusively, and with such an eagerness for gain and material success, that he has no time left for his family? That man neither knows his duty nor his dignity as a father, who is not prepared, at any sacrifice of time and money, to perform that duty and maintain that dignity, personally, for the welfare of his house. As the Christian ceases from his temporal pursuits on the Lord's day because he knows that God will abundantly reward him for so doing, by blessing his labor during the six working days, so also must the father be able to cease part of each day from his customary pursuits to serve God in his children. And surely the fruits of this labor will be far sweeter than all other gain; and whilst he, for God's sake, devotes himself to the discharge of this duty, he may the more confidently look in all he does, for that assistance and protection which comes from above.

As a good mother persists in suckling her own child, even though it cause her pain for a time, so also should both father and mother persist in their attention to its spiritual life, and omit nothing calculated to cherish, elevate, and preserve it. Wherever this is done, it will soon be found, that these efforts do not only promise to meet with a rich reward in future, but that they form in themselves one of the most essential ingredients in the cup of domestic happiness.

Christian parents should hold fast the conviction, that the family is the fittest place for the operations of the Spirit of Christ, and that no school, no institute, no seminary, no academy can be made to serve as a substitute. No one should, therefore, presume himself better fitted for the discharge of the duties connected with the training of children than parents. He may, indeed, in some cases, excel them in discernment and piety, yet is the same charge not committed to him, which is committed to them, nor does he enjoy the promise which they enjoy. Let no minister venture to take this matter out of the hands of the father, for the paternal authority is as absolute and inviolable in the family, as is the spiritual authority in the church. The minister, as the head of the church, has no right to supplant the head of the family; for the hedge that surrounds the family is sacred, and the minister possesses no more right to tear it down than any other man. Moreover, the family and parental authority existed prior to the church. The one is as certainly a divine appointment as the other, and God would be a destroyer of His own institutions and works, if He had designed, when He created the spiritual, to set aside the paternal authority.

The Roman Catholic church has acted on the belief, that the cause of religious education among children could be best promoted, and the young most effectually guarded against evil influences, by committing the task, as far as possible, to the clergy and religious orders. However praiseworthy this design may be, and with whatever success it may in some few individual cases have met, it must nevertheless be confessed, that the entire system is based on the erroneous supposition, that God has bestowed greater ability on priests and nuns for the training of future generations, than he has bestowed upon parents. It is not right to relieve parents in this way, of the most important part of their family duties; it is treating the laity as if they never attained to years of maturity, and fosters among them that spirit of servile submission, which the Roman Catholic system so greatly favors. Parents, as members of the church, should receive from the clergy that kind of instruction which will qualify them for the work of training their children, no less than for the discharge of every other duty connected with their calling. But never, and under no pretext, should they be permitted to be removed from the paternal roof, for the purpose of being educated by the clergy.

It is just as great a mistake, on the part of the Catholic church, to educate its future priesthood in a "seminarium puerorum" rather than in the bosom of the Christian family. The advantages which are here enjoyed, for the refinement and elevation of both heart and mind, cannot be supplied from any other source. The supposition, that the priest takes the place of the father, and the church that of the mother, is erroneous. It cannot be, for it must not be. It must not, for it is contrary to that divine arrangement, on which all moral improvement [illegible] depends.

But bad as it is, when parents on whom the [illegible] on the priest, it becomes still worse, when they depend for it on the schoolmaster. Yet this fatal mistake is much more frequently committed than the other and has, in this country especially, become so universal in its application, that it seems altogether beyond the power of man to arrest the evil it has produced. To send the child, as soon as possible, to school, to abandon it as much as may be, to its influences, in order thus either to rid themselves altogether of the labor of education, or to render it the more easy for themselves—this appears to be the pernicious principle on which many of our American parents are accustomed to act. These principles have their origin in [illegible] the natural man, who is prone to keep at a distance the noble aims of life; and these principles are supported by popular prejudice and by laws, which so completely accord with it, that few, even of those who entertain opposite convictions, venture to break through this evil custom.

LECTURE IN BETHEL CHURCH.

Mr. Anderson, who was announced to lecture in Bethel Church on the 16th instant, promptly fulfilled the appointment. At the hour fixed he came forward, and was introduced to the audience. He arose and spoke of the claims of the Recorder, giving a sketch of its origin, and of the importance of the press, and of keeping the paper in the field; for, he said, there was never a time when one was more needed.

Dr. Armstrong, being present, was called upon, and made some very pertinent remarks. A collection was then taken up, which resulted in the sum of $12 82, and was disposed of per announcement

OVERLOOKED

In looking over some communications that Rev. A. L. Stanford gave us after his resignation, we find an article upon the death of the wife of our esteemed brother, Joseph H. Smith, of Burlington circuit, N. J.

We are sorry that it was not discovered sooner. It will be found in this week's number, under the head of obituaries. We refer our readers to it. Brother Smith is a worthy minister.

SETTING ABOUT THE WORK.

Our good Brother Seymour, the Superintendent of A. M. E. Bethel School, Philadelphia, and his assistant, Brother A. Fields, feeling for the great cause of our beloved Zion and its general features, have responded in a most Christian like manner to our appeal and proposition in relation to giving an exhibition with the school for the birth-day of Rev. Bishop Allen, and have set about the work of making preparations. We hope our other brethren will do likewise.

NOTICE.

A quarterly meeting will be held in the A M. E. Bethel Church, Sixth Street above Lombard, on Sabbath, the 26th inst. Preaching, Saturday evening 7½ o'clock. Band love-feast, Sabbath morning 5½ o'clock. Preaching, 10 o'clock, A. M., by Bishop Nazrey—3 o'clock, by Rev. A. L. Stanford—7 o'clock, by ——

Love-feast on Monday evening, the 27th inst., at 7 o'clock. Joshua Woodlin,
Elder in charge

NOTICE.

Rev. John H. W. Burley, a local preacher of good standing, has been appointed by the minister and trustees of A. M. E. Church of New Haven, Conn. We have also empowered him to receive subscriptions for the Christian Recorder while travelling around, and hope that he may be successful in the great cause.

AN EXAMPLE.

A good and Christian example, and the first of which we have any knowledge from a colored person in the direction from which it is bequeathed, has been set recently.

Mrs. Ruth Hooper, who departed this life on the 10th instant, in the 84th year of her age, was a member of Bethel Church, in good standing She had been acting as cook in the service of the late Mrs. E. H Budd. Through her industry and economy she had laid by some fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500.) Before the good Lord had taken her home, she seemed to have been possessed of the proper mind.

She bequeathed for the benefit of the itinerant preachers of her Church the sum of six hundred dollars. Her Christianity ran in the right channel. But, after all, there is a nice point of law to be settled, viz.: whether it is confined to us of the Philadelphia district, or whether it is to be for the itinerant preachers in general. If it is in the latter sense, it comes to the Book Concern, where we think it ought to be. However, for our part, we are willing to aid in making a business matter of the Book Concern.

A CARD.

We would just say that our friend, Mrs. Hawkins, is selling her stock of goods at very reduced prices. We would recommend, not only our citizens, but friends at a distance, Wilmington and other places, to patronize her. Now is the time to get bargains. Go to Mrs. Hawkins.

PREJUDICE.

We are sorry to say it, but must speak the truth, the whole truth, that there is more prejudice in the city of Philadelphia against the people of color, than in any other Northern city. We have been in all the larger, and a great number of the smaller ones, but have never seen any to equal Philadelphia. We are almost ready to say that it will be difficult to find one south of Mason and Dixon's to equal it. We have travelled considerably in the South, and we have stepped into the cars and sat down, and not a word was said. We have done the same in Louisville, Ky. We also find no difficulty in Boston, Brooklyn, New York, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, nor in Chicago. But let a decent colored lady or gentleman undertake to get into any of the City Passenger Cars in Philadelphia, they must either stand in front or walk, if it is ten miles. But if he had a white skin, just out of some old alley, both ragged, dirty, and greasy, he can go in by paying his fare. The negro pays the same, if he conducts to ride in front. With all this God is angry, and demands justice.

PEACE ON EARTH AND GOOD WILL TO MEN

Nations like individuals, are often led from mutual jealousy and hard and abusive language, to wicked blows, and it is a cause of regret to witness this disposition, now so apparently prevalent, to suspect and accuse of evil design England has her faults, and so have we, and it would be well for both them and us to look at home, and seek to correct our own errors; for such is seek to remove the beam from our own eyes before we undertake to remove the mote from the eye of the other It is much easier to make excuses than to restore friendship; wherefore it seems to behoove us to refrain from all unnecessary altercation of feeling, lest in the end we reap the bitter fruits of a cruel enmity. By unfounded suspicions and jealousies, leading to animosity, we may provoke a cruel hostility which may result disastrously both to them and us, so that when it may be too late we may find occasion to regret our indulgence of those feelings, words, and things which may lead [illegible] to mutual breach. It seems well for us to be warned in time before the madness of mutual dislike and hatred may kindle a fire not easily quenched, remembering that "a soft answer turneth away wrath, while grievous words stir up anger." The angry tone of some of the press is an occasion of much disquietude and ill feeling; and it may safely be asserted that "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," but rather the wickedness of the spirit of unity, whereby nations are led to lift sword against nations, and brother against brother. The present is a time of great excitement and want of true Christian feeling, and it is to be hoped that the turnings and overturnings that are now going on may tend to humiliation and purification, and to the restoration of the Church to the faithfulness of earlier times when the spirit of covetousness and idolatry did less prevail, and when the hearts of the people of God were more subdued and chastened by manifold sufferings from persecution, humbling themselves under the mighty hand of God who is still seeking to gather us under the banner of His love, to the end that violence may cease throughout the earth and the kingdom of His dear Son be established in our hearts. As we submit to the will of his Spirit, whereby our hearts are purged from enmity and entrance is made for Him who "maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth," we may hope in witness that holy communion which He hath promised to those who hear His voice and open unto Him, to strengthen our minds against the assaults of enmity, and prepare us for the glory of God, and promoting "peace on earth and good will to men." Love and enmity are two principles which are at war one with another in our hearts, and according to the prevalence of the one or the other is the enjoyment of peace or the suffering from confusion and shame. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." Let us pray for the welfare of the Church and the hastening of that happy time when all strife and contention shall cease, and wars and oppressions no more be known, when "the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ" and oppression and violence no more prevail, but instead thereof, the fruit of the Spirit, "love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance, against which there is no law"

THE BLUES.

For some weeks past we have had the blues most shockingly bad, but since the new year has come in, they have commenced to disperse gradually. There is a flattering prospect of the life of the Christian Recorder; much more than there was this time last year, and if we had not fallen in debt some months ago, we should begin to have some hope of making a small ratio to each of our Bishops. We hope the friends will do their duty all over the connexion, so as to help us out of debt. We shall then have a handsome stock of books on hand. Our expenses are, of course, very great, and if it was not for the paper, which is the life-blood of the Book Concern, we should have to bundle up baggage and all, and make for the West from whence we came. We have store rent, house rent, gas, fuel, reams of paper, printing, and many other expenses, and for all this we have managed not to owe more than two hundred and seventy dollars. Now, after all, who would have believed it. Just think of the tight times with money affairs, and yet we have been able to reduce the debt of last year to what we have already stated. We know one thing, brethren, we work hard day and night for you, and we do it honestly, and we are hoping yet for better times.

GOOD NEWS FROM INDIANA.

Our Western Indiana brethren are not all asleep. Rev. William Jackson, of the Vincennes circuit, one of the poorest circuits in the district, has clearly shown that where there is a will there is a way. Notwithstanding Bro. Jackson was tempted to leave his circuit, yet the good Spirit prevailed upon him and his beloved companion to remain. The result has been the conversion of many precious souls, and also of getting subscribers for the paper. And knowing the embarrassed condition of our finances, he did not demand of us to send him our books on time, but went to work and raised the money for as many books as his people wanted, and forwarded it to us by express—in all, twelve dollars—which will be seen under the head of "Acknowledgments"

We have also received a letter from Dr. W R. Revels of Indianapolis, Ind., assuring us that we are not forgotten, and that a meeting has already been appointed in behalf of the Recorder, which shows that he, too, is concerned, since the Recorder has proved a success during the last year, and is yet progressing. We shall look with much interest for the doings of the meeting.

We have also received a letter from Rev. Chas Burch, of the New Albany station, Indiana. He has been thinking and talking much about our wants, and has sent his own subscription, and is looking every day to receive money from others who have promised to take the Recorder, so we think that there is beginning to be, in some quarters, much feeling in behalf of the Recorder among our brethren.

A CARD.

This may certify that Rev. J. H. W. Burley is the duly appointed agent for the purpose of soliciting means to aid in lessening the pending debt upon our church. All monies, donations, &c. contributed to our agent, will be thankfully received I. I. Williams,
Pastor.

A VOICE FROM NEW YORK.

BINGHAMTON CIRCUIT

Mr. Editor:—I have not remained silent because of indolence, but because I have been waiting for the fathers and pioneers of this district, and especially him who was assigned the duty of writing from this district, therefore. I have waited until my humble pen will not rest any longer, and she, moving upon the face of the ruled paper, breaks the silence and says, let a portion of the rural country of the Empire State send in her tidings, and it is so. The third Quarterly Meeting of this conference year, commenced in Owego, Jan 11th, at which place the Lord who is mighty in battle was present to bless. On Sabbath morning at 8 o'clock, the doors were open, and at half past 8 o'clock, love-feast was open by singing and [illegible] second chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and we had a refreshing season from the presence of the Lord; and at 11 o'clock we had a soul-stirring discourse from Bro. Stephen Brown, (text from Mark ix 3; and at 2 o'clock we were favored with a practical religious and intellectual discourse from the Rev. Mr. Potter, of the M. E Church from John viii 17, Subject, Human Happiness. "If ye know these things, happy are ye, if ye do them." On this occasion all hearts seemed to be deeply melted in love, and the Lord did let the opening heavens around us shine with beams of sacred bliss, and Jesus showed his mercy ours and whispered we were his. At the close of this sermon, we attended to the sacrament of the Lord's supper, when our joy appeared to be perfect; and in the evening at 7 o'clock we came together again, and after listening to a short discourse from Henry E. Chelly, (local) we entered into prayer-meeting, when the Lord convicted two souls and converted one, and the work continued until Friday, when three souls were added to the church in this place. There is also here a very interesting Bible-class among the young people, and there seems to be quite a thirst for divine knowledge among them On the 14th and 15th, the Quarterly Meeting came off to Binghamton, where the Lord met with us again and poured out his spirit on the church. Sabbath morning at half past 9 o'clock love-feast was open by singing and prayer and reading the second Epistle of first John, and we had a time long to be remembered. At 11 o'clock the present Pastor tried to preach from the Acts, second chapter and 24th verse Subject, the resurrection; and the Lord did truly pour out his spirit on his handmaidens, and at 2 o'clock the present pastor tried to preach again from Isaiah lxiii. last clause of the first verse, Subject the power of Christ to save: after which we attended to the sacrament of the Lord's supper In the evening we had another glorious time Thus ends the Quarterly Meeting. I have been trying hard to get subscribers for our paper, and I have the promise of some, and I hope soon to send you their names with their money

RIGHT AND WRONG.

Mr. Editor:—I did not intend to trouble your columns with another word on this subject, but Bishop Nazrey has called me out by name, and I must, therefore, ask a small space to reply.

First, I have examined the General Conference Minutes of 1860, to which the Bishop refers me, and the result of my examination reveals the following facts, though not new to me, namely, that the General Conference of 1860 decided that Bishop Nazrey was at the time of the sitting of that Conference, a member and Bishop of the B. M. E. Church. See General Conference Minutes, page 14, 12 lines from the bottom.

Your readers are also referred to page 15 of the same minutes, where it will be seen after the Bishop declared his identity with the A. M E. Church to be at that time as formerly, the Conference adopted a resolution, requesting him to resign his relation to the B. M. E. Church; forthwith the said resolution was amended by Rev. Stephen Smith, allowing the Bishop time to meet the Conference of the B. M E. Church. The above was adopted as amended

It will also be seen under page 32 of General Conference Minutes, that the Committee on Canadian Affairs reported against the practicability of exercising double Episcopal functions, showing it to be contrary to the lessons and spirit of our Church government, and our General Conferences have uniformly held the opinion that the acts and deeds of a Bishop of the A. M. E. Church in the United States would not be valid in a foreign country, hence the necessity of a separation

We are asked to give the language of the General Conference and also the language of the Bishop in relation to the doings of the Indiana Conference. We have given a brief synopsis of the doings of the General Conference above, and we admit further, as will be seen by reference to the Minutes, that the General Conference of 1856, authorized one of our Bishops to be given for an indefinite period to the B. M. E. Church when properly solicited, which was done, resulting in the choice of Bishop Nazrey.

But at the General Conference of 1860, Bishop Nazrey resigned his relation to the B. M. E. Church, and it was upon this authority the Indiana Conference based its action. The Bishop wishes our quotations in reference to his language, in reference to the doings of the Indiana Conference, corrected. We confess ourself unable to see what corrections, if any, it is our duty to make. It will be recollected that the Bishop in an article that appeared in the Recorder some time since, complains of the Indiana Conference among others, for neglecting to raise means to assist in defraying his expenses to California, and in this connexion, he refers to the communication of Bishop Green to the Indiana Conference, upon which the Conference expressed its disapproval of the Bishop's course as reported to us by Bishop Green and others. He, the Bishop, said, when this communication was received, some person must be killed. In replying to this statement we said it was the privilege of the Conference to examine his episcopal statutes without thereby being constituted man slayers or killers.

With no ill feeling toward the Bishop we must continue to hold the same view, and in conclusion must say that it is either right for Bishop Nazrey to exercise Episcopal functions, or it is wrong. If it be right, the Indiana Conference is guilty of presumption, and should make suitable apology to the Bishop. If it is wrong, he has no cause of complaint.

Yours, for justice to all men,
W R. Revels.

Indianapolis, Jan. 18th, 1862

The stars and the musical sea-wave,
Though it oft seem to fall and die,
Still sweep with their enchantful dues
An endless reach of sky
And though the halls of death
May hide the bright array,
The marshalled brotherhood of souls
Still keeps its upward way.

For the Christian Recorder.

A RELIGIOUS UNION.

Dear Christian Recorder, while perusing your most useful Recorder, my eyes fell upon a most heart-cheering piece, entitled Religious Union, which struck my attention with great force; and while seriously engaged carefully reading it, I found its sentiments truly religious, according to my knowledge of the Christian religion, and with which it is my candid opinion, that every true Christian heart must concur. The sentiments of which I speak are the Christian importance, so far as we are concerned, of the Methodist Episcopal Church uniting in one consolidated body of Christians, who may wield mighty influence in this land of suffering, and be more abundantly accepted of the great Founder and Head of the church.

Now, with regard to the letter you refer to, written by Rev. S. T Jones, in your 45th No, I think it is of the greatest importance, and with it I do most heartily concur. But with regard to the propriety of the young, waiting for the older to speak out first, I cannot see; because this subject is one of the greatest importance to the church; and it regards neither old men nor young preferable in its advancement, but calls on all to duty, because we are all one in Christ Jesus.

Dear Christian, in reference to a Religious Union, I find in your Recorder several important questions asked, and answers requested from either side of the house. Sir, as there can be no impropriety in making a trial, I proceed to answer, as follows:

1. What is the cause of us not being a great and glorious body? Ans. 1st. The founders of us as a church, in separate bodies and of different names, did not see eye to eye—did not think alike, and did not love alike—and this state of sight-feeling and love has been fostered and prepared more or less up to the present time

2d. And we their sons are partakers of and hold most sacred their sight-feeling and love of denominational distinction, with their peculiar titles one saying, I am a Bethel, the other is a Zion, this idol must be nailed to the cross, then the cause referred to will be demonstrated, and a gloriously great religious body will be brought together and consolidated: the effect that will necessarily follow is inexpressible by man

3d. What is the most healthy and effective means to be raised to remove the cause?

1st. Let brotherly love be in the clerical department of the church, which, as a general thing, has hitherto failed—yes, to our great disadvantage. Then let love absorb itself into will, and let will take hold on faith, hope and perseverance; then the cause alluded to will be removed.

4th. Who will undertake the great work of removing the cause?

Ans. 1st. Who should or who can do it? But the legislative department of each body or church who form their foundation as a church, have had the control of such matters; for there never has been any material difficulty in the way of a Religious Union, only by the priests; therefore, it belongs to them to do it.

But I am asked, How shall they or we do it? To answer this, let me suppose a case, for example: let twelve Ministers, more or less as the case may require, of character, veracity, and integrity—from both bodies, meet somewhere convenient, as members interested for the Union: let them draw up and present to each Annual Conference ensuing, a suitable memorial for their concurrence—then let there be called a general convention of the two bodies, who shall sit when and where appointed to legislate, and whatever is enacted by that body, by it we will all be governed henceforth in a general compact

Having answered, as I suppose, the question asked, I will close by saying,

For Union I'll subscribe my name
Now, hencef rth, and forever;
For Union I cannot be blamed
No, no, not now, nor never

United we may walk alone
But severed we must crawl,
United we may stand approved,
Divided we must fall.

Sweet Union is the Christian band,
Who claim they are forgiven
Tried Union is the only hand,
That takes fast hold of heaven

Come, then, dear Christians, let's unite,
And on Jesus let us fall
Then in the glorious morn of light,
We'll crown him Lord of all

John A. Williams,
Pastor of Bethel Church, Philadelphia.

THE REPOSITORY FOR 1862.

Mr Editor:—By request I pen the following in regard to the able periodical, entitled Repository of Religion, Literature, Science, and Art. Many have been the conjectures concerning the future of this periodical, which have only been equalled by the hopes expressed, that it might be kept in existence.

A meeting in relation to the Repository was held in Baltimore, on the 13th and 14th insts. The following brethren were present:—Bishop D. A. Payne, Revs. J M Brown, A. W. Wayman, D W. Moore, H. M. Turner, and James Lynch.

Bishop D. A. Payne was chosen Chairman, and James Lynch, Secretary. Several other brethren who deeply sympathised with the object of the meeting, were represented by proxy. A brief synopsis of the doings of this body is as follows:

1. It was resolved that the Repository should be kept in existence.

2. That hereafter it should be issued monthly at five cents a copy; the size to be the same as the quarterly, and the number of pages reduced to twenty. By this means do we propose to give the people a first-class periodical at a lower price than any published in the United States.

3. That the brethren there present and those represented, should be responsible for the expenses of the monthly publication

4. That Rev J. M Brown continue as chief editor, and Bishop D. A Payne appoint the associate editors.

5. That a financial committee be appointed by the Chairman: they are Revs A. W. Wayman, H M. Turner, D W. Moore, James Lynch, J. M. Brown.

6 That the Secretary prepare and send to the Recorder, a brief synopsis of the proceedings of these meetings.

Members of the A. M. E. Church, lovers of education, pioneers of improvement, and friends of the colored race, this grand enterprise is started under the most auspicious circumstances; because the pecuniary burden which will settle on those who take hold of it is light; because talent has been secured that cannot be surpassed in colored literary circles; because it offers encouragement ample, and opportunity unequalled for the development of talent, or the combat with error; advocating at all times the varied interests of Bethel connexion, wherever borne by hand or mail, stage or steamboat, to the populous city or the country town, it will sow the seeds of Methodism We forbear saying more, as the first issue which will appear in a few days, will contain both prospectus and appeal. Yes, every issue of a newspaper or magazine, the real production of colored persons, carries on its own face its own appeal that must go to the heart of every man who has been duly influenced by civilization.

Yours on behalf of the Publication Committee of Repository. James Lynch,
Georgetown, D. C., Jan 15th, 1862.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. Editor:—You inquire why I am silent, and why I have not lately remitted for the Recorder? I sent you $5 during last week, and my failure to furnish your readers with my productions, may be credited to my humanity.

The interest in the Recorder in this section is not abating, but on the contrary, would have been on the increase, but the Recorder made the same mistake that a certain very poor man did, who proclaimed that he had a fatal disease, while he was searching for a wife—for he is searching yet. Well, the Recorder has been proclaiming that it was sick,—dangerously ill for some months, and a great many would not take it, lest it should die. But the Recorder comes to us looking hale, healthy, &c. May her disease not prove fatal.

Matters stand status quo in our churches; and of late have been the houses of amusement, and in a small degree, of instruction, creditable or discreditable, it is a fact. "The Black Swan," "The American Nightingale," et al. gave a series of grand operatic concerts, in Union Bethel. Fashionable audiences attended; and we had a Niblo's, or Academy of Music, on a small scale. The Hutchinson Family, singing comic and patriotic, and anti-slavery songs, in the Colored Presbyterian, and M. E. Church, Georgetown, (Old Side,) also gave great satisfaction to our people

The event of the week with us, is the lecture of Hon. Owen Lovejoy, of Illinois, at the Israel Church, Capitol Hill. We are told the Church was densely crowded with our people, and the Hon. M. C., descanted on the future of the colored people after the war, logically, prophetically, clearly, and forcibly carrying his audience clear through the vast wilderness of prejudice and slavery, into the fruitful "promised land" of equality. Not being present ourselves, as we were engaged in Baltimore, we cannot give an accurate synopsis of what is certainly the most valuable speech about us extant. The trustees having procured a permit to have the assembly, in order that it might not be unlawful, we are told that Mr. Lovejoy indignantly tore it into fragments, thus recording his bold and positive protest against this species of despotism

The emancipation thunder of Dr. Cheever, which has shaken the Smithsonian, and the walls of the Capitol—the interest which it called forth, the general approval it received, is certainly a harbinger of the good times coming, when a man shall be considered a man, whether his face be black or white, his hair woolly or straight, his nose flat or sharp, his lips thick or thin.

The great trouble here seems to be the protection of a certain part of our city. Despite all the vigilance that can be exercised, the enemy has been, and still is, making awful depredations there; that part of the city is the Treasury Department. Certainly during the hurry and bustle of the last Congress, they must have passed a bill to amend the eighth commandment, by striking out the word "not." The most unfashionable thing in these parts is honesty, either in the expression of opinion, or in business transactions One thing is certain, men may enjoy the fruits of wrong doing for a season, but even in life, evil deeds are apt to exercise a punitive power, and in death when conscience plies the lash, and hell affords the flame, the exclamation will be, how dearly I am paying for the ill-gotten gains! O! for an outpouring of God's Spirit! O! for the charge of the Holy Spirit upon the allied hosts The heavens are black with the fiery indignation of God against this nation for their sins. The sunlight of prosperity is hid, and lowly hangs the shroud of adversity. The brilliant recollections of the past flash across the mind, but they are like the forked lightnings, whose lurid glare amid the storms of the dark night, only serve to show its dangers, and add terror to the scene.

A great number of colored men are here from the North, "prospecting," instead of going right into business. I here put on record, that colored men are letting opportunities for getting wealth, slip through their fingers, that they will never again behold—"There is a tide in the affairs of men, which taken at the flood, &c., &c." May we learn before it is too late. Most of them have too much pride; they study about what Mr. A. or Mr B, the Misses so and so will think, if they do this or that, and Mr. A. or B., and Misses so and so will not be three cents advantage to them under any imaginable circumstance. I must conclude by giving you the French motto, "Bontes on avant pul bien sans peine"

Yours Sagg

LETTER FROM BROTHER ROCK

Brother Weaver: Your favor of the 1st inst. came duly to hand—and for which you will please accept my thanks I take this opportunity also to acknowledge the receipt of the paper containing what purports to be a synopsis of my life as copied from the Independent, and written by one of my old school teachers. It is in the main correct, and this I suppose is enough for all practical purposes. The time to write a man's biography is after he is dead, then men will render that impartial judgment which they will seldom give during his lifetime. While I thank you most sincerely, I must confess that it is not the most pleasant thing that has happened to be spread out so before the public because you know too well that the less the people know of a public man, the better they like him

With regard to writing for the Recorder, I regret to say that it is not in my power to be a regular contributor, but I will try to drop you a line occasionally on some subject of general interest to our people, or to send you a news letter from this city. I am highly pleased with your desire to devote a portion of your paper to the temporal wants of the race. Let it be a religious family newspaper, and I think it must succeed.

Your paper presents a handsome face. Its selections are most excellent, and with a little more help in the editorial department, I think you will make a paper, such as we have long felt the need of. Where are the ministers of the widely extended A. M. E. Church? have they no pride in this matter? I hope you will not be discouraged It is great enterprises that try men. I shall take great pleasure to say a word for the Recorder when I can, and I wish you that success which I believe you so richly deserve.

Yours very truly,
Rock.

Rev. E Weaver:—In looking over the Minutes of the last Session of the New England Annual Conference, a resolution came under my notice touching Publications, which reads as follows:—

"Resolved, On motion of Rev. W. W. Grimes, that the Christian Recorder be our organ for making various publications."

We hope that the brethren of this district will respond generally to the demands of the several Editors, not only by writing, but by getting as many subscribers as we possibly can. Let us hear from each other through the columns of the Recorder. Let them hear from us in the West, laboring faithfully, not with the Editors only, but with every one connected with us in this great field of labor, irrespective of denomination or creed; that we feel a general anxiety for the dissemination of religion, morality, literature and science.

Many of us have children; if they are to be trained up for usefulness as shepherds and as pastors, we must look to our own household first, for he that cannot, nor will not rule his own household, cannot be adequate to rule the household of God If they are properly trained they will be useful in their generation, some of them very probably will fill our places, and may consummate a great amount of good that will tell throughout the annals of vast eternity, and which we shall see in the realms of bliss. We shall there know that we have trained them up for usefulness and for heaven. In most of our charges there are very many children, let us present our thoughts in the Recorder as well as the Repository, and in each other's charges we may preach a sermon throughout the entire country to parents, guardians, and so by recommending a proper example, recommend a proper course of instruction and give knowledge of the great necessity of parents having some idea of human nature and thereby be prepared to train up the different members of their respective families as stewards under God, raising their little ones for his use, not for the ball-room, nor for the ale house, nor any other sinful practice, but alone for a blessing to humanity and for the glory of God.

The ladies of our church held their fair during a part of Christmas week, which was attended with considerable success considering the present state of the times. After the fair was over and current expenses paid, the ladies presented the trustee, for the purpose of lessening the pending debt, $25.80.

SABBATH SCHOOL CELEBRATION IN BETHEL CHURCH.

A very interesting ceremony took place in Bethel M. E. Church, on last Sabbath, the 5th inst., on the occasion of the quarterly Anniversary of the Sunday School of said Church,—Messrs. Seymour and Fields being superintendents. The house was well filled by a respectable and literary audience. The school was opened with singing by the elder of the church, and the Rev. Elisha Weaver was called upon to pray. After which Mr. Fields catechized the different classes composing the school, and was replied to promptly and correctly, after which the scholars on the part of Dr. Armstrong, were then called up to him and took their stand upon the platform facing the audience, and each was allowed five minutes to repeat from memory the Scripture verses they had learned. Time would not admit them to repeat all they had committed to memory. Consequently they were limited to five minutes each; this being gone through with, they were then taken by the hand separately by Dr. Armstrong, who addressed them as follows: "I am here to fulfil my promise; you have fulfilled yours, in repeating from memory 1362 Scripture verses. It is a pleasing duty, and one the angels delight to look upon, and I believe will be recorded in heaven. You have performed your duty nobly, and for which I present you this Bible, this beautiful book. This precious gift from God contains the revelation of his will to us Receive it and let it be the man of your counsel; consult it often, for in it you will find wisdom, counsel, strength and comfort, in all the trying hours of life. As you pass along through life's uneven ways, and following the precepts therein taught, you will be happy in life, and in death crowned with immortality beyond the grave.

The following are the names of the scholars, with the number of Scripture verses committed to memory, who received their Bible and Testament.

Francis M. Seymore,	401.
Anna M Piner,	268.
Louisa Allen,	238.
Harry Dorsey.	72.
Mary Allen,	134
Charlotte Scott,	136.
Adam Parler,	118.

After the three first named scholars received their gifts, the crowded audience was then addressed by Dr Armstrong, on the subject of the benefit of Sunday schools, not only in our day, but in all time to come, with a word of encouragement to teachers, and Superintendents, which was followed by an address from Coulson Hilskill, Esq., Rev. Charles Parker, and the President of the Sunday-school, Rev. Stephen Smith. The meeting was then closed with prayer and benediction, by Rev Joshua Woodlin.

CONTINENTAL RESTAURANT.

The advertisement of this most popular establishment (kept by Brother Joseph H. Cole, No. 717 Lombard Street) will be found in another column in the advertising department. We most cordially recommend our friends and the public generally to give Brother Cole a call—for he is a gentleman of good standing in Bethel Church—now we believe a class leader, but formerly a Trustee of the same: and he is well worthy of the liberal support and patronage of all well-wishing and Christian friends. Everything about his entire establishment is kept neat and tidy, and all conducted in the most business-like manner Every one who would indulge in a good dish of those most delicious bivalves, Oysters, should just "drop in" at Brother Cole's Restaurant

NOTICE

Rev Brother Editor:—Having been appointed by the Bishop and Conference to the oversight of the Camden, N. J. Circuit, of which Brother Thomas H. Cooper is preacher in charge, I accordingly held a Quarterly Conference in the A. M E. (Bethel) Church at Woodbury, on Saturday the 11th ult., for Camden, Woodbury and the Mission School House at Kaighnsville, said Conference consisting of sixteen members. We had a very agreeable time in the Conference; we had preaching on Saturday evening, love feast on Sunday morning, and sacrament after preaching, and at 3 o'clock, P. M., and also in the evening. The good Lord was pleased to meet with us in a very powerful manner, to the convincing and converting of several precious souls; and twelve came forward to the altar, and joined on probation. May the good Lord continue with Br. Cooper in his charge, and may he be a bright and shining light in the ministry. We want good, intelligent, and industrious men for the itinerant work—men that will "study to show themselves approved unto God—workmen that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth" from error, for the redemption of our race from the ruins of sin and death which seem to be advancing. Yours fraternally,
Joshua Woodlin.

PSALMS AND PSALMODY.

We can remember the day when the radical notion of singing, in most of our churches, seemed to be noise. If a man roared along with the precentor, he flattered himself that he was singing; and his private conviction was that the louder he roared, the better he sang The consequences were appalling. Everybody shouted at the pitch of his or her voice; shrill, quavering cries, howls, and deep bass groans rose tumultuously together; and over all, the precentor with stentorian lungs, attempted either to drown the wild discord, or reduce it to something like harmony. It is well for us that He to whom such praises were sung, listens to the music of the thankful heart, rather than to the discord of the untutored voice.

There is another feature that has been undergoing rapid improvement of late; we mean the relation of the tune to the words. Fifty years ago, such a thing was never thought of. The precentor who could get through a tune without going wrong, and stick by the same tune through successive verses, and, moreover, sing loud enough to control the voices of the people, was reckoned the right man in the right place; if not, indeed, the realised ideal, the just precentor made perfect. Many churches, however, thought themselves exceedingly well off when they could secure a precentor who, if he fell out of one tune, had a knack of easily getting into another; or, if he began a long-metre psalm to a short-metre tune, contrived to cram the lines into the short-metre without having to stop and begin over again. Such a thing as harmony between the tune and the psalm, does not seem to have entered into the heart even of a precentor to conceive. Different tunes were expected for the sake of variety; but the performance of one on the ground of its consonance with the sense of the psalm was never thought of. If a precentor had picked up a lively tune, he would use it once for a paraphrase like, without any perception of incongruity; while he would sing other verses, like, to some tune as mournful as the wail of a cemetery. There are now in circulation several admirable books classifying the tunes according to the special emotions they are fitted to express or excite, and indicated the tunes that are most suitable to each psalm, paraphrase, or hymn.

"Few are thy days, and full of woe," etc.

"Hark! the glad sound!"

Even when the tune harmonizes with the sentiment, there are sometimes ludicrous effects produced by repetitions and suspensions of the voice. These can be avoided by little attention, but this little attention is not always given. A few Sundays ago, we were amused to hear the choir of a church proclaim that they were about to engage in an entomological pursuit as expressed in the following line of a hymn:

"And we'll catch the flee—
And we'll catch the flee—
And we'll catch the flee—sing hear!"

SINGING IN POTTAWOTTAMESE.

A Western paper reads a severe lecture to a certain church chorister; and we copy part of the castigation for the benefit of the "haw-haw-ing gentry the world over:

"My Dear Sir—You are a chorister. Your chare of worship of the sanctuary is no slight one, and would that you appreciated it more fully. Let us illustrate the point by calling to mind, and placing before the eye, what you actually did last Sunday. The hymn had been given out. It was a familiar and beautiful one, that minds, long in glory, loved to sing while on earth, and whose spirit they did not exchange in the songs they sing now. With those words before you, this is what you sang; for our short-hand reporter, whom we had detailed for this express service in the loft, took it down verbatim.

"Waw-haw, waw, daw aw waw,
Thaw saw, thaw law aw waw,
Waw-haw, law thaw raw-raw-raw-braw
Aw thaw raw-jaw-saw aw."

"Now, that is what to the eye looks like pious Pottawottamie, and might be a translation for the sacred edification of that lost tribe. But to the ear, of what advantage was it? Not the most careful listening could detect the faintest approach to articulate intelligible sound. And, dear chorister, what you really ought to have sung were words that need not to have been cloaked. They were full of the spirit of the Sabbath, a very ointment box of psalmody. These were the words you travestied:"

"Welcome, sweet day of rest,
That saw the Lord arise;
Welcome to this reviving breast,
And these rejoicing eyes."

"Well, what did you gain in giving the version which as stated has a startling resemblance to Pottawottamie? Was devotion heightened by your efforts? Why should you do this? Music should be the vehicle of the sentiment. Dear chorister, does not your vehicle greatly resemble one of those conveyances known to the traveling caravan, and useful only in defeating the purpose of surreptitious inspection of the animal enclosed? Don't you remember how painfully futile were your own juvenile exertions to see the kangaroo or some other hairy exotic, through a crevice? You knew the animal was there; you were none the wiser for what you saw; and the menagerie man was the most delighted party to the transaction. Now yesterday, the poor hyme (poor only because exposed to your murderously-musical assaults) was similarly shut up, and enclosed from all the senses; and for the life of us, we could not have told by any process Chironomic, whether you were vociferating in English, Iroquois, or native Indian Chorister, don't do it any more. Call your choir together during the week, ask the clergyman to give you the hymns to practise upon, and then devote time enough to the rehearsal, if time be all that is wanted, to give the sentiment and pious fervor of the hymn as clearly as from the desk itself, while your rendering of the music shall bear it higher and nearer the throne than the reader can, be his intonations the best the pulpit can produce

The above piece is well timed, and it would be well for leaders of choirs to read it.—Ed

Religious Intelligence.

American Bible Society.—The stated meeting of the managers was held at the Bible House, Astor Place, on Thursday, 2d inst., at half past three o'clock, P. M., the Hon. Luther Bradish in the chair, assisted by Wm. B. Crosby, Esq.

The decease of the Rev. Dr Turner, for many years a member of an important committee of this Society, a life director, and constant friend, was announced. Whereupon the Rev Dr De Witt read, as appropriate to the occasion, the 90th Psalm and offered prayer.

Three new auxiliaries were recognized, two in Connecticut and one in Indiana.

Communications were presented from several agents in regard to the state of the work, and the supply of soldiers; from the Rev. Ludwig S. Jacoby, Germany, in regard to publishing the New Testament and Psalter at the expense of the Society, and the large demand for them, and also in regard to preparation of the plates of a pocket German Bible with references; from Rev. Mr. Dennison, at Hilton Head, acknowledging receipt of books for South Carolina, and giving account of their distribution among soldiers, seamen, and colored persons who are learning to read; from R. C. Henderson, Demerara, B. G., returning thanks for books granted by this Society for distribution; from Rev. Isaac G. Ross, Constantinople, stating the high appreciation of the Armenian reformers Bible, electrotyped and printed at the Bible House, with some account of the distribution of the Scriptures in the East; from Rev. A. L. Blackford, Rio de Janeiro, acknowledging the receipt of books granted by the Board, with some account of the Bible work in South America.

Grants were made for the Leake and Watts' Orphan Asylum; to the Presbyterian Board of Missions; to the American S. S. Union for Hayti; to the American and Foreign Christian Union for Carthagena; to Hickman County Bible Society, Ky.; to aid in supplying two destitute counties in Michigan; fourteen volumes in raised letters for the blind; and over 11,000 volumes for supply of soldiers and sailors in the service or in the hospitals, and for colored persons at Hilton Head and Beaufort. These were granted by request of agents, chaplains, auxiliary societies, or responsible persons. This is in addition to what auxiliaries have done on their own account.

Africa.—Catholicism and Protestantism in Africa.—In the official report of the Niger Valley Exploring Party, Mr. Delany, the editor, says, in all his travels in Africa, he never saw or heard of Roman Catholic missionaries, but that it is a surprising fact, that at every slave-trading point where the traffic is carried on, is either a Roman Catholic trading port, or a native agency protected by Roman Catholics. The slave-trade is carried on in its worst forms at all those places where the Jesuit missionaries are stationed, and slaves are held by white foreigners at the old Portuguese settlements along the southern and eastern coasts, though the King of Portugal, three years ago, proclaimed liberty to all the people in his dominions. Roman Catholic Spain, the only professing Christian government which still tolerates this inhuman traffic, has expelled every Protestant missionary from the island of Fernando Po, that they might command it undebated as an export mart for the African slave-trade. On the other hand, he states that wherever Protestant missionaries are found in Africa, there are visible evidences of a higher and purer civilization, in the Sabbath and secular schools, in the introduction of the manners and customs, the arts and sciences of civilized life, and in the high regard set upon the Christian religion, and the faith reposed in the moral integrity of the missionaries.

Revival in Glasgow.—The revival in this city still goes cheeringly forward. A number of young men, who work all the week, are preaching to the common people with great power and benefit. The labors of the Free [Scotch] Church, the daily union prayer-meetings, and the efforts of an association of Christian ladies, are all much blessed. It is said that there are 100,000 people in Glasgow who attend no place of worship.

Personal.

Mr John Goodno, a Bookseller of Boston, lately deceased, left, in his will, three acres of land and twenty-five thousand dollars in cash for the establishment of a library in Sudbury, his native town.

Hon. Jacob M. Howard, of Detroit, has been chosen United States Senator from Michigan in place of the late Senator Bingham, whose term would have expired March 4, 1865.

Chauncey F. Joslin, a Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Union College, at Schenectady, New York, for a number of years, and since [illegible] President of the city of New York, died in that city on the 21st ult., about sixty-five years of age.

Colonel Samuel Colt, who has obtained a world-wide notoriety from the manufacture of Colt's revolving fire-arms, died on Friday morning, the 10th inst., at his residence in Hartford, Ct.

Hon Horace Binney, one of the ablest and most distinguished jurists of this country, and now in the eighty-second year of his age, has lately given to the world a pamphlet on "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus under the Constitution," and conclusively shows that the right to suspend it is vested in the President, and not in Congress.

Horace Greeley delivered a lecture recently to a crowded audience in the Smithsonian Institute in Washington, D. C., on "The Nation," and had among his hearers, President Lincoln, Secretary Chase, and several members of Congress

Messrs. Ellis, Britton, and Eaton, of the Novelty Works, Springfield, Vermont, have proposed to give the United States fifty thousand dollars a year, for ten years, for a lease of twenty thousand acres of the land confiscated near Port Royal, South Carolina, with a guarantee of possession and protection until they propose also to give employment upon the land, support and schooling, to five thousand liberated negroes—this proposition to be accepted on or before the 20th of January, 1862 in order that arrangements may be made for the next cotton crop

Hon. Simon Cameron, having resigned his seat in the Cabinet as Secretary of the War Department, Hon E. M. Stanton has been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate in his place.

Henry Kern, a well known citizen of Philadelphia, and an active public man during the administration, of General Jackson and President Polk, died on the 12th inst. in the 76th year of his age.

General McClellan and His Plans On Wednesday, as our readers learned yesterday by telegraph from Washington, General McClellan appeared before the Joint Committee of Congress on the Conduct of the War, and the result was that those members who had been most prejudiced against him confessed that they had done him injustice, and that they were completely in the wrong. According to all accounts, his explanations of the campaign, past and prospective, were most satisfactory, and inspired the fullest confidence in his generalship. His magnificent plans startled and astonished the Congressmen.

The interview of General McClellan on Wednesday with the Congressional Committee on the War is said to have resulted in satisfying the Committee that the plans of the Commanding General will surely effect the speedy suppression of the rebellion and the termination of the war. General McClellan is now thoroughly restored to health, and will vigorously prosecute the campaign upon the safe and wise ground he has laid down for himself.

The New York Times conspicuously publishes a letter, "written by a person who speaks from the highest possible authority," in defence of General McClellan's plan of military action. "The war will be over," says the correspondent, "and their dearest wishes, perhaps, be realised by the logic of events sooner than their wildest dreams anticipate." "Any attempt to weaken him with the army would be a calamity to be deplored by the whole nation. The full fruition of all our hopes is at hand." "General McClellan has caught the rebels in their own trap. They are like a fox in a burrow with one hole, where they must soon be forced out, and then General McClellan will fall upon them like a thunder-bolt. The public will not then complain of his want of energy I tell you, it will be so fearful as to have waiting and reasoning to go up from every Southern household) Knowing what I do, and have thus but barely hinted at as the grand plan of the campaign, I repeat that the rebels are doomed, and Secession will never again raise its hydra head in the land."

The Philadelphia Press says: "No newspaper in this country has recognized General McClellan's ability with more enthusiasm than the Press. We are his friend, and have always trusted him with the frankness of friendship, and it is with the frankness of friendship that we represent to him how earnestly and earnestly the people of this nation long for an advance movement, for 'the full fruition of all our hopes.' When he chooses to strike the blow, the rebellion must reel into perdition. There is a state of demoralization among the Southern people, they are suffering from a ruined currency, a ruined commerce, general ruin and desolation every where. Harassed, and hemmed in, the spirit is gone, and the protests against secession from all parts of the South are heart-rending The natural momentum of such an army as General McClellan commands would sweep it, if used away from the Potomac in Patagonia, and, guided by a commander entrusted and beloved, it would very soon bring peace and dignity to the Republic and eternal honor to his name."

Grand Combinations, and their Probable Success.—If General McClellan, by skillful strategetical combinations, should be able to force Beauregard from his intrenchments, the latter must retreat, probably through North Carolina. His supplies would not be drawn to any great extent from that State, but must be obtained from Tennessee and Georgia. But these links are becoming daily more uncertain. If Generals Buell and Halleck's combinations should be successful, their forces would speedily control the Virginia and East Tennessee Railroad, and thus break one great artery of supply. Burnside's column on the East, and Sherman's on the South, we may suppose would soon cut off many [illegible]

If Beauregard should make his retreat among the mountains, apart from the difficulty of transit and support, he would be among a comparatively unfriendly population, as nearly all the mountain inhabitants of the South are notoriously Unionists in sentiment. If the course be near the seaboard, our lines of communication would be easily made with the sea. Indeed, it is not probable, in any case, that the Grand Army of the North would depend upon the long line of land communications for supplies, but would connect directly with our fleet and transports in the Southern ports. Furthermore, in case of the success of General Buell's forces, there would be an army of 120,000 men in Beauregard's rear, who might either cross the mountains into Virginia, or, if his retreat were continued beyond that State, would at once march into Georgia, and support themselves on her rich grain districts, thus threatening the rebel army in front and rear. During this time General Halleck's army of 100,000 men would have been at tempting the perilous task of conquering the Mississippi Valley. With this accomplished, he would be prepared, from New Orleans as a base, to march his army through the Gulf States, and join the other victorious columns in some central point in Georgia or South Carolina.

This sketch of our campaign is, of course, outlined on the supposition that each column is to be successful—an hypothesis hardly probable. But supposing a disaster in any one of the flank and rear movements, that Halleck, for instance, is unable to force the batteries on the Mississippi, or that Sherman is detained by his next work of creeks and rivers, or Burnside is defeated, we still have the two great conquering columns of McClellan and Buell for it is difficult to believe that either of these armies can be beaten, even if for a time held in check, and these alone, or either one, ought to be able to settle the question and end the war

Where and When the War May Terminate—From a common sense view of the matter, and from observing all the movements in progress which are open to public view, it appears evident to us that, instead of the first battle being fought at Manassas, the last battle will be fought there, and then the country will reap the fruits of the victory, and be well satisfied of the profound military wisdom which planned the campaign.

We have this rebellion now so completely invested and overshadowed by an overwhelming military strength, that if the administration and the army, for even a month longer, are sustained instead of being thwarted and embarrassed by Congress, we shall have peace with the return of Spring

CONDITION OF THINGS AND STATE OF OPINION IN THE SOUTH

The Situation of the South Carolina Seaboard—The Charleston correspondent of the Richmond Examiner, writing under date of January 5th, gives the following as "the situation of the seaboard:"

"All accounts seem to agree as to the fact that the Yankee gunboats are admirably managed. They range at will up and down the little lagoons of the coast, and their rifled guns are always served with great precision. It was probably the consideration of this great advantage which the enemy possesses that has induced General Lee to fall back from the shore line of the main, and to choose his position for a final stand about three miles from the Ocean river. The position of the hostile forces at this time may be briefly stated as follows: The enemy, by means of his gunboats, holds command of Broad river and St Helena Sound, with all the intervening islands. His troops also occupy the main land just opposite Port Royal ferry, and can now possess themselves, when ever they please, of the rest of the shore opposite to Port Royal Island, making, in all, a tract of about six miles long and half a mile wide, immediately bordering on the Ocean river. This tract has been abandoned altogether by the Confederate forces, which have receded about three miles toward the railroad, leaving a strip of rice lands, averaging two miles in width, separating them from the positions yielded to the enemy. These rice fields have all been 'flowed' or inundated, by military authority, so that there are now only a few narrow roads by which the Yankees can push forward toward the interior. Should they advance, of course they must abandon the support of the gunboats, and trust to their own strength upon the land."

Southern Depression The Southern papers afford conclusive proof of the increasing discontent and demoralization of the rebel army. It is admitted by the Richmond journals that the insertion and consequent which has fallen upon the troops is working out terrible results. The Richmond Examiner says that, while the rebel army is accomplishing nothing, the Northern government has been making movements and assaults, and carrying on plans of attack to suit themselves, without any delays or alarms, ever since they were compelled to make hasty preparations for the defence of Washington several months ago. The whole tone of the Southern papers would seem to indicate a fear that the rebellion is in immediate danger of breaking up.

General Beauregard's name has been from the commencement, so intimately associated with this army, that no other commander is identified with it in the popular mind. He is the idol of the army, he excites the enthusiasm of the soldiery who never he appears among them, the troops have unbounded confidence in his ability and his valor; yet Gen. Beauregard has no power to carry out any idea he may form, no opportunity to develope the plan of a campaign, no right even to execute a single movement Richmond governs, directs and plans, as far as any plans have influenced the campaign. Richmond dictates not only the policy of the war, but its method, while in the public mind expectation is directed to the generals, and high hopes are formed from their enterprise and skill. In addition to all this, General Johnston is in chief command—a soldier amply capable of conducting our army to victory, but whose admitted skill and acquirements would be far more useful to the country in a separate and independent theatre of action. The truth is, that the presence of both General Beauregard and General Johnston in the army, so far from being needed, is a means of paralyzing the usefulness of both and distracting the minds and the confidence of the soldiers.

We copy the following extract from the Richmond Examiner of the 8th inst.

The effect of this obstinate adherence to the defensive programme has been very deplorable upon the lists of mortality. While we have lost thousands by disease, we have lost only tens by the casualties of the battle field. The whole country is filled with mourning, and the sad lament of mother, father wife, sister, all, is that their kinsmen died the [illegible] death of the hospital and not the glorious death of the soldier on the battle field. Our noble spirits that, in volunteering for their country's defence brought to seek glory in the camp with, have paid the debt of nature upon beds of fever in fetid charnel houses of disease, where those who mourn attend to them knew not their names, and where they were lost to all possibility of discovery from anxiously seeking friends.

The Exchange of Prisoners So far almost one thousand prisoners on each side have been exchanged, nearly five hundred of whom were connected with the army of the Potomac. The system of exchanges inaugurated by our government is fully reciprocated by the rebel authorities.

The Kansas Contested Seat in the Senate The contested election case of Frederick P. Stanton against General Lane is considered one of the most interesting that ever came before the Senate. Gen Lane's right to his seat was confirmed by a vote of 24 against 16.

General Pillow's Resignation—The resignation of Gen. Pillow, I respect [illegible] federate army, is confirmed.

The Cultivation of Cotton and Sugar in the Non Slaveholding States.—The Commissioner of Patents has issued a circular, in which he says

"The cultivation of cotton in the middle portions of the free States is beginning to attract general attention. To prevent failures in its cultivation, it is proper to remark that it is a principle in vegetable physiology that tropical plants can never be acclimated in the North, except by a repeated reproduction of new varieties from seed. The attempt to grow Sea Island cotton, such as is now brought from Hilton Head, would prove a failure in any portion of the free States. The only varieties capable of successful cultivation in these sections now seeking introduction in the green seed cotton, such as is now being raised extensively in Arkansas, Missouri, Tennessee, and portions of Kentucky, and which produces the white fibre. Seed should be obtained from those localities. The acclimation of soil and climate will influence the size of the plant, the length and fineness of the fibre, and the product of the crop. No reasonable doubt is entertained of success of the culture in all mild portions of the Middle States, and efforts are now making by this division to procure the proper seed for distribution.

Puzzled by Circumlocution.—The Cincinnati Gazette illustrates the vexations of official circumlocution by the story of a darkey, who waited upon a certain military gentleman with a bill of $1.15, for washing done at the camp hospital, which, after undergoing a rigid scrutiny by the officer, was returned with the following explanation, which the astonished son of Ethiopia listened to with an equal amount of wonder and perplexity. "This bill," said the military gentleman, "will first have to be sent to the Quartermaster-General at Washington, and he will report to the Adjutant General, who will lay it before the Secretary of War for his approval. The Adjutant being satisfied, it will be sent to the Auditor of State, who will approve of it and send it to the Secretary of the Treasury, who will send it to the United States Treasury, who will at once dispatch an order to the collector of this port to pay the bill." The darkey relieved himself of a long-drawn sigh. "Then, masse," he remarked, "dat last gemblan you spoke of pays for de washing, does he?" "No," continued the other, "he will hand it to the Quartermaster: but, as there is no such officer at present, some proper person must be appointed by the Secretary of War, under direction of the President, and his appointment must be approved by the Senate. Congress not being in session now, the commission cannot be issued until after it meets. When this commission is received, the Quartermaster will show it to the collector and demand the funds. You will then call upon him; he will examine your bill, and if correct, he will pay it. You give your receipt." The unfortunate negro first scratched his head, then shook it, and finally said, "I guess I'll hab to let dis washing slide, but it am de last job I does for Uncle Sam, shu'e!"

Our National Coin.—It is said that the Secretary of the Treasury has ordered the devices on our national coin to be so changed as to signify the religious faith of the nation, and its trust in a Supreme Being

Although a large number of men were arrested and severely punished in Arkansas for expressing sentiments friendly to the Federal Union, it appears by a rebel paper published in Little Rock that some of those who sympathized with them were not intimidated by the threats and punishment of the rebels. It appears that a Mr. Edmundson, one of the prominent conservative Union men, who betrayed the secrets of the league of Union men, and thus carried a number of them to be hung, and others to be incarcerated in prison, was shot dead by a party of men in disguise.

The Latest News—If we may judge by the signs of the times, we are on the eve of extraordinary movements. Gen. M Clellan has issued an order, stating that no more furloughs will be granted to officers and men, except in cases of the most urgent necessity. Gen. Wool, no doubt thinking that the Burnside Expedition has struck an effective blow, has sent a notice to Gen. Huger, commanding at Norfolk, to immediately remove the women and children out of that town, as he has determined to make an attack on it. Several of the Federal frigates at Fortress Monroe, were making extensive preparations to carry out the orders of General Wool, and a French man-of-war had gone to Norfolk, to protect French interests in that place. The people there were in a high state of excitement, not relishing an attack from General Wool in the front, and Burnside in the rear, and troops were continually arriving there in large bodies. In General Halleck's division, everything wears a brightening aspect, and betokens movements of an extensive character. A large portion of his troops have gone in quest of Price, whose object it is believed is to retire into Arkansas, while another portion is making preparations to take part in the Mississippi Expedition, whenever it is ready to start. The utmost activity prevails in Buell's division, and preparations are being made by him to clear effectually of rebels that portion of Kentucky embraced in his department.

One hundred and fifty more released Federal prisoners arrived at Fortress Monroe, from Richmond, on Friday. The names of those exchanged, and the regiments to which they belong, will be found in another column. They met with a hearty reception at the Fortress, and it is said that their enthusiasm at once more beholding the old flag they had fought, and bled for, was unbounded.

If we may believe the Richmond papers, Union feeling in Richmond is not yet entirely smothered. Hon. James Lyons was appointed by the rebel War Department to visit several persons confined in the Richmond jail on the charge of expressing Union sentiments, and he has just made a report that he finds six of them guilty. He recommends that they be hung as traitors. His recommendations, so far as we can learn, have not yet been carried out.

Romney has been occupied by the Federal troops, and the rebels, under the command of General Jackson, have marched into the town and occupied it. Our forces fall back to Patterson creek, where they have been reinforced.

Com. Tatnall, one of the most distinguished U. S. navy officers who espoused the rebel cause at the commencement of the war, has recently resigned his position in the rebel navy, and retired from the service in disgust.

The Richmond Examiner of the 10th inst., says, that up to the 12th inst., 540 Confederate soldiers had been buried in the Hollywood Cemetery, near that city. It endeavors to explain this great mortality by asserting that a large proportion of the sick soldiers of the rebel army are sent to Richmond when they are in the last stages of fatal diseases.

The same journal contains an article which complains bitterly of the present position of affairs in the South. It alleges that McClellan holds Beauregard and Johnston in a vice—that the Union armies are preparing to make terrible demonstrations in every direction, and that the only hope for rebel success, is so to strengthen the forces of General A. S. Johnston at Bowling Green, as to enable him to break through our lines in Kentucky, and force his way into Ohio.

The New Orleans Bulletin, of the 7th, mourns the effectiveness of the blockade of that port It admits that New Orleans has been hermetically sealed to the commerce of the world for the last six months, and urges the citizens of Louisiana to make an effort to destroy it, as they have long "waited in vain for the Confederate Government to perform that service."

The War in Kentucky.—GREAT VICTORY!—Gen. Zollicoffer, learning that the Federal forces had appeared in his rear marched out of his entrenchments at Beech on Sunday morning (19th) and attacked General Schoepff in his camp. Our [illegible] were driven in at an early hour and before daylight the attack was made. The battle raged with great fury until three o'clock in the afternoon, when Zollicoffer having been killed, the whole force of rebels fled in confusion to their camp. The loss is not stated but it is thought to be heavy.

The Rebel Peyton, Jr., who is among the killed, is a son of the distinguished ex-member of Congress of that name from Tennessee.

Our [illegible] have been very decisive, and will result in the rout of the whole force defending the right flank of the rebels' position at Bowling Green.

General Thomas, on Sunday afternoon, followed up the rebels to their entrenchments, sixteen miles from his own camp. He found their entrenchments deserted—the rebels having left all their cannon, quartermaster's stores, tents, horses, and wagons, which fell into our hands.

The rebels, in dispersing, had crossed the Cumberland river in a steamboat and nine barges, at White Oak creek, opposite their encampment at Mill Spring. Two hundred and seventy-five rebels were killed and wounded, including Zollicoffer and Peyton. The dead were found on the field.

The Tenth Indiana Regiment lost 75 killed and wounded.

Zollicoffer disgraced himself by committing many fearful outrages in Southern Kentucky. The loyal inhabitants of that region have been most unmercifully maltreated and plundered by his prowling bands. His forces were mainly relied upon to prevent the march of our troops into Eastern Tennessee, and his death and the defeat of his army will probably not only render Southern Kentucky free from the ravages of the enemy, but greatly diminish the difficulties of a forward movement through the Cumberland Gap.

Gen. George H. Thomas, the senior Union general engaged in the late battle, is a native of Virginia, and is one of those loyal officers in the regular army from the seceded States who resisted the machinations of the rebels. When the rebels first invaded Kentucky, he, with Generals Sherman and Schoepff, was sent in that State to take charge of the Federal troops, and repel the invaders.

General Schoepff, his associate brigadier, is a Hungarian by birth, who came to this country to escape the persecutions inflicted on his countrymen. At the commencement of the present rebellion, he held a position in the Patent Office; but, being known to possess military qualities of a high order, he was, on the recommendation of [illegible] appointed to a brigadier-generalship, and assigned to duty in Kentucky.

The Latest—Further particulars of the recent battle at Somerset have been received. The rebels in their precipitate flight from Mill Springs, left two hundred dead and wounded on the field, besides all their cannon, ammunition, and commissary and quartermaster's stores. Their rout was complete, and as no official intelligence from General Thomas was received yesterday at General Buell's headquarters in Louisville, it is presumed that he is busily engaged in following up the enemy, and making prisoners of a large portion of them. The affair was one of the most brilliant victories achieved by the Federal arms since the present rebellion broke out, and too much praise cannot be awarded to the gallant officers and privates who were engaged in it.

Ex-President Tyler died at Richmond, on Friday night, after a very brief illness.

WILMINGTON, N. C., Jan. 18.—A letter received here from a reliable source, at Newbern, dated the 15th inst., says that forty-three Federal vessels are at Hatteras.

An official despatch received at Wilmington, January 19th, from Goldsboro, N. C., January 16th, says that thirty-four small steamers and sixteen sailing vessels were inside, and several large steamers were outside of Hatteras. More are reported at Pamlico Sound

The Recognition of the Southern Confederacy—Comments of the English Press.—[From the London Morning Herald of December 24th—Lord Derby's Organ.]—It may be represented to us that it is impolitic to take open cognizance of a State that, after all, may enjoy but an ephemeral existence; that it were, at all events, wise to wait until the impossibility of the conquest of the South shall be more conclusively demonstrated. And yet we must admit that a pretty strong case could be made out for an immediate recognition of the Confederate government, even whilst we are on peaceful terms with the North!

Thus, all precedent in Europe, and certainly the practice of the Federal Government itself, appears to warrant us in an immediate recognition of the Independent Confederate States.

More Cotton in England Now than at the Same Period Last Year.—[From the London Star, Dec. 23.]—The planters of the Confederate States have made an egregious blunder in supposing that, by retaining their cotton, they could coerce England into an interposition in their favor. So far as they are concerned, cotton is no king. It is not like Tokay, or Johannisberg wine, to be produced only on one given spot of the earth's surface. The demonstration of this, as a fact, is due to the revolt of the Southern States; and the continuance of the blockade, or of whatever other obstacle exists to the exportation of Sea Island cotton, will make the fact an extensive and permanent one.

Now, nine months after the work of Secession began, although the policy of the South has concurred with the objects of the North in prohibiting the export trade of the former, we, in England, find ourselves as well off, nearly, for cotton, as a year ago; that is to say, we have now as large a stock of the article on hand as we had this time twelvemonths. A return which we printed yesterday shows, indeed, that on the 20th of this month there was actually larger stock of cotton at Liverpool than on the 20th of December, 1860.

Our real and enduring interest, therefore, concurs with our clear duty in recognizing the decree of the Federal Government which closes the ports of the South. It is really for our interest that the cotton supply should continue for some time longer, for it will necessitate our getting cotton elsewhere, and not from one country only, but from several.

Curious things are doing in FRANCE. The Church of Rome is about to come again into civil court. Not long since a Romish priest, M Bronet, I believe formerly incumbent of Cendrieux, in Dordogne, requested the Mayor of that place to perform the marriage ceremony for him. The Mayor, assuming that it was wrong for a Roman priest to marry, refused. M. Bron asked for the law, upon which the Mayor refused. It could not be produced, and M Bron, claiming that as a citizen of France he had the same rights and privileges as other citizens, and as the Mayor still refused, he has instituted legal proceedings to compel him to do his duty. Surely France has changed from the day when the word of Rome was law.

Died.

Departed this life, December 3d, ELIZABETH ANN SMITH, the wife of Elder J. H. Smith, of the A. M. E. Church.

She had been sick for the last two years, and during the principal part of that time she suffered much—but, with Christian fortitude she bore up under her afflictions, and left the world in full triumphs of faith in a living Redeemer, for her Christian watch-word was, "I know that my Redeemer liveth; for he liveth in me—the hope of glory; and that my record is on high, and my witness is in heaven." Sometimes she would say, "I wonder why my Lord leaves me here so long to suffer. I long to be gone to my long and never-ending home." And then she would say, "I must have patience and wait till my change comes, and then I will suffer no more." The soul of our sister has gone to heighten the triumph above—to add to Jesus' throne, and clasped in the arms of his love.

The funeral sermon of Sister SOPHIA ANN RESSY was preached on Sabbath, the 5th inst., in Mount Pisgah A. M. E. Church, West Philadelphia, by Elder J. H. Smith, of Burlington circuit. The services were opened by reading the 23d Psalm. The hymn sung was on page 427—

"Hosanna to Jesus on high,
Another has entered his rest,
Another has 'scaped to the sky,
And lodged in Immanuel's breast."

After the singing, Brother James Frisby addressed the Throne of Grace in a manner well suiting the occasion, after which the choir sang, and then Brother Smith arose and announced the text from the 21st chapter of Revelation, part of 4th verse, "There shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away."

Sister Berry departed this life April 4th in the full triumph of faith, having been converted in her early childhood days. She told Br. Smith, a few days before she died, when he visited her, that she was going to heaven to shout one eternal round of praise.

She had been a member of the Mount Pisgah Church about twelve years, faithfully adhering to all the rules of government, and also a member of the Benevolent Daughters of Harmony for the past twelve years, and had been their Treasurer for ten years, up till the day of her death. The Benevolent Daughters turned out and made a good appearance on the occasion.

Brother Acorn followed Brother Smith in a very pleasing exhortation, having been a class-mate of Sister Berry, and once he had been her leader. The concluding hymn was sung.

"Jerusalem, my happy home,
O how I long for thee," after which the Benediction was pronounced by Bro. J. H. Smith.

From the Huntington Circuit to the Christian Recorder

As our Quarterly Conference met at the above date, in calling the roll it was found that since we last met the Lord had see fit to take from our number Rev. Brother James Sayres.

The Chairman, Rev. L. C. Speaks, then stated to the Conference that we ought to pay some token of respect to our Rev. Father, as we have an organ by which it may be communicated. On motion, it was resolved by Henry C. Thompson that we should draw up a memoir of the life and death of our departed brother and father

We, your Committee, to whom was referred the duty to draw up a memoir of the life and death of the departed brother, beg leave to submit the following:—

In memory of Rev. Jacob Smith, who departed this life at Roslyn, L. I., Oct. 15, 1861

A mighty man has fallen in Israel—Rev. Jacob Smith. He was a man of most exemplary and devoted piety and Christian zeal. It is due to his memory to say he was a man of God. Our brother lived a Christian life, and when he had accomplished, as a hireling, his day, he quitted the world, dying in the full triumph of faith.

Before his death he requested Brother Anthony Kato to preach his funeral sermon from the text, 2d Timothy, fourth chapter, seventh verse—"I have fought the good fight." He also requested the hymn on page 419 to be sung.

"And let this feeble body fail."

He was buried Oct 17, in the Cedar Swamp burying ground

He was one of the first pioneers [illegible] among the early Fathers. Soldier of Christ, well done!—the battle's fought—the victory's won Presiding Officer.

Died in New Bedford Mass January 14th, 1862, Mr. ARCHY CLARK, in the eighty seventh year of his age.

Brother Clark was born in Prince George's Co, Maryland; in 1812 he emigrated to the North; the principal part of the time he has resided in this city for the last twenty-five years he has been a faithful member of the Christian Church. He was much beloved by all that knew him; truly a father is to rest to gone to rest. After six months' severe affliction he fell asleep in Jesus. W W G

THE CELESTIAL ARMY

I hear the tramp of unseen armies
And the sound of marching feet
As I hear the westward-moving throng
Pass slowly out of sight.

Slowly the bright procession
Wends its way [illegible]
And my soul discerned the [illegible]
Of marching troops in mail.

I hear the great celestial army
Marching to the [illegible]
It seems the starlit [illegible]
Of the mighty martial beat.

Onward, forever onward,
Red Mars led down his clan,
And the moon, like a mailed warden,
Was riding in the van.

And some were bright in beauty,
And some were [illegible]
But these might be, in their greatest height,
The noblest of them all

Downward, forever downward,
Behind Earth's dusky shore,
They passed into the unknown night,
They passed [illegible]

No more! Oh sad note!
And I cried aloud in my grief
For the sight is weak and the sense is dim,
That looks through heated dust.

For stars and the moon I mourn,
Though they seem to fall and die,
Still sweeps with the [illegible]
An endless reach of sky.

And though the hills of death
May hide the bright array,
The marshalled [illegible]
Still keeps its upward way.

Upward, forever upward,
I see their march sublime,
And hear the glorious music
Of the conquerors of time.

And long let me remember
That the gulest Unrest is
May to diviner vision be
A bright and blessed sun

MY DARLING.

Out in the darkness, blinded by pain,
I reach for my darling, in vain, in vain,
For the death angel far over the river,
Carried my baby forever, and ever.

Baby, oh, baby! were you afraid
While in the arms of the angel you laid?
Did he caress you, and kiss you to sleep,
On the long journey, for fear you would weep?

Does the dear Jesus, now, as of old,
Take little children into his fold?
Plead with them, little ones, [illegible]
Is my soul's dream-land sometimes to roam,
Then shall my spirit, forgetting its pain,
Clasp you with rapture, again and again;
And when each morrow comes day after day,
I'll take up my burden and search for the way.

At dawn never more her blue eyes shine
Out of the darkness, searching for mine,
Fairy tones, lisping word after word,
In the heart's chamber may only be heard,
The little feet wearied day after day
Struggled, how vainly, to keep on the way;
Then in its weariness seeking for rest,
Sank the hot forehead close to my breast.

Tiny hands gathered the snow-drop no more;
Long grew the butter-cup close to the door;
Weeping, the violets clung to the ground,
Their beauty unheeded.—Their treasures unfound.
She lay on my bosom, all wordless with pain,
But kissed me, and kissed me, again and again,
One long last look—the last—oh! the last
And out of our home a cherub she passed.

Softly the sunlight stole in the room,
Lifting the shadows out of the gloom,
All, save the one that fell on my heart,
No light had reached it—how could it depart?
I called her my own, forgetting that He
Who asked for her new, lent her to me,
When a bright angel bearing His love,
Said that my darling would lead me above.

Pigeon Creek, June 1st. E. FRANCES R.

A CHICKEN STORY,

WHICH TURNED OUT TO BE ABOUT A DUCK.

"Susy," said George, "let's go and tell stories."

"Well," said Susy.

So George and Susy went down the garden and through the barn-yard, and climbed up by a rail fence to the roof of a shed that was built against the west side of the barn. This was the place where they often went to tell stories. They liked it because they were sure to be free from interruption, mounted up so high, and also because it commanded a very pleasant view. They could see from here the great poultry-yard, and the round pond that bordered one side of it, and, across the pond, the woods which edged its further bank.

"What kind of stories shall we tell?" said Susy, when they were comfortably seated on the shed.

"We will tell chicken stories," replied George, looking down on the clucking, squawking throng in the poultry-yard.

"Well," said his sister, "you begin."

George looked all round among the chickens, and ducks, and turkeys, to find a proper subject for his story. Finally he began thus:

"Early one spring morning, an old duck that had a nest in the bushes on the very edge of the pond, hatched all her ducklings. As soon as they were fairly out of the shell she gave them some breakfast, and then made them go to sleep in the nest. You see, Susy," said George, going back a little, "that the nest was not in our poultry-yard, but on the other side of the pond, near the woods. She made her nest over there to be quiet. Well, when the ducklings were all asleep, as she was very tired of sitting still, and as it was a warm morning, she thought she would just take a swim. So away into the water she went, clear out to the middle of the pond. As she was ducking, and diving, and splashing there, what should come out of the woods but a most dreadful hungry, savage fox, hunting for his breakfast! He smelt out the nest, and spied the fat old duck, swimming about just beyond his reach in the water. Now, you know, Susy, the fox did not care to eat the ducklings, because when they are just hatched they are not much else but bills and legs—though, I suppose, if he had chosen, he could have gobbled them, bills and all, at a mouthful; but he was determined to have the old duck. He was afraid to venture into the water after her, for he was a coward as he was a thief; and so he set all his wits at work devising a plan to make her come on shore." Here George stopped a little, and began to set his own wits at work.

"Well," said Susy, much interested, "what did the fox do?"

"First," continued George, "he hid himself behind some bushes, for fear the duck should see him, and set up such a squawking as would bring somebody down to the pond to see what was the matter. And then he began to consider his plan.—It happened, Susy, that he had been prowling round here so often that he had heard you when you had sometimes come very early to feed the chickens; and he thought he knew just the way you always call them: 'chick,' 'chick,' 'chick.' He was as awfully conceited fellow, who thought himself so clever and cunning that he could do anything, and he concluded that he could make the call just as you did. So this was the plan he formed, that he would call—chick, chick, chick; and when the duck, thinking you had come to feed the fowls, came to take her ducklings over to breakfast in the poultry-yard, he would spring upon her from behind the bushes, and carry her off to his den to devour her. He was so pleased with this thought that he waved his bushy tail to and fro, and his mouth watered, and he licked his jaws with his tongue.

"Well, his plan was all very good; but when he tried to work it, don't you see? he could no more call 'chick,' 'chick,' than you can sing like a canary. 'Cr-e-ock, cr-e-ock,' he barked, and it sounded so much like his own natural voice that the duck fluttered in the water, quite alarmed, and glanced fearfully around; but as she saw no fox, she soon went on again with her ducking and diving.

"When the fox saw his plan had failed, he almost growled out loud with disappointment, but was afraid to make a noise because he did not want the duck to discover him. So he set himself to thinking of some other way to get her [illegible] like the young ducks. He knew that if their mother heard them crying, she would come to a [illegible] but call like a young girl, it was no reason why he should not cry like a young duck. So he [illegible] possible; but when he had done his very best, it sounded most like Bezy whining at your chamber door in the morning, only a great deal more shrill and hoarse, and the old duck took no more notice of it than she would of the wind or the cat birds. The fox was terribly enraged, but as he stood snarling to himself in his anger, an ugly thought came into his wicked old head. 'I'll [illegible] like the ducklings,' he growled, 'I'll make the ducklings cry for me.' He went down to the nest, that was built on a mass of dead leaves and sticks lodged round the root of the old tree that hung over the water, and put his great, rough paws right among the little soft ducklings, rolled up asleep?"

"Dear me!" said Susy

[illegible] waked up terribly frightened to see such a horrid monster glaring at them. They screamed loud enough, you may be sure. Their mother flew toward them; but when she saw the fox, she began to scream too. She went as near the nest as she dared, and there she fluttered and screamed. It was not of any use for her to scream, for it was an very early in the morning that no one was about but John, and he was on the other side of the barn, feeding the pigs, and could not hear her. I believe the fox would have killed the little ducks, and caught the mother, too, if something very lucky had not happened."

"What was it?" said Susy.

"Why, you see, the sticks and leaves on which the nest was made had accumulated in a sort of platform right over the water. This platform was strong enough to bear the duck and her ducklings, but the fox's great heavy fore-paws coming on it, were such a weight that suddenly down went the nest, and the ducklings, and the fox all into the water! The comardly fox was so frightened at the noise that as soon as he could contrive, splashing and dashing, to scramble up on the bank, he ran off shaking his wet sides, and barking and howling till the wood rang

"Good!" said Susy

"And the duck," continued George, "gathered her ducklings together, and brought them home to our poultry-yard; and I hope after that she knew enough not to make her nest in the woods and meadows, where nobody could take care of her. It is a wonder the fox had not eaten her up weeks before."

"George," said Susy, "was that the fox that was caught in our trap last night?"

"Yes," said George; "and I am going to have a pair of mittens made out of his skin."

THE SIN THAT KILLED THE BABY.

A correspondent writes to the American Agriculturist to the following effect:—"I recently attended the funeral of a child of three or four summers. The minister, during his remarks, dwelt upon the fact, that death is the result of sin, which I agreed with. But I thought, while looking upon the lifeless form, that the sin which killed this little one was sin against natural as well as spiritual laws. She was clad for the grave in the garments she had worn while living, and the bare neck and arms, exposed while the child was in health, to gratify the vanity of the parents, had invited the disease which proved fatal. That was the sin which killed the baby, and which is making fearful work with hundreds of others, whose parents prefer fashion to health, and the exhibition of their children's beauty to the safety of their lives."

This language is none too strong. It is positively wicked to subject tender children to such treatment, which would be fatal to adults of vigorous constitution. In our changeable climate, especially, too great precaution can scarcely be taken to guard the throat and lungs from disease They need not be kept muffled with warm clothing, but should always have sufficient protection to guard against the sudden changes, for which this country is noted. Keep the children's chests and arms covered if you would have them healthy.

HYACINTHS IN WINTER

Butler and McCullough's extensive catalogue of Dutch and Cape Bulbs, just published, lays down the following directions for the winter culture of hyacinths: "Place the bulb on the top, and fill the glass with pure rain or soft water, as as almost to touch its base. The glasses should then be placed in a perfectly dark, cool, but not damp, situation, and, in the course of three or four weeks the bulbs will have become sufficiently rooted, and may be removed to the light. In all cases a flower stand or table close to the window is the most desirable position; nevertheless, the hyacinth may be grown successfully on the mantel-piece, or on the centre-table of the room, provided there be sufficient light. The Dutch have another very interesting mode of culture—they take a flat dish, either crystal or porcelain, about the depth of a soup plate, and, according to its size, place three, six, nine or twelve strong, healthy bulbs in about half an inch of water In a few days the roots begin to spread out horizontally, and so clasp each other, that, in the course of a few weeks, they form a natural support for the group. The bulbs may or may not be covered with moss

MENTAL LABOR MORE EXHAUSTING THAN MANUAL.

The Dublin Agricultural Review has the following: To the Rev. Professor Haughton, of Trinity College, Dublin, a philosopher who has enlarged the boundaries of many departments of science, we are indebted for an admirable physiological investigation the results of which have established the curious fact, that the greatest, or we should, perhaps, say the lowest manual [illegible] the greatest eater. The Professor asserts that a man who labors neither bodily nor mentally, but who merely lives, will excrete, for every pound of his weight, two grains of urea per diem. Thus, a man weighing 150 pounds, and engaged in no physical or mental employment, will excrete 300 grains of urea. The urea being the product of the complete decomposition of the nitrogenous animal tissues, it is necessary that the man should consume a quantity of food capable of yielding an amount of nitrogen equivalent to that contained in 300 grains of urea. This quantity of food sufficient, according to the Professor, to keep alive 150 pounds weight of man and the whole of the food is termed by the Professor [illegible] In the case of a working man of standard (150 pounds) weight, the amount of motive power developed by him is indicated by the quantity of urea eliminated from his body, which, in the case of hard-working laborers, is about 400 grains.—We find, then, that a man employed in manual labor, of an unintellectual character, must employ a quantity of food sufficient, by its decomposition, to yield 400 grains of urea, and of this quantity, of aliment three-fourths are expended in keeping the body alive, and the remaining fourth in mechanical work—opus mechanicum. A man engaged in mental labor eliminates a quantity of urea varying, according to Professor Haughton's experiments, from 481 grains to 516 grains, clearly proving that mental work causes a much greater waste of tissue than manual labor.

Professor Haughton states that men employed in more unusual routine labor require only a vegetable diet, while those who are engaged in pursuits requiring the mental [illegible] intellectual faculties must be supplied with food of a better kind.

CHRISTIAN LOVE

MR EDITOR.—The following is a translation of one of the admirable meditations of John Gerhard, a Lutheran of the olden time In the midst of the strifes of tongues, pens, and swords, it is refreshing to dwell upon such heavenly sentiments [illegible]

No Christian is without faith, and there is no faith without love; where the light of love does not exist, there also the fervor of faith is wanting. Separate the light from the sun, and you may be able to separate love from faith. Love is an outward manifestation of the inner life of the Christian. The body dies when without respiration; so [illegible] possible; but when he had done his very best, it sounded most like Bezy whining at your chamber door in the morning, only a great deal more shrill and hoarse, and the old duck took no more notice of it than she would of the wind or the cat birds. The fox was terribly enraged, but as he stood snarling to himself in his anger, an ugly thought came into his wicked old head. 'I'll [illegible] like the ducklings,' he growled, 'I'll make the ducklings cry for me.' He went down to the nest, that was built on a mass of dead leaves and sticks lodged round the root of the old tree that hangs over the water, and put his great, rough paws right among the little soft ducklings, rolled up asleep?"

"Dear me!" said Susy

[illegible] waked up terribly frightened to see such a horrid monster glaring at them. They screamed loud enough, you may be sure. Their mother flew toward them; but when she saw the fox, she began to scream too. She went as near the nest as she dared, and there she fluttered and screamed. It was not of any use for her to scream, for it was an very early in the morning that no one was about but John, and he was on the other side of the barn, feeding the pigs, and could not hear her. I believe the fox would have killed the little ducks, and caught the mother, too, if something very lucky had not happened."

"What was it?" said Susy.

"Why, you see, the sticks and leaves on which the nest was made had accumulated in a sort of platform right over the water. This platform was strong enough to bear the duck and her ducklings, but the fox's great heavy fore-paws coming on it, were such a weight that suddenly down went the nest, and the ducklings, and the fox all into the water! The comardly fox was so frightened at the noise that as soon as he could contrive, splashing and dashing, to scramble up on the bank, he ran off shaking his wet sides, and barking and howling till the wood rang

"Good!" said Susy

"And the duck," continued George, "gathered her ducklings together, and brought them home to our poultry-yard; and I hope after that she knew enough not to make her nest in the woods and meadows, where nobody could take care of her. It is a wonder the fox had not eaten her up weeks before."

"George," said Susy, "was that the fox that was caught in our trap last night?"

"Yes," said George; "and I am going to have a pair of mittens made out of his skin."

THE SIN THAT KILLED THE BABY.

A correspondent writes to the American Agriculturist to the following effect:—"I recently attended the funeral of a child of three or four summers. The minister, during his remarks, dwelt upon the fact, that death is the result of sin, which I agreed with. But I thought, while looking upon the lifeless form, that the sin which killed this little one was sin against natural as well as spiritual laws. She was clad for the grave in the garments she had worn while living, and the bare neck and arms, exposed while the child was in health, to gratify the vanity of the parents, had invited the disease which proved fatal. Domestic Markets.

The Flour market has undergone no change, and holders are firm in their demands, but there is very little inquiry, except for high grades of extra family, at 5.25. The sales to the retailers and bakers range from 5.31 to 5.50 per barrel for common and good [illegible] for extra family. 6.37 up to 7 for fancy lots, according to quality. Rye Flour and Corn Meal are dull; sales of the former at 3.75, and the latter at 3 per barrel. A sale of 300 barrels Brandywine was made at 4.124

WHEAT.—The market is fairly supplied, and the [illegible] at 1.50 and 1.57 per bushel, and small lots of white at [illegible]

BEESWAX is scarce, and prime yellow, if here, would command 32 and 33 c per pound.

CANDLES.—Prices are at only for both Sperm and Adamantine, but there is very little demand for any description.

COFFEE.—The stock has been increased by the [illegible] demand is moderate, but holders very firm; sales of 2,200 bags Rio at 17¼ and 21 cents, 300 bags Laguayra at 22 c., and 140 bags Jamaica at 22 cts., on [illegible]

COTTON.—The latest foreign advices have had [illegible] light and holders very firm in their demands, with small sales of low and good middling Uplands at 15 and 16 cts, and South American at 15 and 16 c.

FEATHERS are steady, with further sales of good Western at 37 and 38 c per pound

FISH.—Mackerel are very dull, there being very little demand, except for small lots from store; sales of No 1s at $10 and 10.25 per barrel, 2s at 8, 3s at 6.25, for large, 5.50 and 5.75 for medium, and 4 for small. Six hundred barrels Eastport Pickled Herring sold in small lots at 2 and 3.50 per bbl; Codfish are held firmly at 4.25.

HIDES.—There is very little doing and the stocks of all kinds are nearly exhausted. Of Oranges and Lemons there are few or none here. Domestic Fruit comes forward slowly. Sales of Green Apples at $3 and 4 per barrel, and Dried Apples at 5 and 7½ c. per pound, for old and new, as to quality. Unpared [illegible] quarters and halves. Cranberries are worth $5 and 10 per barrel, for common to choice quality.

GLASS.—There is nothing doing, and no trade is anticipated until the opening of navigation.

HEMP is held with more firmness, and there is very little stock here to operate on.

HIDES are dull. An import of twenty six hundred and thirty Porto Cabello has arrived, and remains unsold.

HOPS are very dull, and sell in a retail way at 20 and 22 cents per pound for new Eastern and Western.

LUMBER.—The demand continues limited for all kinds, but prices have undergone no change. A cargo of yellow pine sap Boards sold at 13.50 per M feet Lathe are held at 1.20 and 1.25.

MOLASSES is but little inquired after, and the market is quiet; sales of Cuba Muscovado at [illegible] New York Syrup at 32 and 36 c.

OILS.—Linseed continues to sell freely at 85 and 86 c. per gallon. Fish Oils are firm, and for winter Sperm holders have put up their prices, and are now demanding 165. In Red Oil there is nothing doing. Lard Oil is quiet, with sales at 70 and 75 c. for City and Western winter; of Coal Oil, prices are less firm; sales at 45 and 50 c.

PLASTER.—There is more coming forward; the last sale was at 2.25 per ton.

RICE.—The stock is very light, and holders have put up their prices, sales at 7 and 7¼ c., cash.

SALT.—Prices are looking up; an invoice of three thousand sacks Liverpool, ground and fine, and two cargoes of Turks' Island, have arrived since our last notice, one of which has been disposed of privately.

SEEDS.—There is more demand for Clover seed, with sales of two thousand bushels fair and prime at 4.25 and 4.50, including some from second hands at 4.40 and 4.50. [illegible] to [illegible] Timothy [illegible] works of God proceed from love, [illegible] even his punishments; thus all the works of the Christian proceed from love. God has set before us the mirror of love in all his creatures. The sun and stars, do not shine for themselves, but for us: air, earth, water, and all creatures serve men; thus also do thou give thyself wholly to the service of thy neighbor.

Tongues are unprofitable without love, (1 Cor xiii. 1,) because without it, the knowledge of tongues puffs up, but love edifies, (1 Cor viii. 1.) The knowledge of mysteries does not profit without love (1 Cor. xiii 2,) because mysteries are known to the devil, but love is peculiar to the truly pious. Faith also, which removes mountains, does not profit without love, (1 Cor xiii. 2,) because such faith is only that of miracles, not saving. Love is superior to the gift of working miracles because it is the undoubted [illegible] true piety. Miracles are sometimes wrought by the wicked. It is unprofitable to give all your goods to feed the poor, if love be wanting, (1 Cor. xiii. 3.) because the external act is hypocritical, if love be not present: streams of beneficence are unprofitable if they do not arise from the fountain of love. Love is patient, because no one is easily offended with him whom he truly loves. Love is kind, for how can he refuse inferior benefits, who, through love, has given his heart the highest good of the soul. Love exults not, because it regards the good things of others, as it does its own. Love does not act rashly, because no one easily injures him, whom he loves truly from his soul. Love is not puffed up, because by it we become members of one body, but one member does not prefer itself to another. Love does not behave itself unseemly, (1 Cor xiii. 5, 6,) because it belongs to an angry person to confine himself in [illegible] to promptly moderate all assailable points in the United States [illegible] Domestic Exchange, payable on demand, and interest allowed on [illegible] Drafts and Loans bought and sold on commission, and Business Paper negotiated

ANGELS REJOICING.

"I say unto you, that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth."—Luke 15 : 7.

Joy in heaven! what else but joy
Could angels' harps or tongues employ
So near the throne above?
Can they, who see their Father's face;
Whose glory fills the heavenly place,
Want themes their hearts to move?

Joy in heaven! since yonder spheres
Have measured time's revolving years
A moment has not flown,
But angels with their spirit lays
Have lifted high Jehovah's praise,
And shook his awful throne

When bursting from eternal night
Myriads of starry systems bright
Their glittering march began;
The "Morning Stars," with measured song
Observed the bright hosts their paths along,
As through the heavens they ran

And when on rapid wings they fly
Amid the wonders of the sky
And list the chiming spheres,
As round the throne of God they roll,
And fling from heaven's remotest pole
Sweet echoes on their ears:

O what upon this atom ball,
Obscured, accursed by Adam's fall,
A den of rebels vile;
O what could win from angels' pure—
Whose minds no evil can endure,
A sweet, approving smile?

Can they from starry homes look down,
Where roots Jehovah's angry frown,
With aught of true delight?
No doubt our glittering mountains fair,
Our fields and floods and ocean air,
Might please an angel's sight.

No doubt, a seraph's flaming eye
Might in our groves or fields espy
Some sweet sequestered bower,
Where murmuring brook and vernal lay
Might o'er from Gabriel steal away
A calm and pensive hour.

But Oh, 'tis neither field nor flower,
Nor vernal lay, nor blooming bower,
Fills angels' hearts with joy:
'Tis not our mountains bathed in light,
Nor gems, nor gold, nor rivers bright,
Nor heavenly harps employ.

'Tis not when fiery storms of war,
Pursuant to Freedom's conquering car,
Sweep down the tyrant foe;
'Tis then when oppressed millions rise,
With Freedom's shouts to rend the skies,
So angels raptures know.

But when a soul with sin oppressed,
And hands upon his contrite breast,
To heaven for mercy cries.
When tears of true repentance flow,
And storm rise in mountains grow,
And soon to pierce the skies!

O then, when from the coming wrath
From sinner's dreaded doom of death,
The guilty rebel flees;
When to the cross his soul repairs,
And through the storm of rising fears
His bleeding Saviour sees:

Then, then, O THEN, his angel flies
Back with the tidings to the skies,
Nothing his wing delays
Far through the regions of the air,
He rushes like a flaming star,
Nor yet his speed delays:

But on through circling systems bends,
He scorns their churning tones attends,
So eager in his flight;
And when the walls of heaven appear,
He mounts them like a rising star,
Sweeping his path of light.

To eyes around the throne he seems
Like Venus when the morning gleams
With blush of coming day;
But soon the hills of heaven o'erpast,
He smites the great white throne at last,
Seraphs their songs delay.

And when in heard the joyful sound,
"The dead's alive, the lost is found,"
'Mid heaven's enraptured throng:
When zeal on zeal their harps resound
The dead's alive, the lost is found,"
Millions the strain prolong,

"Salvation! O thou risen Lamb
The First, the Last, the Great I am,
Salvation to thy name;
Let heaven's eternal thrones resound;
"The dead's alive, the lost is found"
And earth resound, Amen!"

SWARTS.

VANITY.

Taught by long experience, Lord,
By thy Spirit taught, I see,
True is thy covenant word,
All an earth is vanity
Empty all our bliss below,
Seeming bliss, but real woe

Turning, then, from earth away,
Seek, my soul, the joys above—
Solid joys without allay;
Saviour, in thy heart-felt love,
Heavenly comfort I possess,
True, substantial happiness.

Now I find the good of man,
Now I answer thy design,
All in Thee alone obtain
Plenitude of grace divine;
Plenitude of glory too,
Thee, when face to face, I view.

SIMPLICITY.—Some able and excellent men are never able to get down to the level of children. A man of this class, a learned theological professor, was once engaged to address a Sunday-school. He read a number of verses from the Bible, and then said: "Children, I intend to give you a summary of the truth taught in this portion of the Scriptures." Here the pastor touched him, and suggested that he had better explain to the school what "summary" meant. So he turned round, and said to the children: "Your pastor wants me to explain what summary means, and I will do so. Well, children, summary is an abbreviated synopsis of a thing."—Christian Intelligencer.

WHILE we are coldly discussing a man's career, sneering at his mistakes, blaming his rashness, and libelling his opinions,—that man, in his solitude, is perhaps shedding hot tears because his sacrifice is a hard one, because strength and patience are failing him to speak the difficult word, and do the difficult deed.

TAKING THOUGHT FOR THE MORROW

The last No. of the "Evangelical Review" contains some remarks on Matt 6 : 24—ed, which it seems to us should not pass unnoticed. Their amiable author will not take it amiss if we differ with him in regard to the application of the passage and frankly state the ground of our difference. Every mistake in the interpretation of Scripture, especially when the error is recommended by an influential name, may be mischievous in its consequences, and it is because these remarks in question seem to us open to a construction which tends to lower the standard of Christian morality, and thus to offer some encouragement to that self righteousness and impenitence which is natural to us all, that we would here make some observations upon the subject.

That our Saviour's prohibition of taking thought for our life in respect to meat, and drink, and raiment, is not to be restricted to the first disciples merely, appears to us sufficiently evident from this fact alone, that in the absence of any intimation in the passage itself, and of any necessity in the "proportion of faith" requiring it, such a restriction is entirely arbitrary. For it is not claimed that our Lord uses language which limits this portion of His sermon to particular persons, any more than any other part of it; and the assumption that its general application would bring the passage into conflict with the duty of providing for one's own house by industry and thrift, is entirely gratuitous, as neither expressly, nor by implication, is it said that, because we must take no thought for to-morrow's food and clothing, we should spend the day in idleness and neglect of the duties of our calling.

But there is everything in the argumentation of the passage to refute such a restriction. The care for to-morrow is represented as foolish and faithless, and one, therefore, be just as little permitted to other Christians as to the first disciples. For it will not be presumed that though it was wrong for them, it is right for us to do that which is indicative of littleness of faith and of a Gentile disposition. That which is presented as a reason to one has just as much force as an argument to another. "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on" Why? Because, in the first place, it avails you nothing; "Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature?" A little man may think and torment himself with thoughts about becoming larger until his life closes, and what will he have gained? Growth depends on God, not on man. A man may grieve all the day and all the morrow about his meat and raiment without increasing his store in the least, and this for the simple reason that it is God who giveth the increase. It is just as useless for one to take thought now as it was then; just as vain for any other man as for one of those who first followed the Lord. Nay, it is worse than useless; for, in the second place, this taking thought increases the trouble. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We have enough of sorrow, and enough of harassment in our daily toil and daily duty; why impose upon ourselves additional burdens by harboring thoughts, which in their very nature are harassing, about the results of our toil and the quantity and quality of the blessings which God may be pleased to bestow? Just as soon as you begin to take thought about your life, for which God alone can properly care, and for which He has promised to care, you have taken an oppressive weight upon yourselves; for as you cannot provide, in the best case, and are not content to let God provide without your intermeddling, your thoughts can only be unremitting anxiety. And this is true of all men alike, for God alone provides for all. Thirdly, such taking thought is rebuked by the birds and flowers. These chirp and sing, these bloom and scent the air, and God feeds and clothes them bountifully and beautifully They accomplish their end in adorning and gladdening the earth, and that is all they need. They do their part in singing and blooming, and God does His in feeding and clothing them And shall man be put to shame by inferior creatures? True, the very fact that we are endowed with intelligence makes more incumbent upon us; we have received more and of us more is accordingly required. But this is indubitable, that among those things which are required of us, this is not one, that we should forego all trust in God's providence and set about providing for ourselves. We shall do God's will, as the birds and flowers do it, and then let God take thought for our life, what we shall eat, and drink, and wear, as He does for the birds and flowers. And this is the duty of not only a few, but of all. Fourthly, such taking thought manifests a want of consideration that is by no means honorable to men, for it is surely reasonable to trust that God since He gave us life, will bestow upon us what is necessary to sustain it, and that since He formed the body He will also furnish raiment to clothe it "Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" Our taking thought can just as little support life as it can impart it; our preservation is just as much in God's hands as our creation; and our knowledge of this should banish from our souls those thoughts about to-morrow's bread, the harboring of which betokens the prevalence in the mind of the vain and sinful notion that, after all, man must provide for himself, and therefore, be careful for everything. And, finally, the taking thought for to-morrow, as it manifests a want of faith in our heavenly Father's care for us, is heathenish. "After all these things do the Gentiles seek" The Gentiles who know not God may trouble themselves about to-morrow's sustenance, to whom should they trust but to themselves? But we have a kind Father who cares for us as surely as He does for the fowls and the lilies! Him shall ye trust—have faith in God! The refusal to do this is a departure from Him—is straying into pagan paths. "Ye cannot serve two Masters." Serve God, seek His kingdom and righteousness, and you will have no need to trouble yourself about the necessaries of this life: He will care for these—He will add them unto you. But if you labor for gold, or even if you seek for the means wherewith to support life and render it comfortable as an end in itself, as though they were not wholly God's gracious gifts, you are serving some other master: mammon or the flesh God will have us to be His, and trust wholly in Him, letting Him provide, while we seek to do his bidding, and to be without those thoughts about the ways and means which, so long as we cannot see into the future, must necessarily be anxious. We are to live by faith, and ever call to our wayward hearts, when we find them taking thought about that which is not at all our business, "O ye of little faith." And most assuredly if taking thought comes from littleness of faith and heathenish distrust of our heavenly Father's tender care over us, it cannot be intended that all may indulge these thoughts excepting only the first disciples. We cannot but think them sinful, and the struggle against them necessary to our best Christianity.

It does not follow from the unrestricted application of the passage to all, that idleness would be promoted and all business frustrated. If this were the necessary result it is not easy to see why it should not be so in the case of the few, to whom it is proposed to restrict the application, as well as in the case of others. If other Christians require something more than merely the knowledge that it is God's will, to induce them to labor, why not the disciples also, seeing they were sinful beings like ourselves? They were active men, "not slothful in business," because the God whom they served desired them to labor. Is it right for us to labor from other motives? Must we take thought for the morrow and perceive that our industry is a condition of prosperity, before we can be induced to apply ourselves to the duties of our calling? The Gentiles may do this, but it would ill become Christians. These take thought to serve God, and God takes thought for their life, what they shall eat and what they shall drink

That men are required in the sweat of their brow to eat their bread to be diligent in their calling, to labor with their hands, those who read the Scriptures need not be told. To do this is just as much a service of God as to pray or search the Scriptures. Thus the Christian cheerfully complies with from love to God who enjoins it That we are bound to pray for our daily bread as well as for those spiritual blessings upon which our everlasting welfare depends, all are aware The Christian attends to this with the assurance that it is no mere empty form, but that the necessaries and comforts of life are actually bestowed by our Father who is in heaven, that these gifts, like all others, come from Him And that we are forbidden to squander the gifts which God imparts, and enjoined to exercise frugality, and take up the fragments which remain, that nothing go to waste, is also manifest from the Bible We cannot conceive how those who labor, and pray, and save, as God wills it, could become reckless idlers because they seek to do God's will in this other respect also of taking no thought about the necessaries of life. For these God takes thought. The Christian asks for his bread, and knows that his Father, who bids him ask, will not withhold it. That he will have enough he knows, for God rules, and what He gives is enough; and whether he shall receive barely sufficient for each day, or be prospered far beyond his petition, he properly leaves to the wisdom of his Father, who doeth all things well. Why then should he take thought about that which God has reserved to Himself? He has enough to do without presuming to interfere with God's prerogatives. The apostle Paul expresses the same command when he urges upon all the words: "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your request be made known unto God;" and St. Peter when he says: "Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you"

The effect which it will have upon us to believe ourselves embraced in the command, will be, not to make us idle and careless in regard to our duties, but humble in view of our great weakness and the littleness of our faith, earnest in clinging to Jesus as our only hope through grace, and all the more diligent to serve God, who gives and forgives so much, in our temporal as well as our spiritual calling. — OLENTANGY.

NATIONAL EDUCATION:—COMPULSION. IS TOO LITTLE RELIGION TAUGHT IN OUR SCHOOLS?

(From the German of Thiersch.)

BY REV C A WENZEL.

National education and ecclesiastical education, are the appellations for two equally perverted systems; for they assert their influence by setting aside that of the family, and assume an unwarrantable authority over that of the father, who alone possesses the right to determine the mode and manner, time and limit of the education and instruction to be imparted to his children. After having deprived the family of its own peculiar sphere of action, schoolmasters, to whose hands it has been committed, are thus brought to regard their position in a light which is as presumptuous as it is false. They declare themselves "the teachers of the nation," and, in this conceit, find ample encouragement from the authority of the State, from their own education and the demands made upon them. By the multiplicity of educational branches, taught in our academies and normal schools, where a superficial knowledge can only be imparted, they are systematically misled to overrate their own abilities, and whilst being thus puffed up with pride, and put forth most immoderate claims, they are afterwards permitted to pine away in that poverty, to which teachers of the simple method of by-gone days might possibly have submitted, but which, to one of our modern public teachers, must be insupportable, and form a continual cause of dissatisfaction, discontent, complaint and discouragement.

The dangers arising out of this system are beginning to be felt here and there, and a simplification of the educational plan, is justly demanded Many ask, as a radical cure of the evil, that more religious instruction be given in our schools. They contend, that the want of this is the cause of whatever evil exists. But this is not true, though well meant by those who urge it. There is too much religion taught in our schools at least so much that fathers and mothers, out of whose heart religion should flow into that of their children, believe themselves justified in neglecting their religious education altogether; so much, that all the world seems confirmed in the delusion, that religious may be acquired like reading and writing; so completely has it become a part of school instruction, that the sacred name of God and the mysteries of the Christian faith, have sunk to the same level with the multiplication table, and become a senseless prattle for life.

There is not too little religious instruction in our schools. But there is too little religion among our teachers. Those who would remedy this want by appropriating more time to the subject, but better see to it, that the mere want is not turned into a dangerous poison. It would be far better to have no religious instruction at all, than that it should be imparted by an irreligious person Orthodox instruction, imparted by a teacher who is morally obtuse, is even more injurious than rationalism itself. He who is left in ignorance in this respect, is usually found susceptible of Christianity in later years, whilst he who acquired a knowledge of the truths of Christianity by compulsion, under an unsanctified teacher, has his moral sensibilities often so blunted, that no impression can be made upon him. He is, indeed familiar with the mysteries of the Christian religion; but they are to him a dead letter, which even the most strenuous efforts of a faithful minister fail to quicken into life.

The religious instruction of a child, devolves, according to the natural order of things, first upon the mother, then upon the father, and then upon their pastor; and, if these do their duty, the aid of the schoolmaster need not be called into requisition. The Christian Church existed a thousand years, without knowing any thing about or needing religious instruction in schools. If it be true that during the Middle Ages, the popular schoolmasters were chosen from the lower orders of the clergy, commonly called readers, the religious instruction of the young may have been partly committed to them; but as soon as schools become national institutions, and schoolmasters the servants of the State, religious instruction, in them and by them, should cease. Nor is there any longer a necessity; for a knowledge of the elementary principles of Christianity is more general among parents now than formerly, and the ministry is also abundantly able to attend to Biblical instruction, at as early a day as possible. If parents receive the necessary direction and encouragement from their ministers, the poorest of them may succeed in imparting to their children a knowledge of the most important parts of Biblical history and the Catechism, long before they are given over to receive instruction, preparatory to confirmation.

Children are born to the parents, and not to the State. Hence parents should not be relieved from their share of the responsibility in the bringing up of their children, both as regards this world and that which is to come.

It is true, that parents are, generally speaking, incapable to assume the entire management [illegible] imparting to their children a knowledge of the elementary branches, as they are disqualified to instruct them in the arts and sciences. Schools, which will aid them in this, are therefore an absolute necessity, and a great benefit But the schoolmaster's authority must be derived from the parents, it must have been voluntarily conferred, and in no instance go so far as to lead parents to consider themselves released from the responsibility of educating their children. As to the Church or State contributing any thing towards the education or support of the teacher, this is a matter of but secondary consideration, as long as the sanctuary of the family and the parental prerogative remains undisturbed Small schools, conducted by private teachers, are always greatly to be preferred to large classes, conducted by public teachers Instead of crowding children into these, it should rather be the endeavor both of secular and spiritual authorities to encourage, in every possible way, the erection of the former

It is a well established fact that, in France, the increase of crime kept equal pace with the enlarged facilities for public instruction. It is equally indisputable that, in Germany, moral culture falls far short of what their comprehensive system of public instruction might lead one reasonably to expect. The spirit which prevailed among the youth of that country, has exhibited itself during 1848 and 1849, these two years of lawlessness and insubordination, in such a way as to fill with disquietude and apprehension even those inclined to put the most charitable construction on things. All parents of correct principles complain bitterly of the difficulty of conforming their children in these principles. One of the chief causes of these complaints is to be found in the preponderance of their school-system. The same spirit which sways the popular mind, also prevails in their public schools, and as no time is man so susceptible to the influence of the spirit of the age, as in the days of his youth. If its current flows in a wrong direction, the youthful mind is irresistibly carried along with it, as soon as he enters the threshold of the school-room. For the influence which the scholars of any school exert on the new-comer outweighs, by far, that which may be exerted by the teacher. What, therefore, can be more hazardous, or be fraught with greater dangers to children, than the sending of them to a public school as early as possible? As long as it can be done, even though it should involve some sacrifice, they should not be exposed to the chilly frosts and withering blasts of the popular mind, but be kept within the genial warmth of family life, where a father's and a mother's eye watches over them, where every tender emotion is nurtured into life, and where they are constantly surrounded by the pure enjoyments of the domestic hearth.

There is something of infinitely greater importance to the child, than that it should be able to read, write and cipher in the course of six years; namely, the cultivation of family feelings, and its establishment in the spirit and principles by which parents of correct moral habits regulate their domestic affairs. There must, above all things, be an increasing consciousness in the child, that it is the child of Christian parents, and that it may not engage in any thing which might be unworthy of them, or of its own Christian name. It should be taught to find its greatest honor and purest joy by filling its allotted place in the household, and by taking an active interest in all that concerns its parents or elder brothers and sisters. It must grow up a member of a particular family, fully developed by it, in perfect consciousness of its position in it, and inseparably connected with it. The convictions which here prevail must become deeply and firmly rooted in its own heart and mind. Then, and not till then, should parents venture upon sending their children to a school, where they are exposed to the danger of encountering views and examples of an opposite nature. We, of course, do not mean to say that such a child will not have to undergo any trials and temptations, for these come to all, at one time or another, and virtue never attains a vigorous growth without them; but it is only after such a foundation has been laid under the paternal roof, that virtue is able successfully to withstand them.

It is, however, not to be denied, that there are numbers of families who, in consequence of extreme poverty, are forced to act in opposition to these principles. And this in the darkest part of the picture presented to us by the increase of poverty around us; it obstructs the proper development of family life. Those who find themselves in this unfortunate situation, cannot, of course, be expected to force themselves and families out of it. But they can and should feel these misfortunes, and earnestly endeavor, with the assistance of God and man, to free themselves from a situation which is as unnatural as it is contrary to the will of God. In the meantime, let them confidently look to Him, in prayer and supplication, who will exercise his care also over orphans of the kind, but only them, when parents have done, in the performance of their family duties, whatever they could.

WHAT IS HUMILIATION FOR NATIONAL SINS?

MESSRS. EDITORS:—In looking at the subject for this day, as stated in some of the papers, I find it recommends all Christians to humble themselves for, and make confession of their own sins, as individuals; and to extend this humiliation and confession to the sins of families, churches, and our own nation.

I would like to call the attention of your many Christian readers, to one question,—What is the duty of Christians in this land in regard to the sins of the nation? The subject for to day, answers, "be humbled for them, and make confession of them." This is certainly very correct. But then the inquiry arises in the mind, What is implied in being humbled for and confessing the sins of the nation? There are many things implied I propose noticing a few—and so point out a few Christian duties in regard to the sins of the nation.

1. It implies a knowledge of the nation's sins How can a person be sorry for or make confession of sins that he is utterly ignorant of? So Christians must endeavor to know what the nation's sins are; how numerous they are, what are their aggravations and deserts. Many do not care about knowing these things; they would rather not hear or read anything on this subject. The language of Hosea iv. 6, is very appropriate to such, and contains a dreadful threatening: "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee." The true Christian endeavors to know as much as he can on this subject; he searches into it in the light of God's holy word. He learns from the word of God the duty of nations, hence he learns from it also, the sins of the nation. As he searches he prays, as Job xiii. 23; "How many are mine iniquities and sins? make me know my transgressions and my sins." In being humbled under the mighty hand of God for the sins of the nation, the Christian will say to God, "Do not condemn me; show me wherefore thou contendest with me." The Christian wishes to come into the light, so as to be able to see clearly the sins of the nation, for which God is visiting it in wrath. They are many and great,—atheism, infidelity, Sabbath-breaking, oppression, corruption, dishonesty, &c., &c.

2. Being humbled for and confessing the sins of the nation, implies that the Christian is grieved and truly sorry for them. Sin is a great burden to a truly pious person, whether in himself or others around. "Lot was vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked. For that righteous man, dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds." David was grieved and sorry for the sins of those around him. "Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy laws I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved, because they kept not thy word." Jeremiah was sorely distressed for the sin of God's ancient people "But if ye will not hear it, my soul shall weep in secret places for your pride, and mine eye shall weep sore, and run down with tears, because the Lord's flock is carried away captive." Thus the prophets of God are distressed from others: "Fools make a mock at sin," but the wise "sigh and cry for the abominations that be done" in the land and world where they dwell. Christ beheld the city of Jerusalem and wept over it. Let Christians see the dishonor done to God by the sins of the nation, and the wrath pending over it for these, and mourn sore like doves for all these

3. This implies, that the Christian must stand aloof from all these sins How can one be truly humbled for that which they are actively employed in carrying on? "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them" The call is distinct, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues" It is very difficult to live in a nation and not partake of its sins Joseph was corrupted by the common swearing of Egypt—Lot, by the uncleanness and drunkenness of Sodom—Noah, by the corruptions of the antediluvians. The prevalence of sin around him, affects more or less every child of God in this imperfect state. "Because iniquity abounds, the love of many shall wax cold." To live in the midst of sin and wickedness and not be corrupted thereby, is a strong evidence that grace is strong and active in the heart. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Hatred to all sin is the best thing in the world to preserve a person from falling into its commission. "How can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?"

When a person runs sin as God does, (Jeremiah xliv. 4: "this abominable thing that I hate,") then he is prepared for hating it, and not partaking with others in what is forbidden them.

4. When properly humbled for the sins of the nation, this will influence Christians to oppose these sins, and use all lawful means in their power for reforming the nation. The attention of rulers and citizens must be directed to them. They must be taught that these sins are the procuring cause of God's wrath against the land. The command in Isaiah lviii. 1: "Cry aloud, spare not! lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins," is given to the church of God. This is to be done by her watchmen; but the membership of the church must uphold their hands while they are engaged in this hard and unwelcome duty. Let the church by her pulpits and press say to the nation, in the language of Hosea iv. 1, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel, for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land. By swearing and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood. Therefore shall the land mourn, and everything that dwelleth therein shall languish, with the beast of the field, and with the fowls of heaven; yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away." Much may be done by Christians, by petitions to Congress for the repeal of all unrighteous laws, such as the infamous Fugitive Slave law. Efforts ought to be honestly, unitedly and prayerfully made by all God's people in the land, for amending the Constitution of the United States—so as God will be acknowledged, his law taken as the supreme rule, and none but "just men" allowed to fill the offices of the nation. Isaiah ix. 16, 17, appears to describe the state of things in our nation now: "For the leaders of this people cause them to err; and they that are led of them are destroyed. Therefore the Lord shall have no joy in their young men, neither shall have mercy on their fatherless and widows; for every one is a hypocrite and an evil doer, and every mouth speaketh folly. For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still."

H. P. M.

THE WAY GOD LEADS.

One of the circumstances in God's dealings with the children of Israel in the wilderness, which served to arouse their impatience was, the circuitous way by which God led them. A direct course from Egypt to Canaan, would have made their journey comparatively short and easy. But it pleased the Almighty to conduct them otherwise He led them by a way they knew not. He kept them marching up and down, hither and thither, in the wilderness; so that, as the record is, "the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way." When they became hopeful and joyful in the prospect of soon reaching their "desired haven," he would turn them back, as though to lead them to Egypt again. This aspect of their experience was indeed trying. Failing as they did, to recognize the divine hand in it, it is no wonder they became dispirited The cup of joy was no sooner placed to their lips, than it was dashed to the ground; the sun of prosperity no sooner began to shed its healing beams upon them, than the cloud of adversity overshadowed them Truly believing hearts would still have clung to Jehovah, amid all the trial. But Israel, alas, was blind, and could not comprehend the ways of the Lord: his heart became more and more hardened; and his arm was lifted up in unholy rebellion against God.

So God still leads his people, betimes, by a circuitous way. There are many shifts and turns, many retracings of former steps, many strange vicissitudes in their experiences. Bitter is mingled with the sweet, sorrow with joy, gloom with brightness, adversity with prosperity. One day God's children are on the mount, the next day in the valley. Now they are exalted, now depressed; now steadfast in the faith, now encompassed by doubts and fears; now bright in hope, now overshadowed by some dark, lowering cloud; now strong, now weak; now joyous, now sorrowful Every Christian has passed through this variable experience God leads us in this round about way, in order to lead us more fully to himself, to take off our thoughts from earthly things, and to advance us in preparation for his service on earth and for the enjoyment of himself in heaven Shall we become disheartened then? Shall we doubt our Father's wisdom and goodness in this discipline? No. Let God lead as he will, we ought not to be shaken in our confidence in him. We know in whom we believe, and we ought not to depart from our stronghold With the afflicted patriarch we ought to say, in view of the trials to which God subjects us, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him" No matter how often he turns us back in our journey, no matter how low he casts us down, no matter how long he hides his face from us, we ought not to be so discouraged as to let go our confidence in him, for if we are deserted of him, who shall sustain us? If he be against us, what though "whole troops of friends" be on our side?

Changes, vicissitudes, sorrows, trials, sickness, death,—these all, and whatever other things are kindred to them, lie in the way that conducts to heaven. They belong to our earthly lot. They are our sad inheritance. But let us not murmur on account of them. God sends them, and there is a good mission Let us receive them humbly and improve them faithfully, staying our hearts on the blessed assurance, that there is a life beyond the grave which enjoys a perfect immunity from them all. "Why art thou cast down, O, my soul," when there is such a glorious prospect for thee, as a world of infinite and imperishable happiness? God may lead us and down in the wilderness, but he will lead out of it too. He may give to his children a mingled cup to drink, whilst they sojourn on earth; but when they gain the heavenly rest, their souls shall be satisfied. Let none of our earthly experiences serve utterly to cast us down. Let us hope in God; and we will yet praise him who is the health of our countenance, and our God When we come to understand God's ways with us, as they shall be illuminated by the light of eternity, we will perceive how wisdom and goodness were interwoven in them all What we know not now, we shall know hereafter. "Now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face; now I know in part, but then I shall know even as also I am known." While we have the assurance that God is our Leader, that his hand is conducting us in all the paths of our feet, we have all that our hearts could desire. It is for us only to follow, with devout hearts and willing steps: the reward of our so doing will exceed our fondest expectations.

NEW VS. OLD

St Paul in speaking of the characteristics of a man who is "in Christ Jesus," declares that with him "old things have passed away, and all things are become new." The truth of this can hardly be appreciated until we view, in the way of contrast, the man as he is, with the man as he was. For religion is not a thing that can be hid. Just as sin covers the natural man from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot,—so does the religion of Jesus, in those that are His. It affects not merely the brain, and makes a man orthodox, nor the heart, and makes him enthusiastic, nor his conduct, and makes him circumspect—but the entire man is changed,—he becomes a new creature,—old things pass away, behold all things become new. To appreciate this idea of Paul, look at the contrast

OLD.	IN HIS RELATIONS.	NOW
Child of Satan	changed into Child of God
Slave of Sin	" Freeman in Christ
Citizen of the world	" Stranger and pilgrim
Enemy of God	" Son of the Kingdom.
	IN HIS VIEWS.
God as a tyrant	changed into God as a friend.
Bible as dull	" Bible as inspiring.
Sin as innocent	" Sin as abhorrent.
Duty as irksome	" Duty as delightful.
Christians as stupid	" Christians as interesting
Life as a period for gratification.	Life as a period for preparation
	IN HIS AFFECTIONS.
Contempt	changed into Pity
Indifference	" Compassion
Impudence	" Liberality
Enmity	" Love
	IN HIS CONDUCT.
The trifling	changed for The earnest
The wicked	" The righteous
	IN HIS PRAYER.
	changed into Praise.
The	" Victor.
One	" Piety

Any man who finds this contrast in himself, who can say, the first column tells my past,—but the second my present, has "the witness in himself" that he is born again. And we should not be satisfied without this,—for we must remember that "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth anything, but a new creature." If any man looks this change, what more fitting time to seek it than now, when we have just entered upon a new year? With the old year let all our "old things" pass away. With the new year let "all things become new."

WATCHMAN

THE FIRST THING IN WRITING.

But to return to the subject of slow composition. We have no doubt that what Johnson meant to imply was that habit of waiting for words, and attending rather to the expression than the thought, a habit which we have already characterized as leading to a stiff and unnatural style Dr. Johnson, presuming, no doubt, that a writer could hardly sit down till he had something to say, would impress that our ideas should be written down in the order in which they present themselves, and also that the readiest words are the best—the best, that is, not absolutely; but the best that the particular writer could command, subject, of course, to any obvious corrections.

ROBERT HALL.

Robert Hall had, like Johnson, a singular facility for continuous mental composition. He had only to think closely on a subject, and the topics became associated with appropriate terms and phrases. Writing was a pain and fatigue to him; he had, therefore, disciplined his mind to compose without the help of his pen. He could follow out a connected chain of ideas at pleasure, and accompany them with a series of elaborately finished sentences. Whoever adopts this system of mental composition, will, of course, find the practice of writing an admirable preparation for the art of speaking also; for, it is a habit which enables us to fix the memory upon some substantial mental product, instead of the eye being listlessly employed with only a few words at a time.

One of the greatest masters of composition, we have ever had the pleasure of knowing, evolved his mighty powers during a season of temporary blindness. From the experience of this gentleman there is little doubt but the pen is used too much by authors, and mental composition too little, to do full justice to their abilities. We should accustom ourselves to sketch our subject less on material tablets and far more on the tablets of the mind. In this quarter lies an intellectual mine, which yet remains to be worked—a powerful, though a dormant faculty—which, we have good reason for saying, admits of a degree of growth and development almost incredible to those who have not seen mental composition, like mental arithmetic, fairly tried by a gradual course of systematic exercise.

An American gentleman lately astonished all the first chess-players in Europe by playing blindfold, and actually winning eight games of them at the same time, though opposed by the best players of the day! What a wonderful power of mental composition or combination was there displayed! An eye witness related to us how this wonderful man sat composedly in his chair behind a screen, with his head resting on his hand, dictating, in most cases without an appreciable time for thought, his move as fast as the empire called out the move of his adversary, (my) "At table No. 1, Queen's pawn moves two squares." His memory as well as his patience was frequently tried by his adversary taking the usual time to decide on each move; whereas this master of the game only took time to consider in one single instance, and then he reflected for about two minutes, during which time his whole mind must have been abstracted from every other game, yet without losing the power of recalling the exact positions of each set of pieces when that interval of abstraction was over!

We will suppose, however, that this instance of mental combination was wholly exceptional, though the power of playing a single game of chess, without seeing the board, has been evidenced by many persons—still, the following fact, which up to this time has never been published, will show how far the powers of an average mind may be developed in a similar respect;

A gentleman of our acquaintance, for many years engaged in education, presented a few years since some twenty pupils as candidates for confirmation. Being struck with their acuteness and general intelligence, we inquired as to the principles of their education, and heard that the master laid great stress on mental arithmetic.

Now, what is commonly called mental arithmetic, consists very little in any mental exercise, but chiefly in some easy rules tending to shorten the usual process, and to avoid the difficulty of any sustained mental effort. But we soon learnt that our friend's mental arithmetic was a severe exercise indeed; for, his method of sharpening the faculties consisted in making his pupils use the tablets of their minds as they used their slates, and to work by memory came in the usual way. To say that such a row of ten figures as these—"54 868886547," was multiplied or divided by one figure, and the product or quotient read off correctly, may seem incredible: yet, positively, there were few pupils in the school of long standing who were not quite equal to the task. Even fourteen or fifteen figures,—for instance, imagine and commit to memory such a row as 8058695218768697,—even this could be multiplied or divided by some of the clever pupils, while a row of from twenty to twenty-five figures had been grasped in the mind and correctly multiplied or divided, and the product or quotient enunciated by the most promising boys in the school. Nay more, one pupil, now the Rev. ——, second on the list of Wranglers of his year, we are credibly informed, had operated correctly on a row of no less than thirty-five figures, without either pen or pencil! And all this self-command resulted from a little daily practice continued during the years of education, first of two or three easy figures, then of the same number of figures more difficult, till a fourth figure, or a fifth or a sixth, was successively added to the exercise.

Are we not, then, justified in saying that the power of mental composition admits of wonderful expansion? And, how valuable is this habit! How often do men lose themselves in their very inability to grasp all the terms and conditions, all the premises and data of a lengthened argument! And yet, for the orator, as we shall in due course explain, the same twofold operation of holding fast the data and working out the natural conclusion is really indispensable.

ROBERT HALL AS A WRITER.

But, to return to the case of Robert Hall—a writer who, in point of force and fluency combined with a copious yet chastened style of speech, has, perhaps, never been surpassed—notwithstanding his strong natural powers of composition, Robert Hall, when preparing for the press, composed with extreme slowness: simply because his standard of excellence was too high to be realized, and he could never satisfy himself. His perception of beauty was delicate and refined, and his taste was fastidious to excess. The consequence was, that when he sat down to compose he went on re-writing, improving, and rejecting one improvement after another; and often ending with the form of expression which had originally occurred. This habit of composition is not to be imitated. Hall used often to lament this slow and laborious habit he had formed; he used to say it gave an air of stiffness and formality to his style, so that he had very little satisfaction in anything he wrote. Dr. Gregory said, "Notwithstanding the exquisite harmony and beauty which characterised every thing that Robert Hall has published, they were, even in point of felicity of diction and the majestic current and force of language, inferior to the winged words that escaped from his lips, when 'his soul was enlarged' in the discharge of ministerial duty"

COTTON GROWING AT THE SOUTH.

The difficulties to be encountered in our attempts to grow cotton in the North may be better understood by coming to a knowledge of the manner that staple is grown in the Southern States; and in proportion as we understand the subject completely beforehand, will our efforts be wisely directed

Cotton is the only crop which consumes the labor of those engaged in its cultivation the whole year round. In the more southern regions where it is grown, the preparation of the ground begins in January. The planting is done in February and March. This process is not finished until the first planted seed is up and the plant requires "weeding." The farther the season advances, the harder the hands are driven to keep the weeds down. "Scraping" the ridges and "hoeing" continue until August, when the "picking" season commences. "Ginning" so

We take this opportunity of saying that the New York Independent, one of our exchanges, in [illegible] Frederick Douglass, recently, in Philadelphia, and while giving a very neat and appropriate notice of the Recorder, and of the fact of its publishing the speech entire, commits (unintentional [illegible] ship of the paper to Bishop Payne While we cannot but feel highly gratified by the graceful compliment thus unwittingly paid us by our worthy contemporary [illegible] efforts to please for the emanations of that most classical scholar and fervent divine, the Right Rev. Bishop Payne, we, at the same time, feel that we [illegible] tion and doing our duty in respectfully referring our friend of the Independent to the heading of this paper for the desired correction.

NOTICE.

Brothers Davis' and Lynch's, and several other communications, came to hand too late for this number, but shall promptly appear in next week's issue

BISHOP QUINN.

We have received a letter from our Senior Bishop, Quinn, giving the arrangement and the time of the meeting of his Conference, together with an account of his visits, all of which, no doubt, will be interesting to the Church and all of his friends.

BISHOP NAZREY.

Last Sabbath we had the pleasure of hearing Bishop Nazrey preach upon this text, found in Zechariah, fourth chapter and seventh verse:—"Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel, thou shalt become a plain, and he shall bring forth the head-stone thereof with shouting, crying Grace, grace unto it."

The Bishop showed clearly that the mountain is an obstacle in the way of Christians, and we must confess that we never heard the Bishop speak with so much logic as he did on that occasion. It was one of the Bishop's strong efforts, and it will have a lasting impression upon the minds of the people.

At three o'clock, P. M, we heard Rev. A. L. Stanford preach from the 9th Psalm, tenth verse—"And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee, for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee."

Brother Stanford's language was at once both chaste and elegant. He reasoned out the subject in his usual masterly style.

OUR PAPER.

We still extend an invitation to our friends in general to come forward and subscribe for the Recorder, for we do not hesitate to affirm that it is a family paper, adapted to the wants of our people. Therefore, let all of our brethren set about the work at once. Bishop Nazrey and Quinn are doing what they can for the support of the paper.

We have on hand copies of the Recorder containing Frederick Douglass' great war speech, and will forward a copy to any one sending us 6 postage stamps.

EXHIBITION OF ART.

Our friend Thomas, of Washington, has written a very excellent article upon the importance of the people of color in this country to get up an Exhibition of Art, which, we think, will be of interest to all lovers of art, literature and science. We are greatly in favor of just such a movement of our people, annually exhibiting to the world a fair. It would reflect no little credit upon us, and if we did not get what we richly merit from those in this country who claim to be our lords, after such productions are exhibited from those of our people who we know are fully able to give, we shall be satisfied that we have come together and exhibited our skill and genius in the arts and sciences—while we fully believe that all other countries, England, France, Germany, &c., will give us full credit for all our humble endeavors merit.

We have already seen displayed by our people some specimens of art and genius which we don't believe can be surpassed by those claiming to be our superiors in this country. As they have met with no encouragement, their light is kept under a bushel; hence nothing to stimulate them has been offered—but if we all should consummate an arrangement something after the order that friend Thomas speaks of, there will be something to emulate them

PORT AU PRINCE, HAYTI.

Dec 21, 1862

We have received a letter directed to the Rev. A. L. Stanford, from one of our subscribers in Port au Prince. He states that he has been unable to see much of the country up to the time of writing He also states that he has been [illegible] with the Rev. Mr. Allen, one of our ministers, and that the Ministers' Quarterly Meeting came off on the 22d inst.

It seems that our beloved Zion is set up there, and the work of the Lord is working to some account. Brother Blake does not speak discouragingly, but expresses the hope of seeing a great work out there.

POETRY.

The piece of poetry which will be found in a subsequent column, was written by the Rev. W. Biddle, of Baltimore, Md., who is now on the Trenton circuit of the Zion Church. His family is still in Baltimore.

EXHIBITION.

OLD FOLKS' CONCERT

There will be an Old Folks' Concert given on the 20th instant, in [illegible] Hall by our friend, Mr. A. Bunris—half of the proceeds to be presented to E Weaver, for the benefit of the Christian Recorder. We were most agreeably surprised at the announcement

IS CONSCIENCE A CORRECT GUIDE IN OUR CONDUCT?

Some time ago this question was discussed in the Literary Society of Bethel Church, and there were different opinions about it. Some took the ground that conscience was a correct guide to the moral conduct, and others took the ground that conscience was not a correct guide, &c. We inquire, what is conscience? Conscience is the secret testimony of the soul, whereby intelligent beings are enabled to judge right from wrong. It is impossible, however, to draw the lines of distinction between the moral judgment and the moral sentiment. They are inseparably connected. We feel and we judge at one and the same time or moment. In regard to the moral action, it is enough to know that our moral judgment is like our intellectual intuition, immediate and certain; so that we cannot deny them without denying the very existence of our moral constitution, &c. Considerable controversy has been with men of distinction upon the correctness of conscience being a sufficient guide to the moral conduct of men through life. There is something certain, that conscience is a part which constitutes man a responsible being to his Creator, according to our way of thinking.

Man has a law which follows him, that he is bound or ought to obey the dictates, and when he violates them there is a voice which proclaims his criminality and liability of punishment. We believe that idiots and insane people are not in possession of a conscience of reason; for the insane man has been deprived of his conscience of reason by means which cannot be accurately defined. But all intelligent men and women in possession of reasoning faculties, we claim for conscience, a sufficient guide to them; and if we are asked by what authority from God that we claim so much for reason, our answer is this:—The great apostle of the Gentiles affirmatively asserts, "That he had always a conscience void of offence, towards God and towards men." (Mark always,) hence the sufficiency of conscience.

Again, when a man overleaps the reason of conscience, that inward monitor maliciously and violently attacks a stranger or his neighbor, the person whom he attacks may be provoked and excited to such a pitch all of a sudden, that conscience may not be discovered by the man attacked, and hence he may be provoked to take the life of his assailant, believing at the same time that it was life-defence. This, of course, comes under a different rule. But we believe that, if men were guided more, pay more attention to that inward monitor of conscience, we would have a much better world than we now have There would not be so many precious lives hurled into eternity before having time to think; there would not be so many houses broken open and plundered; there would not be so much discord among brethren and the people at large; there would not be so much oppression, nor advantage taken of the poor.

EPISCOPAL VISITS

I will preach at Woodbury, N. J., on the 28th of February, and will be at Bridgeton, on the 1st of March; and the elder in charge will make arrangement up to the 7th, at which time I will leave for Salem. The elder, in charge of that circuit, may make appointments up to the 14th; and on the 15th, I shall be on the Norristown Circuit. The elder will give information at which point to commence; and on the 21st I will go to the Burlington Circuit. The elder can give me his arrangements Notice of the other visits will be given in time.

PLYMOUTH CHURCH, MASS

MR. EDITOR:—During your visit to Boston, you and Bro. Mitchell talked with me on the subject of my taking the oversight of the people at Plymouth, giving, as I thought, good reasons why I should After maturing the matter over, I concluded that I would do so, and received a paper from Bro. Mitchell to that effect. According to my promise I went to Plymouth, and found things in a different state from what I expected. I found but few colored people, and they were divided and disputing one with the other, and there was no organization of any kind that I could find. In this state I spent the Sabbath with them. Then I went a second time and spent another Sabbath, and found them still divided, and the key of the chapel given up. Neither party could give any information in regard to the organization of the Sabbath-school or the church. Indeed, the brother who was said to be the superintendent of the Sabbath-school which was pointed out to me, declared that there had never been an organization of either Sabbath-school or church, neither party being able to sustain the church. I, therefore, left them as I found them. Some time afterward there appeared a communication in the Recorder, from New Bedford, stating that a new church had been organized in Plymouth, Mass. Now, sir, I felt it my duty, with all due respect to the brethren who have been preaching in Plymouth, to make an explanation, lest it might be thought hereafter that that church became extinct through negligence on my part. Therefore, as the statement of the existence of a church in Plymouth was made a public matter, I thought it my duty to make some explanation, that I might stand right in this particular.

If ever there was an organization in Plymouth, one or other of the parties there must have destroyed it. I wish, however, to be understood in this, for I would not by any means, without a just and lawful cause, cast a reflection to the hurt of any brother, for I think it below the dignity of a Christian and a gentleman. It is too often done to the injury of the Church and the progress of the gospel of Christ. Every brother ought to raise himself by his own merits, and not by the destruction of his fellow. We ought to be all one in Christ, and indeed we are all one in Christ, if we be right.

With regard to the present condition of the church in Boston, as member of the Quarterly Conference and agent of the trustees to strive to get money to save the church, I here take the liberty of saying that the financial affairs are deplorable indeed at this time. But we will not reflect on the present minister or his predecessors, for they have all done what they could, under God, by the aid of the friends. Some of them are still willing to do what they can, while others seem to be discouraged and ready to give up altogether. This I say in good faith to many of the members; but I trust that, with God's help, we may be able at the end of the next three months to speak more favorably of this matter. You shall hear from me again soon, the Lord willing.

Yours in the bonds of the gospel of Christ,
JOSEPH P. TURNER.

Drawn from her very inmost soul?
Why slavery.

O, what has rent the nuptial tie,
That God has sealed in heaven on high,
And caused fond ones to weep and cry?
Slavery.

Ah, what has fixed my present fate,
And left me in this forlorn state?
The answer is, without debate,
Why slavery

Thou God, that rules the sea and land,
Stretch forth, stretch forth thy mighty hand,
And break this cruel iron band
Of slavery!

TERRE HAUTE. 1862

MR EDITOR:—I thought it might be somewhat entertaining to you and your readers to hear a word from Terre Haute. The spiritual condition of our church and people here I do think, is improving. Encouragingly of this fact, you will no doubt be satisfied, when you are informed of the fact, that the young ladies and gents here are beginning to take a considerable interest in the temporal and spiritual welfare of the church, as also of the cultivation of their minds. Mrs. Strother and myself have had through the past part of the winter, some sixty to seventy pupils in our day and night schools, and she has still a very large day school on hand, the number of which is still increasing. We have also a very good Sunday school, numbering seventy-five, more or less, in which I have an interesting Bible class of young men, numbering from eight to ten, who are in pretty regular attendance. I would not omit mentioning another circumstance of importance, and that is that a company of tasteful young ladies of my congregation have taken it upon themselves to repaint our church, a job much needed. They have already succeeded in furnishing and hanging a beautiful set of oil window curtains, or shades all around the whole extent of the building; and besides this, the same thoughtful set of young ladies have raised money for the purpose of having the pulpit painted and set off, which piece of work they have also accomplished; and the pulpit now, and all of its appurtenances, are beautifully painted and grained. So, could you now see the A. M. E. Church of Terre Haute, you likely would hardly believe with your own eyes that you had ever seen the edifice before.

And while speaking of progress, by-the-by, permit me to inform you of the wonderful marriage revival, which has recently occurred among us. I have had to marry three couples quite recently, of which I will give you the particulars in another place. The subject of mental culture is being really aroused here. Mrs. Strother has in her school room forty-eight pupils, and a number of these are young ladies and young men. We have also succeeded in waking up an interest among the reading classes of this community, and they are beginning to call for the CHRISTIAN RECORDER: three have already sent on to you by me, their subscriptions, and some three or four more are now getting up their money to send on

The spiritual condition of this charge is tolerably fair. We have had no real revival, but we have had several secessions to the church in the last few months, and those already on the way, seem to be trying to hold on their way, and to live so as not to lose anything, though they may gain slowly, and but little.

THE UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD.

All the sons and daughters of Adam, without distinction of nation, sect, or color, are the children of one heavenly Parent—heirs of one common inheritance, notwithstanding the many outward distinctions of rank and position found among them. All are objects of divine regard and mercy, however much they may be wronged and oppressed by their fellows; and it seems the part of wisdom with those who may deem themselves the down-trodden and despised of the earth, to seek, through divine aid, to raise themselves into a position where their own pleadings may be heard and regarded, even by those, who, through pride and prejudice, have been wont to look down and frown upon them. Let us, therefore, hail the appearance of the Recorder, as a medium through which the advocacy of righteousness and mercy may be carried on, as well as the encouragement of every virtue, whereby the people of color may be raised to a higher and nobler position, than the one they now seem generally to occupy; even that of an industrious, enlightened, frugal, and God-serving people.

When we consider that all nations are of one blood, that in this world we are but sojourners, that we are subject to the like afflictions, and infirmities of body, the like disorders and frailties of mind, the like temptations, the same death, the same judgment, and that the All-Wise Being is Judge and Lord over us all; it seems to raise an idea of general brotherhood, and a disposition easy to be touched with a feeling of others' afflictions. But it appears by Holy Record, that men under high favors have been apt to err in their opinions concerning others. Thus Israel, according to the description of the Prophet Isaiah, lxv. 5, when exceedingly corrupted and degenerated, yet remembered they were the chosen people of God, &c., says: "Stand by thyself, come not near me, for I am holier than thou!"

To consider mankind otherwise than brethren, to think favors are peculiar to one nation, and to exclude others, plainly supposes a darkness in the understanding; for as God's love is universal, so where the mind is sufficiently influenced by it, it begets a likeness of itself, and the heart is enlarged towards all men. But when self-love presides in our minds, our opinions are biased in our own favor; and in this condition, there is danger of using ourselves to an undisturbed partiality, until by long custom, the mind becomes enamored with it, and the judgment steeled against [illegible] Wherefore, it is very needful to apply humbly to God for wisdom that we may thereby be [illegible] things as they are, and as they ought to be. Hereby, the hidden things of darkness may be brought to light, and the judgment made clear; we shall then consider mankind as brethren [illegible] treated as become the sons of one Father, agreeably to the doctrine of Jesus Christ, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do you even so them"

[illegible]

Man is born to labor, and experience abundantly showeth, that it is for our good. A supply of nature's lawful wants, joined with a peaceful, humble mind, is the truest happiness in this life; and if we arrive at this, and continue to walk in the path of the just, our life will be truly happy. Though we may have our children little else but wise instruction, a good example, and the knowledge of an honest employment; these, with the blessing of Providence, are sufficient for their happiness, and are more likely to prove so, than laying up treasure for them, which are often rather a snare than a benefit; for, where children are educated in fulness, ease, and idleness, evil habits are more prevalent than in common amongst those who are prudently employed in the necessary affairs of life.

Evidences of divine wisdom, appear in those things which we read of, the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, of whom it is written, that they were either chosen from among the poor, and those in the lower stations of life, such as illiterate herdsmen or fishermen, or that those who were intended for high stations, have first been reduced very low that truth might be [illegible] their hearts, and that the characters there imprinted by bitterness and adversity, might, in after years, remain, suggesting compassionate ideas, and quicken their regard to those in the like condition, as in the following instances:

Abraham was called of God to leave his country and kindred, to sojourn among strangers. Through famine, and danger of death, he was forced to flee from one kingdom to another; yet, at length, he not only had the assurance of being the father of many nations, but became a mighty prince. Genesis xxiii 6. Remarkable were the dealings of God with Jacob in a low estate, and the just sense he retained of them after his advancement, appears in these words:—"I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies." The numerous afflictions of Joseph are very singular; the particular providence of God therein no less manifest; he at length became Governor of Egypt, and famous for wisdom and virtue. The series of troubles which David passed through, are also very remarkable, and yet he afterwards became as one of the great men of the earth

Let none, therefore, be discouraged, because of their sufferings, depressions, or difficulties; for He whose ear is still open to the cries of the poor and afflicted, and his hand stretched forth for the help of the weak, will in due time, plead the cause of all the oppressed, as their hearts are raised unto Him in fervor and humble supplication, for the extension of his mercy and aid, to raise them, as it were, out of the dust, and bring them to the enjoyment of moral and Christian elevation, whereas they may be made instrumental in promoting the general good, by the encouragement of industry, sobriety, and order, love, harmony, and peace. How deeply soever men are involved in difficulties, sincerity of heart, and upright walking before God, freely submitting to his Providence, is the most sure remedy. He only is able to relieve, not only persons, but nations in their greatest calamities. To act continually with integrity of heart, above all narrow or selfish motives, is a sure token of our being partakers of that salvation which God hath appointed for walls and bulwarks, and is beyond all contradiction, a more happy situation than can ever be promised by the utmost reach of art and power united, not proceeding from heavenly wisdom.

RELIGION THE SAME TO THE UNLEARNED AS THE LEARNED.

Religion here, and salvation hereafter, are as much the concern and duty of the illiterate and ignorant, as of the wise and learned. And as these are by much the greater number, religious duty must, undoubtedly, consist in something equally attainable and practicable by all. It cannot lie essentially in literary knowledge, nor any peculiar mode of education; for these are the lot of few, in comparison of the whole of mankind. Happiness being the end of man's creation, and the universal indispensable concern of every man, the effectual means of regeneration and salvation, must be attainable by every man. Nothing but the omnipresent, and all-effective Spirit of God, can be this means; for nothing else is universal, nor any way adequate to the work. The Spirit of God, therefore, being necessary to every man, is afforded to every man, by Him who withholds nothing necessary.

The truly sound reformed Christian knows and acknowledges every part of his reformation is owing to Divine help, and whoever propagates the contrary anti Scriptural doctrine, demonstrates their ignorance of true regeneration, and that their wisdom is but the superficial wisdom of words, which can only enable them to make a show of knowledge by talking about the things of God, without any right understanding of them. The pomp of science, and the flourish of eloquence have no more alliance to truth than the pride of life. They belong to the wisdom of this world, by which God is not to be known. "For the world by wisdom knew not God, nor the things of God." These are out of the reach of arts, languages, and sciences, and are discovered only by the manifestation of the Spirit of Christ in the heart, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Yet, though the world, by all its admired and celebrated wisdom, knows not God, there is a wisdom communicated by which he is known. "For God," saith Holy Writ, "who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face, or inward appearance of Jesus Christ." The Apostle adds:—"We have this treasure in earthen vessels;" we enjoy it now while in these bodies of clay, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

All the souls that God has made, are equally his; and he, whose mercies are over all his works, overlooks none of his creatures in the distribution of his mercies. He withholds his talents from none, but dispenseth in different portions to different persons; that social communication and connexion may be preserved among us in this life To one he gives five talents; to a second, two; to a third, one; but to every one a degree of Divine manifestation sufficient, if believed in and obeyed, [illegible] He justly requires [illegible] proportionably answerable to the measure he affords, and as he perfectly [illegible] we to what degree of [illegible] he will finally judge all according to their increase, their negligence, or their rejection of the talents received. Let not him, therefore, who may have received the least measure of his gifts, be like the unprofitable servant, who hid his one talent in the earth, refusing to use and improve it, because of the [illegible] and the complaint that more would be required of him, than ability had been afforded to perform, but rather remember that "the Lord requireth of a man according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not."

CHRISTIANITY AN INWARD LIFE GIVING PRINCIPLE.

Exterior forms are but temporary matters. They are no essentials of true Christianity. The great author of it represents it as "a well of water in man, springing up into everlasting life" It radically ariseth from a living, abiding, increasing principle in man, of a pure, spiritual, and heavenly nature. As this is cordially embraced, it enlarges the soul, expels the works and power of darkness, and produceth its own genuine fruits of humility, self-denial, patience, resignation to God, and trust in him alone; righteousness, [illegible] meekness, gentleness, temperance, [illegible] ness, brotherly-kindness, charity. It derives its origin from heaven, and leads to heaven. It [illegible] and [illegible] seats, up to the Supreme good himself It breaks down all our own self-will, and brings into perfect resignation, to the Divine will. In this humble, contrite frame, and no other, can we sincerely and truly say, thy kingdom come, thy will be done! For whilst our wills stand in separation to the will of God we cannot address him in these terms with propriety or [illegible] truth.

Evident tokens of internal religion, and the immediate manifestation of the Spirit for that end, appear throughout both the Old Testament, and the New; and the vitality and glory of Christianity lies in the clear administration of the Holy Spirit, without any veil of legal or ritual adumbrations. School-learning is but a human accomplishment; and though very useful as a servant, is no part of Christianity. Neither the acquirements of the college, nor the formalities of human authority, can furnish that humility which fitteth for God's teaching. Possessed of arts and languages, weak people are puffed up with a conceit of superiority, which leads from self-denial and the daily cross, into pride and self-sufficiency; and instead of waiting for, and depending upon the wisdom and power of God, into a confidence in the wisdom of this world, and a devotional satisfaction in the rote of external forms and ordinances. Whereas, those that worship God in the Spirit, rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh And why? because it is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing Without the Spirit, no man can be a minister of the Spirit; but he that hath the Spirit, hath life, and that which giveth life, while the mere letter is but dead, and tendeth to death.

Seeing, therefore, that all the human family are one common brotherhood, enlightened and called by the one Spirit, to see the one true, and living way in which we should walk, and each one to enter and proceed therein according to the measure of our light, and the extent of our calling; let none refuse to obey because of the want of outward knowledge, or the inferiority of outward position; for the Lord will surely help those who have no might of their own, and increase strength to the diligent and obedient servant, however poor, and weak, naked, and miserable he may esteem himself to be. His tender regard and compassion extends to all his works, and there is no respect of persons with him, but all who fear Him, and work righteousness, are accepted of him, however ignorant as to outward knowledge, or poor, as to outward substance, these may be. To as many as receive Christ in their hearts, to them giveth he power to become the sons of God; to as many as open at the knocking of his Spirit, doth he come in, and take up his abode with them, supping with them, and they with him; and this joyful communion of spirit is a crown which no man taketh from them; but which all the righteous enjoy with them, for they are united in the one body, members of the one universal Church of God, of which Christ is the ever living and adorable head, in whom all outward distinctions are obliterated; where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision, nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all, and in all.

EXHIBITION OF ART.

Washington, Jan. 2d, 1862.

MR. EDITOR:—It has been my earnest desire for years past to see in one of our large central cities an exhibition devoted to works of art, artistic, mechanical and industrial, either the production or the property of our race—an exhibition whose aims shall be to encourage those noble propensities where apparent in our people, and which would undoubtedly not only rescue from perpetual obscurity many gems of art, but would inspire a noble rivalry among those who have themselves made great advances in those noble paths It has always been very striking to me that this exhibition would be eminently successful Why? Because there are artists now among us who would strive to be well represented at this exhibition by productions of their greatest skill, who would feel as if their whole future fame depended upon their success in excelling the works of others The ingenious mechanic with his useful improvements, his well-contrived machines, his works of skill, would be ambitious to secure himself eminence in his craft, and the possessors of gems of art or wonderful pieces of mechanical and ingenious construction would be most anxious to display their property and to attain merited applause for their industrious endeavors in making their valuable collection. Let all contribute to this exhibition. Let the nimble fingers of the ladies do their best; for should this exhibition take place (as I hope it may,) the ladies who will, doubtlessly, be well represented, shall receive commendations in proportion to their noble endeavors.

What can I say to back this idea? Were I only to say that it will encourage art in all its shapes among our race, I had said enough; but see the other advantages consequent upon it You doubtless remember that "Michael Angelo" owed his eminence as an artist to the friendly encouragement of "De Medicis." His talent might, perhaps, have lain dormant, but encouraged and stimulated by the praises bestowed on the statue of a Satyr which he had formed from snow, he arose to the brilliant fame which now covers his memory May we not by this exhibition, by this disposition on our part to encourage art bring into repute talent of the highest order But understand for want of encouragement and patronage?

May we not by this tendency on our part to encourage all in their actions? May we not embolden modest talent to display its anonymous works in the exhibition, whereas in its retiring modesty, want of influence, fear of reproach and chill penury, its works would never have come to light? All remember the melancholy fate of poor, unfriended "Corregio"—he whose pictures rank highest in Europe—he whose brilliant and unassisted talent has adorned Europe's finest galleries, dying from fatigue from bearing home the bag of paltry copper coin, which miserly compensation was awarded to him for one of his greatest pictures and masterpieces. We look back with disgust to the memory of his sordid patrons. May not the same odium attach to our memory in later years?

Let us now say that besides encouraging modest and unassisted talent, we can thus bring into high standing talent that is already highly developed, talent that has already valiantly fought its own way up to reputation despite the obstacles that encompassed it, and the labors and privations that surrounded it.

It is our imperative duty thus to act. Let no sordid considerations withhold us from stretching out welcome hands to receive struggling genius, to comfort those faltering from want of patronage, and to enable them to gain the high goal for which they were aiming What gratification would be our share if, in carrying out this idea, we could cause to spring up among us some "Raphael," of inimitable talent; some "Titian," who would cause the canvass again to glow with her untainted flesh tints; some "Ira Bartholomew," whose coloring equalled the richness of his own Italian sky; some "Da Vinci," who would again display the wonderful form of man in all its glory, who would portray the passions of man with undeviating truth; some "Murillo," who would refresh the eye with his familiar and pleasing domestic scenes. How well repaid would we be if we were to awaken into activity some "Fulton," to astonish the world and himself with his own inventions; some "Newton," to expound to man nature's admirable laws, or those who thus encouraged and stimulated would emulate the footsteps of those great men who have enriched the world with their works.

Here I would also state that this being an exhibition of our own race, we should not be apt to feel backward in asserting our talent by our work. So much for works of art, mechanism, &c.

A few remarks may be made as to the exhibition of property comprising works and gems of art among our own people Many a masterpiece for want of appreciation is left unheeded, to decay amongst rubbish and ruins. By having this exhibition we may bring to light some picture of precious value; we all have likely heard of the Spanish beggar whose property was about to be sold for rent. Among the property two gentlemen recognised, in a small and old picture dimmed by smoke, one of Murillo's paintings. The picture was sold for a sum sufficient to cover the beggar's debts and render him comfortable for the rest of his days May we not have the fortunate chance to happen in our days? May we not thus rescue some masterpiece from ruin, that now adorns the walls of the poor man's dilapidated house? May not even possessors of fine pictures find out to their own good fortune that a picture which is now unheeded among their collections may turn out to be some masterpiece of European or American art? But we must confine ourselves to a limited space in enumerating these advantages. But some may urge the unwillingness of possessors of works of art to intrust them to a public exhibition. Some may urge that sufficient artists and mechanics do not exist in our race to justify such an idea, or even that few of us have works of art, for any rank, or worthy of exhibition.

We know that some obstacles will surround such an attempt as this exhibition; but the difficulties before enumerated are too futile to need repetition. The very fact that they are urged by persons, demonstrates that such persons have never had an opportunity to judge of these facts. There has never been an occasion where the genius, talent and acquirements of our race could be fully or fairly exhibited. The authors of works of art or mechanism, after having completed their labors, remain still totally unknown, together with their works, excepting to the circle of private friends, and so it is and always will be that the talent which is now in our people, buried in obscurity and the humbler walks of private life, will remain totally unknown, unless some means of giving their talents publicity be contrived.

We would also state that talent of any rank soever, gradually becomes wearied, gradually wears itself away for want of the stimulus of public praise. We have but few obstacles to surmount, and a great amount of inestimable talent to rescue from the obscurity of private life We have, in fact, nothing difficult to surmount, but our own inactivity, and have a fair chance of dislodging from the names of our people the accusations of want of genius, by presenting to the world the stern facts themselves Let us arouse ourselves from this lethargy! Let us stand forward boldly and intrepidly and demonstrate to a biassed world that the fact that no works of art, but few and far between, have been visible to its eyes is owing to our want of encouragement, and our lack of opportunity to give them publicity. Let us, now that an opportunity presents itself to destroy these selfish opinions, make good use of it. Let no considerations withhold us from the attempt, and let us redeem ourselves in the eyes of those bigots who impute inferiority to us of talent, and who, having had rare opportunities of education, have become as John Randolph, of Roanoke, said, "Like some land in Virginia, which produced the more weeds and stubble the more it was cultivated."

We hope that our people will seize hold of this plan with their whole souls and carry it out Let us now endeavor to raise deserving and hidden talent to the rank it deserves. Let us endeavor to award to all those who, by their genius deserve it, a merited share of applause and commendation, and so clearly prove that the genius of our people, if properly cultivated, can compete with that of any race or nation. You have but to attempt, and success is inevitable. You have but to throw yourself confidently on your resources to appeal to the people, who will readily respond to the call, and so the whole affair triumphs Art is stimulated, talent rewarded, genius cultivated, and our people made fully aware of their own resources These are the fruits of such an exhibition The objects of this exhibition would be fully attained One more advantage would be this: we will awaken in our people a greater love for an appreciation of the sciences and arts; the more such a tendency is shown on the part of our people, the more science, in all its handsome developments, will be nourished by them, the greater will be their assistants in gaining for themselves the inestimable boon of educational improvement and mental culture; for in proportion to their love of art, will increase their love of belles-lettres; in proportion to their love of belles-lettres will increase their refinement, until finally they will become reputed for their acquirements

This is the hope I have nourished for years, the realisation of which would give me infinite pleasure, and I can see no other mode of diffusing such feeling but by having such an exhibition as I propose. I remarked the objection might be urged of our lack of artists. Who has not heard of the unsurpassed Chaplin, of Huntingdon, Pennsylvania? The unrivalled Simpson, of Boston? The rising fame of a Dorsey, of Philadelphia? The celebrated Bowser, of Philadelphia? or of the astonishing naturalist, B. G Brown, of Washington, D C.? and others amongst us that might be mentioned of artistic abilities, not forgetting the many ladies whose productions would challenge competition?

The Sanitary Fair have done much to encourage the annual exhibitions to awaken talent and encourage [illegible]. We have never had anything of that kind. Let us arouse ourselves, and our endeavors will be highly rewarded with success. Let us [illegible] carry out this plan. I hope, Mr. Editor, and Correspondents, Editors and others may be induced to urge the matter before the people, devise a plan for the exhibition, and thus encourage art in our people, and stimulate their inventive genius. The benefits derived will more than repay your labors in this undertaking

Yours truly,
EDWARD M. BROWN.

AT PORT ROYAL. 1861.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

The fort lights glimmer on the land,
The ship-lights on the sea;
The night wind smooths with drifting sand
Our track on lone Tybee.

At last our grating keels outslide,
Our good boats forward swing,
And while we ride the land locked tide,
Our negroes row and sing.

For dear the boatman holds his gifts
Of music and of song:
The gold that kindly Nature sifts
Amoog his sands of wrong

The power to make his toiling days
And poor home-comforts please;
The quaint relief of mirth that plays
With sorrow's minor keys.

Another glow than sunset's fire
Has filled the West with light,
Where field and garner, barn and byre,
Are blazing through the night.

The land is wild with fear and hate,
The rout runs mad and fast;
From land to land, from gate to gate,
The flaming brand is passed.

The lurid glow falls strong across
Dark faces proud with smiles
Not theirs the terror, hate and loss,
That fire you blazing piles.

With sar-stricken timing to their song,
They weave in simple lays
The pathos of remembered wrong,
The hope of better days—

The triumph-note that Miriam sung;
The joy of uncaged birds;
Softening with Afric's mellow tongue
Their broken Saxon words.

SONG OF THE SHORE BOATMAN.

Oh, praise an' taoks! De Lord be some,
To set de people free!
An' Moses stick in day ob doom,
Ah, we ob jubilee.
De Lord dat heap de Red Sea waves
He jus' as 'trong as dey;
He say de word: we las' night slaves,
To-day de Lord's freemen.
De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice an' corn,
Oh, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn.

Ole massa on de trabbles gone;
He tink de land behind:
De Lord's breff blow him furder on,
Like corn-shuck in de wind.
We own de hoe, we own de plow;
We own de hands dat hold;
We sell de pig, we sell de sow,
But nebber obbe be sold.
De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice an' corn:
Oh, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn.

We pray de Lord: he gib us signs
Dat some day we be free;
De Norf-wind tells it to de pines,
De wild-duck to de sea.
We tink it when de church-bells ring,
We dream it in de dream.
De rice-bird mean it when he sing,
De eagle when he scream
De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice and corn.
Oh, nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn.

We know the promise nebber fail,
An' nebber lie de word:
So, like de 'postles in de jail,
We waited for de Lord:
An now he open ebery door,
An' trow away de key,
He tink we tuk him some before,
We hab him better free.
De yam will grow, de cotton blow,
We'll hab de rice an' corn:
So nebber you fear, if nebber you hear
De driver blow his horn.

So sing our dusky gondoliers;
And with a secret pain,
And smiles that seem akin to tears,
We hear the wild refrain.

We dare not share the negro's trust,
Nor yet his hope so deep:
We only know that God is just,
And every wrong shall die.

Ends seems the song; each swarthy face,
Flame-lighted, ruder still;
We start to think that hapless race
Must share our good or ill;

That law of changeless justice bind
Oppressor with oppressed;
And, close as sin and suffering joined,
We march to Fate abreast.

Sing on, poor hearts! your chant shall be
Our sign of blight or bloom
The gale song of Liberty,
Or death rune of our doom!

Atlantic Monthly for February.

EASY TO PLEASE. LETTERS FROM ALL THE LETTERS, WITH A CODICIL FROM ET CETERA.

We take the following spicy article, devoted to an enumeration of the contradictory criticisms of newspaper readers, from the columns of the Lutheran and Missionary, to which paper we have been indebted for not a few of the valuable selections we have presented to our readers:

FIRST MOTTO: "A was an Apple-pie. B bit it." &c. —The Illustrated Alphabet: Book I., Chap. I., p. 1, line 1, 2.

SECOND MOTTO: "A was an Archer, who shot at a frog. B was a Bantam, who crowed on a log." &c — The Alphabet Illustrated: line 1, 2, p. 1, Chap. I., B. I.

What can be more easy than for an editor to please all men? Their expectations are invariably as rational and as harmonious, and their directions as explicit, that the happy editor, blessed with their suggestions, has nothing to do but to combine them all, and present, in one unrivalled sheet, such virtues as were never before combined, and never will be again, making together, in their union,

"That fruitless monster which the world ne'er saw"

Take, dear readers, a few of these suggestions from "OUR LETTER-BAG," unless you fear that their perusal may make you discontented with your lot, and envious of ours. Remember, if you are so tempted, that the most exalted and agreeable positions, can be reached but by few; and try, hard though it may be, try to be satisfied although you are not editors. We cannot all be editors, but we may all be good and useful people in our way—which is indeed, very much better.

A says: "Give us more doctrine." B says: "Your only error is, you have too much doctrine." C. says: "You have almost nothing for ministers." D. says: "Do try and make it more popular." E. says: "You are too milk-and-watery on the disputed points." F. says: "A little more of your exclusive, high-church, symbolical, old fogyism, and your paper will sink to the bottom." G. says: "Give us sprightly tales—the less religion in them the better." H. says: "I would humbly suggest, whether it would not be well to exclude the lighter matter from your valued sheet, and give to it more solid strength." I. says ["illegible"]. "You are not full enough on the grand practical topics of the day." J. says: "If you dare to utter another word on the [illegible] we shall naturally refuse to take your paper another time." K. says: "For mercy's sake, stop your bottom of those horrid Germans, with unpronounceable names. Who cares about them, or their learned lumber?" L. says: "It seems to me strangers overlook the [illegible] and they will come right of themselves."

ET CETERA, (a superb fellow he is, with a great, big true heart, that thrills out not a drop of blood that does not fulfil its mission in his clear, strong brain and a manly, active form,)—ET CETERA says: "Please find in my letter the names of twenty-five new subscribers, with the advance payments. I shall send you another lot next week. I pray for God's blessing on you regularly. It is a great pity that those who pray for their pastors every day, forget the editors of our papers, who are, in fact, pastors of flocks embracing thousands. I pray that your labors and those of your cherished co-worker may build up Zion, and may glorify our adorable Saviour's name. We are hungry for the coming of the paper. Everybody reads it, and everybody likes it. Where do you get so many clever, sprightly and instructive fellows to write for you? They come right to the point, and know how to say a great deal without being lengthy. I am most ashamed to send you the article I enclose, unworthy as it is of a place in such good company, and I do it only with the understanding that you put it in your stove if it don't answer. If you do, it will [illegible] to your good judgment, without lessening our affection for you and my activity for the paper."

ET CETERA, the sunshine looks dim in thy sunshine. Thine is the sunshine of a genial, large nature, [illegible] ist of God. The sunshine of the sun is but a reflection—thy sunshine is an emanation—it shines in thee and by thee. Thou, in thy moral being, interpretest the declaration that "Man is the glory of God." A good man is a Shekinah. God dwells in him. [illegible] and sealed in our consciences we look for our highest reward. But, next to this, we cherish the words which assure us of the confidence and sympathy of those dear spirits, who, [illegible] in labor, in honor prefer one another, and cheer their brethren in toil—men who are as tolerant to infirmities as they are quick in detecting and exposing wrong.

A great change is seen in the public disposition [illegible] of the Apostles in the Russian tongue are selling freely in the streets of St. Petersburgh. Hope may be entertained that, with such a beginning, [illegible] the word of God shall have free course and be glorified [illegible]

The War in Kentucky.—The Battle of Mill Creek.—Full Details of the Action.—How Zollicoffer Fell.—At the point of the "V" died Gen. Zollicoffer. He fell nearer our camp than any other man of his army. He was with Battle's Regiment, [illegible] to aids, horn and bronzed up around him at Nashville. A short distance from him, to [illegible] part of his men had been broken from their comrades, and were herding together like frightened deer. Colonel Fry's men were just about to fire on them. Colonel Fry himself was at the right of his regiment at the point of greatest danger. Gen. Z. was on foot and within a few feet of the Colonel. A gun coat concealed his uniform. Seeing the condition of his men, as the Colonel rode up, [illegible] and [illegible] Colonel, you would not fire upon your friends, would you?" Colonel Fry supposed, from the General's manner and remark, that he was one of our own officers, and at once replied, "Certainly not, sir; I have no such intention." He turned and rode a few steps, when one of the General's Aids fired at him, wounding his horse. Believing that he was tracked, Col. F. at once wheeled and fired at the General. The latter raised his hand to his breast and fell dead. Another ball struck him at the same moment, I believe, in the arm.

Appearance of Zollicoffer's Corpse.—Col. Connor, who had known Gen. Z. in Washington, asked to be permitted to see the corpse, and I went with him. He lay in a tent, wrapped in an army blanket, his chest and left arm and side exposed. A tall, rather slender man, with thin, brown hair, high forehead somewhat bald, Roman nose, firm, wide mouth, and clean-shaved face. A pistol ball had struck him in the breast, a little above the heart, killing him instantly. His face bore no expression such as is usually found on those who fall in battle—no malice, no reckless hate, not even a shadow of physical pain. It was calm, placid, noble. But I have never looked on a countenance so marked with sadness. A deep dejection had settled on it. "The low curse of the mouth" were distinct in the droop at its corners, and the thin cheeks showed the wasting which comes through disappointment and trouble.

Zollicoffer's Career.—Poor Zollicoffer! He has been a most unfortunate man. Distrusted by his party on account of his supposed liberality toward the North, which was his birth-place, his political aspirations were destroyed before the Rebellion commenced. In its inception he was bitterly opposed to it, and struggled against Disunion till that great flood tide came which swept away so many of those whose names were once venerated throughout the land.

Assuming command of the Confederate troops in East Tennessee, he became a terror there and along the Upper Cumberland, but, as I am convinced, through any disposition of his own to be cruel or rapacious, but on account of the wild and undisciplined hordes whom he commanded, but could not control. His fidelity to the upstart Government was doubted, and he fought the battle of Wild Cat against the advice of every Colonel in his army, and with a reckless desire to obtain military distinction, and prove himself faithful to the new cause.

That attack was unsuccessful, simply because it was twenty-four hours too late. United there, he brought his troops to their long position on the Cumberland, threatening the heart of Kentucky, keeping open the navigation of the Cumberland, and ready to act in concert with the army at Bowling Green. No position was ever better chosen, either for its own strength or its value as connected with other military movements in the same line. Gen. Crittenden received him of his command on the 1st day of January, and Gen. Z. (heather went home for a few days. He left his home again, to die at the head of his army fighting a battle against his own judgment and in the moment of defeat.

Fruits of the Victory.—The victory was complete. Thirteen cannon, more than a thousand stand of arms, a thousand horses, ammunition, baggage trains, commissary stores of every kind, tents, clothing, and, in short, everything which the poor fellows had, were left to us. A copy of the order of retreat was found directing that the army should [illegible] o'clock, silently, and leave everything. They did not even spike their guns

Their Fortifications and Camp.—No army was ever caught with such a panic, even in the open field. That they should leave behind them all the [illegible] strength of those at and their camp seemed almost incredible. Those fortifications were evidently constructed under the supervision of a skilful engineer. It would be difficult to construct more formidable earthworks. They were defended by thirteen pieces, many of them rifled. The force of the enemy, even after their heavy losses in the morning, was fully equal in numbers to our own. Yet all was abandoned.

To our men, accustomed to live in cold tents, the Rebel camp seemed almost a paradise. The most of the regiments were furnished with log huts, warm, comfortable and [illegible]. In the commissary department there were much better supplied than we have been. No crackers, but good corn bread and biscuit most inviting. Coffee, sugar, beef, fat hogs, everything of the best, and plenty of it. The South may be starving, but the Southern army is far from [illegible] ing. [illegible] Their stores, or [illegible] gave advantages over them. Their guns were, many of them, flint-lock muskets, shot-guns and squirrel-rifles. But few rifled muskets were found.

The Retreat Becomes a Rout.—The rout is complete. Panic-stricken, they fly in all directions. The pursuit is pressed up to the very intrenchments of the enemy. Two of their pieces have been taken. The third, which they took with them, is only saved to be left behind in their flight across the river. Our cannon open on their camp, our shells falling into their most effective battery, killing four of the men at their guns, and driving the rest away. The darkness of nightfall only prevents a general assault, and our troops lie down, hoping in the morning to complete the good work of that Sabbath, a work they had not sought, for they were resting that day, preparatory to the attack which Gen. Thomas had intended to make on Monday

The Field After the Battle.—The Rebel Wounded.—I rode over the battle-field in the evening. Our men were burying the dead, but many still lay ghastly where they fell. The wounded had all been taken up. The same kind treatment was extended to the enemy's wounded which was given to our own. The universal remark which they made to me as I passed through the hospital was:—"We never expected to be treated so. We have been misled. We supposed [illegible] fall into your hands. You are kinder to us than we would have been to you." The only difference was [illegible] land together in common pits. Our own were buried in separate graves, and on many of them I saw young cedars already planted by their comrades.

Beside one of the graves prepared for the enemy's killed, I noticed several lying ready to be interred. One poor boy lay in the exact position, as I was told, [illegible] was found. He [illegible] was lovely closed on his right elbow. His eyes were closed and he looked as though he had just fallen asleep.

Later from Europe.—By the arrival of the Europa at Halifax, with dates to the 12th from Liverpool, by telegraph via Queenstown, we learn that, notwithstanding the pacific solution of the Trent question, warlike preparations continued, and vessels were still loading with heavy stores for Halifax and Jamaica.

The pleasable settlement of the difficulty had given [illegible] and the London press, as far as ascertained, without exception, had expressed their approval of the course pursued. The Times, eager as it was to have the [illegible] flag, opposes any ovation to them, and even goes so far as to say that "they are the most worthless body it would be possible to [illegible] the [illegible] the American line, having been long known as blind and habitual haters of England."

The Times sincerely hopes that Englishmen will not give these fellows—Mason and Slidell—anything in the shape of an ovation. The sympathy due to a foe in distress is all they can claim. England has returned them good for evil; and even now their only efforts will be to entangle her into war with the North. England would have done just as [illegible] fore, pass quietly on their way, and have their say with anybody who may have to listen to them.

The other journals allude to Mason's strong advocacy of the fugitive slave law to prejudice the public against them.

In France and Russia the same satisfaction at the settlement of the difficulty was expressed, and the [illegible] congratulating Mr Seward on the upright[illegible] and intelligence of his policy, and demanding that the [illegible] tions by the Powers of the autonomic principles upon the [illegible]

The Burnside Expedition has arrived at Hatteras, after encountering terrific storms. The steamers City of New York and Pocahontas, and the gun-boat Zouave, were wrecked. The Louisiana went ashore [illegible] Eastern Queen and Voltigeur went ashore

Despite all these adverse circumstances, General Burnside has succeeded in getting over the bar [illegible] sand troops. Everything appeared to be in a safe [illegible]

The large transports with the troops remained outside of the bar until the arrival of the S. R. Spaulding from Port Royal to the 9th when Captain Howe volunteered to bring them all inside. This was accomplished yesterday afternoon, the Eastern State passing the last as she left.

A portion of the gun-boats chartered by General Burnside for the Expedition refused to proceed further than Fortress Monroe.

Different statements are received at Hatteras from the surrounding population in relation to the disposition and intentions of the enemy. Some who come in say that they are completely frightened, and will not make a stand

Another report is, that large masses of troops will be concentrated in the vicinity; and still another story, confirmed by many, is, that their exertions will be directed chiefly to placing obstructions in our progress to Norfolk. The rebels keep a good [illegible] of the movements with their gun boats

Hon. Robert Wilson, a reported strong Union man, has been appointed by acting Lieutenant Governor Wall, of Missouri, United States Senator from that State to fill the vacancy created by the expulsion of Trusten Polk for sympathy with the Southern rebellion

Hon C L. Vallandigham, member of Congress from Ohio, and who lately published a card in the Baltimore Sun declaring that the action of the United States Government in releasing Messrs. Slidell and Mason was "more disastrous than five years of warfare," has given notice in Congress of his intention to ask a bill to abolish the Post Office Department.

John Tyler, ex-President of the United States, and for some time past an active participant in all the schemes and acts of the Southern Rebellion, died in Richmond, Virginia, at fifteen minutes past 12 o'clock, on Friday night, the 17th instant, 71 years of age.

George Thompson, whose vivid and anti-slavery addresses to this country as early as 1835 is still remembered by many, lately delivered an eloquent lecture in Surrey Chapel, London, on American affairs, vindicating the conduct of the Northern States in endeavoring to put down the Southern rebellion, and strongly deprecating the war spirit that is manifested in certain quarters of his native country, Great Britain

Hon. Noah A Swain, of Columbus, Ohio, has been nominated by President Lincoln, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judge McLean.

John Lothrop Motley, the distinguished Historian, and Robert V. Pruyn, of Albany, New York have been confirmed by the United States in their appointments, the former to be Minister to Austria, and the latter Minister Resident to Japan. Both, it is believed, are eminently suitable appointments.

CLAIRE'S BABY

Mr. Curtis sat alone in his office. It was late at the turn of the day when the shadows in the corners were subtle creeping forth to turn the twilight into darkness. There had been unusually painful cases in the court room upon that day, and the lawyer's brow wore a look of thoughtful sadness, and he leaned his head upon his hand with an air of weariness which was at variance with his strongly-marked features, and the energy of his usual movements and words. Rousing himself after an hour of thought, he lighted his room, and then sat down to write; his first task was the following letter:

My Dear Madam:—It grieves me, both as an old friend and your professional adviser, to have to tell you that our last hope failed to day. You have secured me from the commencement of the suit that you looked for no other issue, and I most sincerely trust that the blow will be lightened by the anticipation of the result of our efforts. In any way that I can be of service to you it will be my highest pleasure to be employed. Hoping that you will call upon me for any advice or assistance that you may need now, I am

Yours very truly, A. Curtis

Mrs E. Barclay

He had scarcely finished writing the direction of his epistle, when a loud ring at the bell announced a visitor. He looked up to see at the door a small, child-like figure, dressed in mourning, with a veil over the face.

"Mr. Curtis, I believe," said a very sweet voice, and raising the veil the lady showed a face to match the gentle accents. She was very slight and small, and her fair smooth hair, large blue eyes, and small features gave a winning childish look to her face, with which a close widow's cap and heavy black attire made a touching contrast. Mr. Curtis rose instantly, handed the lady a chair, and then waited to hear her errand.

"You are Mrs. Barclay's legal adviser, I believe."

Mr. Curtis bowed assent.

"I am Mrs Hastings; your uncle would know me well, but since I left home I feel I have lost an old friend in his death."

"I have heard my uncle speak frequently of Mrs. Barclay's friend, 'little Claire.'"

"Yes, I am 'little Claire,' I returned from Europe yesterday, and for the first time heard of"—the blue eyes were filling fast—"of dear Mrs. Barclay's troubles. I came here instantly to ask you to tell me all, for the accounts I hear very."

"I should be—" Mr. Curtis paused

"You are a lawyer," said Mrs. Hastings smiling, "and I am making a blunder, I see, to my request. Did Mrs. Barclay or your uncle ever tell you anything about me?"

"Only that you were a very dear friend of the lady's."

"Then, if I will not weary you, I will tell you my story, and you shall then judge whether it is best to answer my questions. Seven years ago, last Christmas eve, I was made an orphan. My father was a drummer in the orchestra in one of our theatres; my mother embroidered collars. One evening, Christmas eve, there had been a pantomime at the theatre in which my father was engaged, which required music behind the scenes, and in passing from the rear of the stage to the front, he fell into a trap, which was invisible in the dim light, and was instantly killed; they brought his body home, and the shock, acting upon a frame weakened by toil, poverty, and illness, was too much for my mother; she went from one swoon to another, and died in my arms just as the dawn of Christmas peeped into our little room. I was then just fifteen years of age; for the day which brought this weight of sorrow was my birthday.

"My parents' death threw me upon the world utterly penniless, and I was very young, sir. I am telling you all this to prove how much I owe to Mrs. Barclay. My parents had been poor from my birth, yet I was not wholly without education. My father had a natural genius for elocution, and had trained my voice for reading, while my mother taught me to sew, and an old violinist, a friend of my father's, had given me instruction in music. I could read, play on the piano, sing and sew; so, after I had seen all my parents' property sold to pay their funeral expenses, I started with a brave heart to make my living. You may well shake your head. I had not one friend out of the theatre, and there was no money to spare amongst them; so I went, in my childish hope of obtaining work, from door to door. I was very small, and some smiled pityingly, some contemptuously at the idea of trusting the little wanderer with sewing. A whole week passed, and I had not earned one cent. Then I tried the stores; there, too, I failed

"I was leaning one day against the counter of a store where embroidery was sold, and where my timid petition for work had met its last rebuff; I was crying, for I was cold, hungry, and hopeless. A kind hand was placed on my shoulder, and a low, sweet voice said—

"'You are in trouble, my child—what about?'

"I looked up. Such a kind-loving face bent over me, and such tender, pitying eyes looked into mine, that I was warmed and cheered instantly

"'If you please,' I said, 'I want some work.'

"'Work, child!'

"'Yes ma'am, embroidery; I can do it. Mother taught me,' and then, encouraged by her sweet face and interest, I told all my troubles. I will not weary you by any more details. My questioner was Mrs Barclay; she took me to her own house, and for four years she was a second mother to me; I was educated and protected, while every wish of my heart was gratified. I could talk for a week and not tell half the love and kindness she poured out upon the little orphan child, and it was not given as if I were a dependant upon her bounty, a charity ward, but every gift was sweetened by loving words and actions. I was told to call her aunt Lizzie, and she introduced me to her friends as her child, making me her equal in station, and yet I had no real claim upon her; it was her own loving heart that found its return in what alone I could give, my gratitude and affection.

When I was nineteen years old I married, and in parting from me, my dear benefactress gave new tokens of her loving care. I will not dwell upon my married life, its grief is too recent. We went, my husband and myself, to Paris and for two years travelled through Europe. Ten months ago, Mr Hastings died in Florence of malarious fever. I was very ill for a long time after I was widowed, but in the kind letters I received from home, I had no hint of Mrs. Barclay's troubles, and when she requested me to change the address of my letters, she did not say that she had been forced to leave her home, the dear home where she had made my life so happy. Not until yesterday, when I landed in New York, did I receive the least intimation of a change of my friend's prospects, and I came here as soon as possible. I have just arrived in the city, and I came to you as the person who could best give me the information that I seek.

"My husband left me wealthy, and I am sole mistress of my property my benefactress is, I hear, poor. Now, judge if I have a right to ask for the statement of her trouble."

Mr Curtis replied instantly. "You have every right, and I will meet your confidence with equal frankness, but first you must allow me to insist upon your having rest and refreshment. Nothing can be done before to-morrow and after tea I promise you all the information which it is in my power to give you. Mrs Curtis is in the drawing room. Will you allow me to present you?"—and rising he offered his arm to the lady.

Mrs Curtis, a tall, handsome lady received her husband's little guest with pleasure, one sight of the childish face with its sad setting enlisting all her womanly sympathies. The tone, however, added to the warmth of her welcome.

"Mrs Hastings, I feel like an old friend, for you were my sister's classmate in the Young Ladies' Seminary. Do you not remember Lottie Banks?"

"And you are Sara. I shall have a thousand questions to ask, but first I must trouble Mr. Curtis to speak to the hackman and tell him to call for me later in the evening."

"Where are your trunks?"

"At the G — House."

"Mr Curtis," said his lady, laughingly, "do you see much of my displeasure manifested to for Mrs Hastings trunks. No scuffle, you are our guest when in the city."

"I shall be a life long inmate, then," was the reply, "for I intend to reside here in future. I accept the invitation with pleasure, for I have to find a house. Mr Curtis, when you send for the trunks, will you please send for my baby."

"If there is so precious a package as that to be delivered," said Mr. Curtis, "I will go myself for the baggage."

"Room 139 and you will find Meta, the nurse there. You speak German."

"Yes."

"Because she is profoundly ignorant of English. My baby is German born there sixteen months ago, and I brought a nurse from Germany when we left there."

Mr Curtis departed upon his mission, and Mrs Hastings having doffed her bonnet and cloak, was soon chatting with her hostess

Tea over, the baby put to bed, and the lawyer disengaged, the sad story of Mrs Barclay's troubles came up again. It was brief. A relative of her late husband's had made a claim against the estate, and after a long lawsuit the court had given the case to the widow's opponent.

"She left the house immediately after the claim was made," said Mr Curtis, "and was only persuaded, after a very long course of urging to resist the demand."

"Where is she now?"

"In H——"

"But how does she live? Was there nothing left?"

"Nothing! From luxury she was deprived of all. She is now teaching French in a young ladies' seminary. It will be a year in January since she has been there."

Claire's tears were flowing fast; but after a moment's pause, she said brightly: "All the events of my life, except the last"—and she glanced at her black dress—"have happened to me on Christmas. I was born on that day, orphaned, married, all on Christmas day, and I should like to associate a great pleasure more with the time; it is only one month. Will you help me in a plan for the next Christmas?"

"I will," said both Mr. and Mrs Curtis, and Mrs Hastings told them her project

"No letter from Claire; this is the first steamer she has missed; I hope she is not sick again." And an anxious cloud came over the speaker's face. She was an elderly lady, whose soft gray hair shaded a face where every gentle feeling had left a trace: the mild blue eyes, the full mouth, the soft creamy complexion, all seemed to speak of the serene spirit within, which gave its charm to the delicate features. She was pacing slowly up and down in a long room, where globes, books, and desks told of little students; in her hand she held an unopened letter, but it was not directed in the pretty, lady-like hand for which she looked, and she let it stay sealed in her hand as she walked up and down. A fair child-like form and face, with a wreathing wealth of sunny hair, was before her as she mused, now in the coarse dress and thin bonnet in which it had first come to her, then in the full white lace and bridal wreath and veil in which it had last greeted her. She tried to picture it in the sad dress which now sorrow had made its own, and she whispered softly: "Not yet, nor next time; I will write as before until she is a little more accustomed to her own grief. I cannot add to my darling's care. Perhaps at Christmas, the time when I met her first, I can write."

It was getting dark, and the entrance of the children and light reminded her of the letter. Opening it, she read:

My Dear Madam:—I find that your signature is absolutely necessary to some papers which I hold, and which I cannot trust to the mail. Will you come to the city on the 24th, when I will meet you and be ready for the signature? Mrs. Curtis begs that you will be her guest during your stay in town

Yours, respectfully, A. Curtis

"He is imperative," thought the lady; "but I will go. Any relief from this treadmill existence will do me good."

It was Christmas eve; a still, starry evening had succeeded a clear day, and as the cars dashed into the depot at nine o'clock, Mrs. Barclay was almost sorry her ride was over

"I could not come earlier," she said, as Mr. Curtis met her. "My holiday does not commence until to-morrow, and the principal is at a setting. Now I have a week of quiet rest."

"And I trust of great happiness," said the lawyer.

"I wonder what he means!" thought the lady, as they drove away from the depot. "He smiled very significantly. The suit is lost, that is certain. Has he saved anything from the wreck? We are driving away from his part of the city, and—and"—the carriage stopped "My old house!" said Mrs Barclay

"I will explain presently," said Mr Curtis offering his arm

Up the steps, into the wide hall, lighted and warmed, and up the stairs to the bed room. Here Mrs Curtis met the bewildered lady, whose eyes filled as they rested upon the furniture and ornaments which were just as she had left them

"You will find all the rooms unchanged," said Mrs. Curtis, gently. "The man who took it did not disturb anything, and it was purchased as you left it. Will you come down, now?"

The parlor was lighted, and in the adjoining room a supper table was spread for the traveller. Upon the mantelpiece lay a folded paper directed to Mrs Barclay. In it she read only these words—"A Christmas gift from Claire's baby."

"Claire!" she cried; and, in answer to the call, the little figure appeared in the door, holding a baby in a festive dress of white. There was a sobbing cry of "Claire, my darling!" and somehow the baby was transferred to Mrs Curtis, and Claire was folded in her adopted mother's arms

Such a happy Christmas was not spent under many roofs, and the earnestness it gave of a life of grateful care to repay what Claire had met in her sorrow, was not disappointed.

THE CAKE

The little daughter of a poor sewing woman went to a lady's house one Christmas to take home a bundle of work. As she stood in the entry, the lady brought her money to pay for the work, her purse was in one hand and a plate in the other.

Jessie no doubt looked first and longest at the plate, for the plate held a fine little Christmas cake, coated with frosting and dotted with all sorts of sugar plums. Jessie, very likely, never saw such a cake before, except perhaps at the shop-windows. "Here, my little girl, I have brought this Christmas cake for you," said the kind lady.

Jessie was too astonished to speak. She looked and looked at the frosted cake with wondering and eager eyes, then said timidly, "Oh, ma'am; and if I might only carry it to Mary. She is my poor lame cousin who never moves from her chair, and her leg pains her so."

"Would you rather Mary to have it than yourself?" asked the lady, smiling; "see the sugar plums." "I should like it very much, replied the little girl, modestly, "but Mary is sick and I would please her so. I better she would have it."

"Well, said the lady, "you can give it to Mary. The Lord Jesus says it is more blessed to give than to receive, perhaps you have found it so." Jessie looked up to the lady's face with a quiet sweet smile as she took the cake and thanked her for it.

This lady had read a great many books and heard a great many sermons. But somehow all her reading and preaching never made her understand that text in the way in which Jessie had understood it when she went with her cake to poor lame Mary. It was that same lesson that [illegible] never failed and yet never grows old, yet never wearing out. And the lady humbly took the lesson from the child She treasured it up in her heart, she tried to pattern after it in her own life. Our blessed Lord, the Son of God, from the time he left the bosom of the Father to his death on the cross, made his whole way shining with its blessedness

It is pleasant sometimes to find the darkness of human life wearing with a stray beam of this heavenly sort. Whoever of our readers have not heard the Hindoo fable illustrating the spots of the moon, will be glad to see it. The Hindoos fancy they can see a rabbit in the moon; and their poets often paint the moon with a rabbit in the middle of a pounding rice. The fable thus explained is: Four animals, a fox, a monkey, and a rabbit, lived together in a large forest. One day a poor traveller came to see them. "My children," he said, "I am sure in this calm spot? Do you never feel afraid." "We are peaceful and happy," they answered. "We live in love, though of different families. The green grass is our carpet and the shady boughs our roof." "I heard of it," said the old man, "and came a great distance to visit you. I am old and weary. I suffer from hunger. Can you give me something to eat?"

The three little animals, moved with pity, leaped away in three different directions to find food. Galloping to the river's brink, the fox seized a silvery fish, frozen and dripping, and brought it between his teeth, and laid it at the old man's feet. The monkey climbed the highest trees, and fetched him the finest fruits. The rabbit came back as he had gone out, empty-handed, with nothing to offer the old man.

"The monkey and the fox have had pity on me," he said sadly, "Does the rabbit despise me?"

"Dear friends," said little rabbit to the fox and monkey, "will you heap a pile of wood and dead leaves for me?" When they finished heaping the pile, the rabbit set it on fire, and then said, "Good old man, I am little and feeble. I looked everywhere, and found nothing worthy to bring you; but I will offer my body for your repast." With that he jumped into the fire and roasted himself to death.

The old man then threw off his disguise, and appeared as one of the gods. He gathered up the bones of the poor little rabbit, and said, "I am deeply touched by this sacrifice, and as a reward I will place the rabbit in the middle of the moon that his memory may never perish."

THE INDEPENDENT FARMER

Let soldiers sing of the windy deep,
Let soldiers praise their armor,
But in my heart this toast I'll keep—
"The Independent Farmer."
When first the rose in robes of green
Unfolds its crimson lining,
And 'round his cottage porch is seen
The honeysuckle twining;
When banks of bloom their sweetness yield,
To bees that gather honey,
He drives his team across the field,
Where skies are soft and sunny.

The blackbird sticks behind the plough,
The quail pipes loud and clearly,
You orchard hides behind its bough
The house he hews so dearly;
The gray old barn, whose doors unfold
His ample store in measure,
More rich than heaps of hoarded gold,
A precious, blessed treasure.
But yonder in the porch there stands
His wife, she lovely charmer,
The sweetest rose on all the lands—
The Independent Farmer.

To him the Spring comes dancingly,
To him the Summer blushes,
The Autumn smiles with mellow ray;
He sleeps, old Winter hushes
He cares not how the world may move,
No doubts nor fears confound him;
His little flocks are linked in love,
And honest old angels round him;
He trusts in God and loves his wife,
Nor grieves nor ills may harm her;
He's nature's noblemen in life—
The Independent Farmer.

ARMY POETRY

The following original hymn, by Dr O Evarts, the surgeon of the 20th Indiana Regiment, stationed with ours, near Fortress Monroe, was sung on this occasion. It so truly reflects the spirit of our army, that it was sung with much spirit by all who were present:

Thou loving Father, over all
We, our loved mother, our heart enthrall,
Whose house is neither tent nor wall,
We come to Thee, with all our guilt!

From home and kindred far away
Upon this mid we bend the knee,
And from the midst of war's array
Thy children still—we look to Thee.

No love of self—no lust of power
Nor greed for gold hath brought us here
But in these wars good thing and fair,
We come to see Thy light appear.

O let it first from our own hearts
Drive out the darkness of sin, flying there
The tempter will with all his arts
That we may fall not in his snare!

Let "Use—not Fame" inspire our arms.
And—or first love to know it is—
That Freedom, with her heavenly charms,
May make us, also, truly free!

And when, O, Father, over all
Not in this tent—nor on this field—
In life a great battle we shall fail,
O hear us all upon Thy shield!

DOMESTIC MARKETS

The inclemency of the weather has interfered with wharf operations this week, and the markets generally have been very inactive. Quercitron Bark is better. Breadstuffs close firmer, and rather more active. Coal continues steady, but very quiet. Iron is held with more firmness. Cotton.—The demand continues limited. Coffee and sugar are firm. Provisions rule dull, and the prices of most kinds nearly nominal. Fish, Fruit, Naval Stores, Oils, and Plaster are without any material variation. Rice and Salt unchanged. Lumber is rather more active. Tobacco, Teas, and Tobacco are scarce and high. Wool is in limited request at previous quotations.

THE INDEPENDENT FARMER
Lot soldiers sing of the windy deep,
Let soldiers praise their armor,
But in my heart this toast I'll keep—
"The Independent Farmer."
When first the rose in robe of green
Unfolds its crimson lining,
And 'round his cottage porch is seen
The honeysuckle twining;
When banks of bloom their sweetness yield,
To bees that gather honey,
He drives his team across the field,
Where skies are soft and sunny.

The blackbird sticks behind the plough,
The quail pipes loud and clearly,
You orchard hides behind its bough
The house he hews so dearly;
The gray old barn, whose doors unfold
His ample store in measure,
More rich than heaps of hoarded gold,
A precious, blessed treasure.
But yonder in the porch there stands
His wife, she lovely charmer,
The sweetest rose on all the lands—
The Independent Farmer.

To him the Spring comes dancingly,
To him the Summer blushes,
The Autumn smiles with mellow ray;
He sleeps, old Winter hushes
He cares not how the world may move,
No doubts nor fears confound him;
His little flocks are linked in love,
And honest old angels round him;
He trusts in God and loves his wife,
Nor grieves nor ills may harm her;
He's nature's noblemen in life—
The Independent Farmer.

BAUGH'S
RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE OF
MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNED BONES
BY BAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20 S. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.
CASH PRICE $45 PER 2000 POUNDS. (2½ CTS. PER POUND)
In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtues of the bone is retained, a Fertilizer is presented, furnishing in a concentrated and reliable form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil, viz. phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of "BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE," are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity. They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the needful nourishment for the growing crop, giving it simple luxuriance, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its presence can be traced for years after words.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860.
Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and am well satisfied of its value as an active and "lasting" fertilizer.
I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 200 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier, while the grain was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and straw, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory. In corn, my experience in its use has been the' it pays well for the money laid out.
Yours, &c, ISAAC T. LEWIS.

Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860.
Messrs. Baugh & Sons:—Having applied last season to test some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side. In the same field I purchased Peruvian Guano and Super Phosphate of Lime—one of the former together with your New Bone Super Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the test resulted most fully in favor of the latter.
But whether it is from the mode and ease in preparing, or to the superior quality of the material used in, — the Bone Super Phosphate, I am unable to say, however, I cheerfully award you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make other experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c, JAMES DUNWOODY

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 10th, 1860.
Baugh & Sons Gentlemen,—Having used your Super Phosphate, bought of you in Christmas, at the Montgomery C. Agricultural Society, on wheat and corn, I take with pleasure in recommending it. The effect it produced was so manifest, that it greatly increased my confidence in the value of your Fertilizer. Where it was applied on the wheat, the soil was decidedly the poorest on the field, yet the yield was fully equal to the balance, which had a heavy coat of barn-yard manure. Where it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double.
Very respectfully, DAVID MARPLE.

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS IN
SEWING MACHINES.
EMPIRE
SHUTTLE MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
Salesroom—510 Broadway, New York.
This MACHINE is constructed on a entirely new principle of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements—having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced to be PERFECTION of construction.
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—
1.—Expensive tension in the operator.
2.—Liability to get out of order.
3.—Expense, trouble, and loss of time in repairing.
4.—Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5.—Disagreeable noise when in operation.
THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.
It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which cannot be rubbed out, ripped or pulled out at both sides—performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Nainsook Muslin, with cotton, linen, silk or thread. It is the cheapest in the market. Is simple in construction, and not liable to get out of order, and is guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction.
We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this
UNRIVALLED MACHINE.
But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of
MERCHANT TAILORS, COACH MAKERS, HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS, SHIRT & BOSOM MAKERS, DRESS MAKERS, CORSET MAKERS, GAITER FITTERS, SHOE-BINDERS, VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS.
☞ LIBERAL TERMS AND CHEERFULNESS WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.
Price of Machine Complete.
No. 1 or Family Machine, [illegible]
Cabinets in every variety.
We want agents for all towns in the United States where operations are not already established, to whom a liberal discount will be given—but by sales only, no consignments.

SEWING MACHINES.
GIBBS & WILCOX
Price with Hemmer and Feller,
$35 00.
THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN
Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread
It forms a flat, even and elastic seam which is reversible and will rip to wear alike on both sides, and will not ravel out even under all circumstances. It requires the upper thread to be drawn through the loop of the under thread at every stitch.
A practical mastery of every variety of sewing presents the good points of the machine being done in the most simple, easy and rapid manner, and with the least possible fatigue to the operator.
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—
1st—Its expensive tension in the operator.
2d—Liability to get out of order.
3d—Expense, trouble, and loss of time in repairing.

BEFORE COMMUNION.

FROM THE OPEN DOOR OF 1776

Faithful Bridegroom! Holy Lamb!
By thy church beloved,
Manifest thy sweetest name
To each heart approved.

Crown this ordinance of thine
With a gleam divine to-day,
Let our feast be all divine,
Each thyself possessing.

Cause that blushing sacrifice
Once for sinners given,
To appear before our eyes,
Earnest of our heaven!

We partake the bread and wine,
Seals of our profession,
Of the inward grace the sign,
Symbols of thy passion.

We commemorate thy death,
While we are receiving,
Feeding in our hearts by faith,
With unfeigned thanksgiving.

From thy fulness, Lord, impart
Grace and peace forever:
Let us drink from thy pierced heart
Life, as from a river.

May we thus our time employ,
While below we tarry,
Till our souls to endless joy,
Angels come to carry.

THE DEATH OF ROMANCE.

There are gains for all our losses,
There is balm for all our pain,
But when youth, the dream departs,
He takes something from our hearts,
And it never comes again.

We are stronger, we are better,
Under manhood's sterner reign;
Still we feel that something sweet
Followed youth with flying feet,
And will never come again.

Something beautiful is vanished,
And we sigh for it in vain:
We behold it everywhere,
On the earth and in the air,
But it never comes again.

R. H. STODDART.

Selections.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

As our readers are already generally aware, the surrender of the traitors, Mason and Slidell, by the United States Government, has been received with no little satisfaction by our English friends. There was, as is well-known, a strong peace-party in Great Britain and when every occasion or pretext for warlike wrath was taken away, that party could not be kept back from hearty expressions of delight at the result. At the same time it is well for us to remember that it is not safe to presume too much on the good will of England. The principle on which the surrender was made was indeed an American triumph, while on the other hand, the demand by England was an acknowledgment of her own wrong doing in the past. While, therefore, the American may bite his lip when he sees the author of the Fugitive Slave Law and the apostle of filibusterism, delivered up, and while the Englishman may rejoice that his national flag has been honored, both must feel that so far as a great national principle is concerned, the triumph is all on our side. We simply did to others what we would have others do to us. But will England be satisfied with this? We hope she may be, for the sake of the vast interests at stake; but it is quite possible that she will try to ignore still the very principle on which she was compelled to stand in making her demand for reparation in the Trent affair.

But even granting that England should yield the principle involved in the case of Mason and Slidell, granting that this pretext for war may be entirely removed, the question arises, May we confidently expect peace? We are pained to have to come to the conclusion that we have not so much ground for such a hope as we formerly, and until lately, entertained. Whatever may have been the cause, whether it is from an entire misapprehension of the nature of the case, or from a retrogression of English opinion on the subject of liberty, or from jealousy unworthy of a great nation, it is too plain to admit of denial, that in the present struggle the weight of English influence has been on the side of secession and slavery. She has countenanced a principle that, if adopted in her own case, might, before a twelve-month, shiver her world-wide empire into a thousand pieces. Secession at pleasure is a suicidal principle. She has upheld, and is upholding by a powerful moral influence, the despotism of the Southern leaders, notwithstanding the open and unblushing avowal of a purpose to establish a government whose great distinguishing feature, whose peculiar claim to honor among sister powers is, that it aims to establish on a firmer basis, and so forever conserve and perpetuate the curse of slavery. Why this sympathy for rebellion? Why this encouragement of oppression? Why this intense hatred of the Free States which was developed by the Trent affair? Why was there no return for Northern sympathy in the Crimean war? None for our moral support in the India rebellion, which led us, for example, to mourn with them when Havelock fell, almost as if he had been a hero under the stars and stripes? None for our brotherly greeting of the Prince of Wales, who did not venture farther South than Richmond? None for our friendly response to the call for bread in the day of Ireland's distress? Why no return unless a great change had come over our British friends? Why, unless cotton was beginning to outweigh other and nobler considerations?

Our only hope for peace, if the rebellion is not speedily quelled, is in the formation of more intelligent views in Great Britain, on the subject of our relations to freedom and slavery. We regret that there is some occasion for misunderstanding us. We regret that the Free States are apparently standing on a somewhat pro-slavery basis, and that there is something plausible in the saying, that in regard to Slavery the North is no better than the South. Yet there is, as any one may see, a vast difference, a diametrical opposition between the Free and the rebel States. The one covers the thought of freedom for any but 850,000 masters; the other in the main is imbued with a burning love of liberty for all men. The South is fighting for what it has fought against until now—the right to sympathy with Hampden and Pym and Marvell and all the great lovers of constitutional freedom. Let the one prevail, and slavery of the basest kind, and the African slave trade, with all its horrors and abominations, will be established in the whole region around the Gulf of Mexico, as necessary to the effect follows the cause. But let the Free States prevail, and if slavery is not extinct in all out of North America, it will certainly be hunted and crippled.

We hope that the friends of right and peace in Great Britain will endeavor to enlighten the public mind there. The idea that has gone abroad that our chief officers—the President and especially our Secretary of State, are thirsting for war with the mother country, is unaccountably strange. Never did more peace loving men hold the reins of power. The great majority of our people are one with the intelligent Christian people of England in all more important matters. We have, indeed, men among us who have a better hatred towards the British. But who are they? Generally, if not invariably, renegade Englishmen, who have favored that country by inflicting their presence on us—in cases well known, infidel papists who represent neither their native, nor their adopted land.

We hope that our conduct in the Trent affair will open the eyes of Englishmen, that they may see we have no hostile purposes to carry out. No great nation has had so much peace as we have had for seventy-five years, and no where perhaps was the blessedness of such a policy so signally illustrated by the progress of religion, education, commerce, agriculture, and the useful arts. We will, we trust, still love this course. We hope, at least, to be spared the mortification of seeing England abandon her traditional policy to support the meanest, most odious, most barbarous system of slavery now known in any Protestant or even Romish country.

It is bad enough for Americans, trammelled by certain constitutional difficulties, and tempted in so many ways, to be found siding or abetting a system that in as certainly opposed to our Declaration of Independence as darkness is opposed to light. But is it not even worse for Great Britain, after having boasted so much of her self-sacrifice in liberating her West Indian slaves, and spoken so bitterly of Americans because we have been entangled with the system, though the great majority are free from the shame, and are the unchanging foes of the iniquity—is it not even worse for England to turn around and do what she can to destroy our nation and establish an oligarchy of slave-breeders and slave-traders? There is something noble in a great, free nation, uttering a voice of sympathy for a struggling people, as was done by this country in behalf of Greece, or recently by England through Lord Russell in behalf of Italy; but there is something as humiliating as it is strange in the manifestations of British sympathy for slavery and secession.

VISITING THE SCHOLARS.

The great duty of a teacher in a Sabbath School is to communicate to the pupils a correct knowledge of the gospel. In other words, it is to instruct them in class. To do this faithfully and truly every energy should be invoked. But, besides instruction in class, there are other duties which the faithful teacher must attend to. And, we fear, that no one can be truly faithful who omits them without having, at least, made a strong effort to attend to them, or unless he is providentially hindered from so doing. Among these subordinate duties is that of regularly visiting the scholars at their homes. You may do your best to instruct a class, and by the divine blessing see your efforts bearing fruit; but in a much larger degree may your labors be blessed, if you visit the children at their homes. See what they need to be instructed in, their peculiar circumstances and wants, and thus see into their inner life, and become more able to adapt your conduct and instruction to their various and peculiar conditions.

One thing very necessary, in order to impress the heart, is to have the confidence of the child. In no way can you so fully gain this as by visiting and conversing with him at home. If you show your interest in him by kind visits, and kind and instructive words to him and his parents at home, the child will soon learn to place confidence in you. Every class has some regard for, and places some confidence in its teacher; but visiting will increase this, and give additional power and greater fitness to instruction.

Visiting the pupils at home gives the parents confidence in you, and their influence will be great in making their children regular and punctual in their attendance, and more attentive to your counsels. Visiting may also be the means of doing the parents good, of bringing them, if they are careless, to a serious consideration of religion, and, perhaps, into the Christian fold. As it is with the pastor of a congregation, so it is, in a great degree, with the teacher in the Sabbath School; religious instruction must be enforced by personal visits and private conversation. Many a soul is led to Jesus by private remarks and incidents hid from the public view.

The following incident occurred to one of our pastors in Pittsburgh, by which two families were gained to his congregation, and we hope to Christ, by what seemed a small matter.

As he was passing through the street one day, a bucket-full of dirty water was thrown on him from a window, incidentally. The person observed what was done, and calling him into the house, apologized and tried to rectify the matter. The result was, the family became acquainted with the minister, who improved the occasion by directing them to the subject of religion. He saw what they needed. They listened to his advice, introduced him to an adjoining family in a like state with themselves; and thus two families were led to confess the Saviour. Sabbath School teacher, have you not opportunities which you can embrace and turn to a like advantage?

RELIGIONS IN WHICH I HAVE NO FAITH

I have no faith in a religion that goes by "fits and starts." Just as little as I take a horse of a lazy temper, cutting some pranks under the stimulating influence of half a pint of whisky, for a racer. I see it is not the steed, it is the whisky. On a half starved beast, that is innocent of any thing better than hay and swill, even oats will have pretty much the same effect on first acquaintance. But oats will soon grow on him and be on them. Just make the experiment.

I have no faith in a religion that has its seasons. Just as little as I believe a man must have the trouble of breathing in summer and may spare it in winter. There is the fault, that men treat religion as an accidental thing and not as the substance of their being. Religion is an element as essentially necessary to health and life at one time as at another. It is not the gilding around the edge of the book of your life, but it ought to be the contents of the book, the substance of your life. There is no individual to whom a "warming up" would not sometimes be quite beneficial, but a certain degree of heat must ever be the order of life will be extinct, and the best "warming up" will not restore it. I have found men of "seasons" sometimes right hot and feverish about religion. A moderate glow of piety would have indicated a sounder state of health.

I have no faith in a religion that has no home at home. Religion is not a dress coat to be used for particular and extraordinary occasions. It ought to be a home spun thing coming from the family loom, or it is a fabrication and a humbug. I know what I say, and I shall stick to it. I believe there are exceptions to the rule, but the rule I take from experience. Religion must be a home growth, not a mere cultivation of the church yard and gardener thereof. It would never do to have water reservoirs placed here, and there around or in some cities. We would not be satisfied with getting [illegible] our harvest and pasture, no, we want to have it right [illegible] at hand, and every house waste its own hydrant, and the stronger the head of water the better. So, I say, is it with religion; let us thank God for our churches and church services, and our Sunday schools, and all other healthful agencies, to promote the only divine thing on earth, Christ's kingdom. But let us not stop there. Let there be in every household a sound spring and a healthful supply of this refreshing, vivifying, purifying, and beautifying element. If religion is not an every day matter, a daily want, duty, habit, rule, and pleasure, it will soon be a no day matter, a nothing, or even a worse thing. Does not the same blood circulate through your arteries and veins every day throughout the whole year? You are the same man on Sabbath and on week-day. If intercourse with God is your personal interest on congregational occasions, or in prayer meetings, or under similar circumstances, I can never understand, why that personal interest in religion should leave you at the door of your house and in the midst of your family, where it most naturally should be nearer to your heart than anywhere else. Let that religion which takes hold of your inner man whilst under the preaching of the Gospel, and ennobles your feelings, and encourages you to every thing good and praiseworthy, be the essence of your life at home, the daily bread of your family, and the light which sheds its holy lustre over the comforts, the cares, the joys, and the troubles of your household, to make it a sanctuary of the living God.

I have no faith in a religion that goes about buying credit. The counterfeit detector of the world at large will soon have it on the list of "spurious denominations." There is no trouble about hard cash. Just let your religion be real gold and it needs no trumpeter to persuade the world that you are a solid fellow and a substantial business man. There is the mistake: the more show you make of your religion the more will be expected of you and the less will you give satisfaction. I have seen houses and stores where the signboard actually was larger than the building, and whatever there was valuable in the whole concern was nicely laid out in the show window. Neighbors and strangers will soon enough find out the real state of affairs. It is the same with your religion. Some men stupify their own consciences, and by and by forget the discrepancy between their oral profession and their actual life. A more dangerous state of the soul cannot be thought of. The world may judge too hard by calling them downright hypocrites, but it is their own fault. They are like the man, who, owing another one a sum of money, goes about and makes a great noise about his ability and willingness to pay at such and such a day. The day comes, but the money is wanting. Less noise, but more hard cash! I do not mean to say that men should make no profession of religion! God forbid it! But I say that profession as such is a mere promissory note. If you will not pay it, you had better not give it. Let your life be a gold coin; Christian religion as your profession on one side, and strictest morality down to your very thoughts on the other. There is no need of begging credit for this coin.

I have no faith in conceited religion. Some pious people take wonderful airs upon themselves on account of their religion. They are as stiff as pasteboard. You are afraid of coming near to them, they look as if they were always ready to bite. They go through the world as if they had to march through a small pox hospital. It is easy to see what a hard lot theirs is, to live in fearful proximity to this mass of unconverted sinners. I knew a lady of great and good qualities in many respects, who was very fond of going to funerals. How many sighs did I hear from her sitting near the coffin, until she at last whispered in the ears of the pastor: "Sir, you are here in the midst of an unconverted family!" All right, but there was a good deal of the unhealthy, annoying, conceited, in the thing. Especially newly converted persons seem to be exposed to the danger of becoming immoderately disagreeable on account of their happy change. Their religion sits on them like buckram. It is an unnatural condition. They are afraid of talking, looking, and laughing, like other Christians. You can easily account for this state, but it is a fevered thing, right skin to affectation, and if you think that a disciple of Jesus ought to be so, or that you can always be so, you are much mistaken. Take care lest by all this mannerism you fall into the error of giving satisfaction to your own self, and so glorify yourself more than the Lord. Some people think that they must always move in a cloud of pious phrases, especially where they want to leave a good impression. I am afraid that some weak-minded pastors put such notions into the heads of their hearers. It does not make anything better. I cannot help getting a little suspicious about the man who makes it a point always to deal in words of unction. It is the same when I find an individual coming on in an atmosphere of perfume, I feel as if something was not quite right. No perfume is the best perfume. I like a religion that sits as easy and close on a man as his own skin, so that he is all over sensitiveness against any thing antagonistic to his spiritual life and well-being, and at the same time all over naturalness, which performs its functions without any apparent effort.

I have no faith in the idolizing religion. It is the predilection of people of bad taste, weak understanding, morbid sentimentality and an uncommon degree of obstinacy, which means a strong will in the wrong place. Some people idolize their sect, others their creed, others their pastor, others their fathers in the faith, and some their bare denominational name. It is always done at the expense of charity, liberality and common sense. Of course every sect has a peculiar family cut, and if the members thereof prefer it to any other cut, no harm. Every creed has its history and traditions, and certainly something that makes it peculiarly valuable to those who confess it. Every pastor will have some good points, and if every congregation thinks that their pastor is the best one for them, it is the very thing we want them to think. Our Fathers in the faith we shall always keep in sacred remembrance, though never forgetting that children cannot live on the mere glory of their fathers. No objection against all this, so long as it does not make itself offensive nor stand in the way of sound progress and improvement. But the excess of it is an unmistakable sign of a corrupt religious sentiment. Some people are perfectly enamoured with their own church, creed, and religion, that they will never think it worth while to look beyond their own fence. They hate the very idea, that they could learn from outsiders, as an act of treason against their own communion. They go [illegible] with them every thing [illegible] either right or left. They walk on the edge of a ruler, high and dry, and are like horses with blinkers over their eyes. They ought to be reminded of the fact, that the better a horse is trained, the less [illegible] Some people idolize things merely because they are old and sacred by tradition, the question of their intrinsic value never occurring to them. Just as some others are full of suspicion against anything old in the Church, idolizing the modern spirit in all its ebullitions. These believe, as [illegible] had been asleep for 1800 years; the others, as if he had died some 150 years [illegible] with the funeral arrangements. Both are weak minded enough to forget that in the [illegible] about the point at issue, they ascribe a certain infallibility to their [illegible] argue with such people [illegible] you, without any provocation whatsoever, [illegible] their opinion and dictation, they will in [illegible] love that you have a clean conscience or [illegible] intentions. You handle a perculiar [illegible] solve shares in the knowledge of the faith. [illegible] interpretation of the Gospel, is the only [illegible]

Their confession alone has no flaw. Everything is settled. How happy such people are with their own sense, what a pattern such a family circle is to the whole world! They need no Pope to beatify and to canonize them. If this class is somewhat affected with fanaticism, the idolizer of the individual is more of an enthusiast. There is only one man who knows how to preach. It is not worth while to hear another. And not only to hear him, no, also to see him, how nicely he does everything; what a taste in his dress, what a grace in his movement; what an animation throughout, what a genius—a perfect charm! Nonsense all this, downright nonsense. Some people actually get drunk on their own effusions, though there is mighty little "spirit" in them. What a great thing—soberness in all things, moderation at all times!

After all, we are all weak vessels, and there is none of us who should keep his head very high, neither is there one whose religion needs no mending, or who should have faith in himself.

M. CLAUDIUS' ADVICE TO HIS SON

"Silver and gold have I none; but such as I have give I thee."

MY DEAR SON:—The time is gradually approaching when I must go the way whence no traveler returns. You cannot accompany me; and I will have to leave you in a world where good advice will not be superfluous.

No man is wise from his birth.

Time and experience are great teachers, and will purge the floor.

I have been longer in the world than you.

Not every thing, dear son, that glitters is gold.

Many a star have I seen falling from heaven, and many a staff breaking in which men trusted.

Hence, I thought it well to give you some counsel, and to tell you what I have found, and what time has taught me.

Nothing is great, except it be good; and nothing abides, except it be true.

This is not man's home; and it is not in vain that he goes about here in his working apparel. Other things around him pass away and go, they know not whither. Man is self-conscious, and is like a high, enduring wall, upon which the shadows pass. All matters at his rule move along, subject to foresight, cause and control, but he has a knowledge of himself, and bears his life in his own hands.

It is not a matter of indifference to him, whether he turns to the right or to the left.

Be not persuaded that man can advise himself, and go his own way.

This world is not sufficient for him, and the invisible things, he does not know, nor see.

Hence, spare yourself useless trouble and self affliction, and remember your own being.

Think yourself too good to do evil.

Truth will not conform itself to us, dear son, but we must conform to it.

Do not give your heart to one thing temporal. Use your eyes to see things visible, that can be seen; as regards the invisible and eternal, take God's Word for your guide.

Hold fast the religion of your ancestors, and avoid theological spinners.

Watch no one as closely as yourself. Within us there is a monitor who does not deceive, and whose voice coerces us more than the applause of the world, and the wisdom of Greece and Egypt. Resolve, my son, never to disobey his voice. Whatever your purpose and intent, always first take counsel with him. Is the outset he speaks only in whispers, and prattles like an innocent child, but if ever you suspect his innocence, his tongue is loosed, and his utterance will become more intelligible.

Be quick to learn of others. Where wisdom, human welfare, light, liberty and virtue, are discussed, be an attentive hearer. But be not too rash in giving your confidence; for not all the clouds bring rain, and there are various kinds of wise men. Some imagine that they have the thing itself, as soon as they can, and do, discourse about it. But this is not the case. It is no evidence, that a man possesses the thing, simply because he talks concerning it. Words are words, and when they are spoken so easily and pleasantly be on your guard; for the draught-horse that is hitched to a heavily loaded vehicle moves but slowly.

Expect nothing from enthusiasm and enthusiasts. When there is music and tumult in the streets, pass by.

If one would teach you wisdom, look him first in the face. If he is conceited, however learned and celebrated, stand aloof, and do not patronize him. The man that has nothing, can give nothing. He is not free, who can do what his will prompts him do; but he is free, who can will what he should do. And those are not wise who have the conceit of knowledge, but those only are truly wise, who are conscious of their ignorance, and have recovered from the malady of presumption.

A man's mind is his own, and existence is the first of all attributes.

If you love wisdom, seek it, and not your own. Subdue your own will and patiently wait for the results.

Meditate frequently on holy things, and be convinced that it will be to your advantage, and that the leaven will leaven the whole lump.

Despise not religion; for it is designed for the soul, and you cannot know what may lie concealed beneath the external images.

To despise is easy, my son; but to understand is better.

Do not presume to teach others, before you have informed yourself.

Wherever you can, espouse the cause of truth, and be willing to be hated on its account. Still, remember that your selfish interests and the cause of truth are not the same—permit them not to mix, or you will lose your reward.

Do that which is good, for yourself, and take no thought of its consequences.

Keep a single object in view, and pursue it with all your heart.

Provide for your body, but not to such a degree, as though it were your soul.

Obey magistrates and let others wrangle about them.

Be just toward all men; but be slow to commune with yourself to any.

Do not meddle in other men's affairs; but attend to your own with diligence.

Flatter no man, and be not flattered.

Honor all men according to their position, and let them take shame to themselves, if they are unworthy of it.

Owe no man anything; but be obliging to all, as though they were all your creditors.

Do not always affect magnanimity, but be always just.

Cause no man's hair to grow gray; but in the course of things you need not trouble yourself about the gray hair.

Suspect gesticulations; let your own demeanor be simple and unaffected.

Be always willing to render assistance and to give; but do not boast of it. If you are yourself destitute, keep at least at hand, a draught of cold water for the needy, and be content with this.

Do not tell everything you know, but always know what you say.

Be not a satellite of the great and wealthy. [illegible] for they are the most miserable of all creatures.

Not the would-be pious but the [illegible] always respect, and seek their fellowship. [illegible] like the sun, which shines and diffuses warmth, though it never speaks.

[illegible] which is worthy of reward, but desire no reward.

When you are in need, look to yourself, but not to others.

When I am dead, [illegible] but do not weep for me.

[illegible]

Constantly purpose something [illegible] Have an object upon which to fix your mind, that you may attain the latter and persevere. A cheerful disposition. Do not leave this world without having given public evidence of your love and reverence for the Author of our holy religion.

Your faithful father,

M. CLAUDIUS.

P. S.

THIS WORLD BOTH A DESERT, AND A HOSTILE COUNTRY.

When Israel went up out of Egypt, Jehovah, their leader, conducted them "through the wilderness, a waste land, not sown nor tilled, where there was no trace of human footsteps, and where no man dwelled." Wherever they looked, before them, behind them, around them, barrenness and desolation reigned. There was nothing in the view that opened to them, to please the eye or to cheer the heart. Little as they could have found of satisfaction in their gloomy surroundings, under the most favorable circumstances, still less of it could they now discover, after their bitter experience of enslavement and suffering in Egypt. It was not a trifling ingredient in their cup of affliction, after their deliverance from bondage, that God kept them so long in a desert place.

In a spiritual sense, this world is a desert. The eye of faith sees little that is attractive or satisfying in it. Another truly observes, "It has no natural tendency to nourish spiritual life; nothing is derived from it of that kind; though spiritual blessings are enjoyed in it, the Christian knows that they are not the product of the soil; the bread which he eats 'cometh down from above;' the perpetual exhibition and communication of that one bread is all his support." Christ is the true bread of life, of which, if a man eat, he shall hunger no more—he shall live forever.

The Christian may be cast down and discouraged, when he looks around upon the barrenness which ever meets his eye, in his earthly journeyings. Sin abounds; "The soul is sick with every day's report of wrong and outrage with which earth is filled." The kingdom of Satan stands on strong foundations. The votaries of sinful pleasure are legion. Much of the spirit of the world has crept even into the church of God. The multitude that does evil is mighty, and it has many followers, while "the ways of Zion mourn because so few come up to her solemn feasts,"—while the progress of that which is good and true, is, compared with the energy which the world exhibits, slow and tedious. May not the Christian be sad, when he beholds all this spiritual desolation—when he thinks of his own short-comings, the grievous defects of many of his brethren, the mighty current of ungodliness and wickedness without, and the giant strides of iniquity where grace ought to abound?

Ah, there is much in the desert surroundings of the pilgrim to heaven, to bow him down and to fill him with heaviness! But keep good heart, O Christian. Though the empire of Satan be mighty, it will topple in ruins ere long. Though the church be in the wilderness, she is coming up out of it, leaning on the Beloved. Lift up thine head! Zion shall be triumphant. She will lay aside her sackcloth and ashes—she will hear and obey the voice which says, "Arise and shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." The gates of hell shall not prevail against her. The kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever.

But the journey of Israel was through a hostile country, as well as through a wilderness. "They were obliged to unite the courage of the military, with the assiduity of the pilgrim's life; they had to fight, as well as travel." And so it is, and ever will be, with God's spiritual Israel. Many and mighty are the foes which stand in the Christian's way to heaven. The world, the flesh, and the devil, in unholy alliance, meet him at every step, to challenge his courage and to dispute his progress. If he would reign, he must fight—fight manfully—fight so as to win in the struggle, by the help of God. O, when he thinks of his foes—how numerous, how watchful, how determined, how malignant they are—what reason has he to droop in spirit? No wonder his hands hang down, and his knees become feeble—no wonder his heart betimes, sinks within him, and he feels like giving up all as lost. But still has he not God on his side? Has he not received assurance of victory for himself through the victory of Christ? Then, let him put into his heart and lips, what the poet utters,

"Courage my soul! while God is near
What enemy dost thou to fear?
How canst thou want a sure defence,
Whose refuge is Omnipotence?"

Is the way of our pilgrimage through a wilderness? What then? O, there is a land of Beulah yonder—not far! Is this a hostile country? What then! O, there is a friendly country beyond Jordan—and that river, it may be, flows hard by! "There remaineth a rest to the people of God." Unbelief will lose it. Faith will win it. My soul, "be thou faithful unto death, and God will give thee a crown of life."

INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIANITY ON MODERN POETRY

FROM A LECTURE BY PROF. BLACKIE.

In estimating modern poetry, the influence of Christianity, and the long march of human progress must be taken into account, in virtue of which the whole sphere of poetical feeling in modern times has been both intensified in energy and enlarged in extent; so that, while Greek poetry was more complete and more healthy in a narrow range, modern poetry, in a range infinitely wider, is more rich, more luxuriant, more enterprising and more original, more subtle and more exquisite, more complex and more comprehensive. We have our peculiar new diseases, no doubt, in the moral as in the physical world; but they are to a certain extent only the price which we pay for our higher civilization. As to Christianity, its influence, both direct and indirect, in modern poetry has been immense—direct, by giving value to the individual, and making his personal conviction a precious thing before God and man, by extending the boundaries of feeling and speculation into the region of the supersensible; in which view certain books of the most anti-Christian and even atheistic tendency must be regarded as indirect products of Christian theology. All theology, indeed, is at bottom metaphysics; so that when the mass of the people became theologians, as in Scotland, they also became thinkers. The thoughtful and metaphysical element in modern poetry, from Wordsworth to Bailey, Tennyson and Dobell, and the Brownings, is to be regarded directly as the necessary product of Christianity; and though it is by no means desirable, as already stated, that poetry shall develop itself largely in this direction, it cannot, on the other hand, be denied that this profoundly philosophic tendency has given a dignity, an ideality, and a significance to modern poetry which could have been supplied from no other source. Precisely this element it is that is lacking in the poetry of Sir Walter Scott; and the absence of which has caused many persons of [illegible] to prefer the [illegible] to Shakspeare nor Homer; and the extravagant one-sided admirers of "Manfred," "Childe," "Festus," and "Aurora Leigh," if they had the courage to speak out their real feeling, would say that the "Odyssey" or the "Lady of the Lake." But it is not merely in the region of supersensible emotion and speculation that the greater breadth and luxuriance of modern poetry is manifested. The [illegible] the narrow bounds of English nationality, so [illegible] our higher platform. In like manner Milton in England, as Dante in Italy, was a two headed Janus, looking backward with one face to all that Greek wisdom had done, and forward with the other to all that Christian love when triumphant is destined to achieve in the social regeneration of the world. Not only this; but the wider and more general culture in modern times, caused by the invention of printing, the circulation of cheap books, and the popularization of the sciences has given a command of materials to our modern poets of which no Pindar or Sophocles could have dreamt. The turn of thought in our notable modern poets, if sometimes extravagant, and even grotesque, is generally more subtle than in any ancient, the play of fancy more exquisite, the drapery of the imagination more rich and gorgeous. Altogether, notwithstanding our colossal faults, our Titanic excesses, and our unmentionable vulgarisms, we have made a great stride; and our greatest dangers at the present moment plainly arise not so much from want of steam as from want of a balance-wheel and a regulator.

THE ASTOR LIBRARY.

Everybody has heard of the Astor Library, and possibly of Dr. Cogswell, its indefatigable superintendent. It was he to whose hands the care of the Library was intrusted from the beginning, and it is to his skill, industry, and perseverance, that the Library owes its reputation. He has just completed an elaborate catalogue of its treasures, comprising four large volumes of 2110 pages. He has also made a donation to the institution of his own private collection of Bibliographical works not less than about 2000 in number. Impelled by a consciousness of increasing age, and by a desire for repose, Dr. Cogswell has just resigned his post. He will be followed into his retirement with the regrets and best wishes of all lovers of literature. He will retain his seat as a trustee, and is offered, as long as he desires it, the use of the rooms he has been accustomed to occupy. Dr. Cogswell is succeeded by the Hon. Francis Schroeder, ex-minister (some three years since) to Sweden. Mr Schroeder is a gentlemanly and obliging man in his manners, and enjoys the warm recommendation of his predecessor as eminently qualified for his position.

Since the decease of Washington Irving, William B. Astor has been President of the Board of Trustees. His princely donations of an addition equal to the original building, and of some $40,000 in books or cash, deserved this compliment. The value of the total property, the title to which is vested in the city of New York, is, according to the last report, $656,769. Since that time there have been large additions to the library; and at present, as Mr. Schroeder informed me, there are not less than 120,000 volumes on the shelves. The Trustees, in their last report, mention a fact which will be curious and interesting. The whole number of volumes consulted during the year, was 59,516; of which the largest portion were British literature, 9,992; British history, 3,649; American history, 3,481; American literature, 2,489; jurisprudence, 3,257; geography, 2,052; medicine and surgery, 2,742; theology and church history, 3,548; and encyclopedias, 4,650. It may be worth noting, that in this city founded by the Knickerbockers, only five volumes of Dutch literature appear to have been awakened from their dusty slumbers; while of heraldry there were 238, and of magic, 125!

This is one of the institutions which is and should be the pride of our country. The books are not permitted to be taken out of the building, but maybe consulted without hinderance at the tables, a written memorandum being presented to one of the assistant librarians. Mr Stranicky, an accomplished scholar and translator, is the principal librarian, and very obliging. To his politeness your correspondent is indebted for free admission to an alcove containing works in his line of studies; a privilege accorded to a few favored persons who are known as students of special branches, and not likely to abuse the privilege.

DEAN TRENCH ON OLD ENGLISH.

On a recent Thursday evening, the Dean of Westminster delivered an instructive lecture on "The English language as it would have been, but for the battle of Hastings." In opening his lecture, the Dean drew a graphic picture of the struggle for supremacy which was maintained for three centuries between the Saxon and the Norman tongues, the former at last winning the victory. This did not, however, prevent the admixture of an immense number of Romanic words, without which we could not possibly do at the present day; so that the very interesting question arose, "How, in the absence of these words, would their places have been supplied?" To illustrate this part of the subject, the learned lecturer brought forward a number of cases in which words of purely Saxon origin might have been used, had not the Romanic equivalents rendered their employment unnecessary, as for example, "sandwaste," for desert; "bloodpath," for massacre; "sinflood," for deluge; "sea-robber," for pirate; "water-fright," for hydrophobia; "show-holiness," for hypocrisy; "gold hoard," for treasure; "well-willingness," for benevolence; "undeadliness," for immortality; "untellable," for ineffable; "great-doingly," for magnificently; "sour-dough," for heaven; "unevilness," for innocence; "eye-bite," for fascinate; "ungripe," for embrace; "ear-shrift," for auricular confession; "dipper," for Baptist, &c.

GRAY'S ELEGY.

In 1845, Mr. R. C. Wrighteon of Birmingham, purchased at auction for £131, the two sheets of letter paper believed to be the poetical eye-sore containing Gray's autograph MS. of "The Elegy in a Country Church-yard." He has recently, with great liberality, placed it in the hands of the photographers, Messrs. Cundall & Downes, and the result is a perfect and beautiful fac-simile of the original, just published in London for 10s. 6d. It has peculiar interest from being the first complete draught of the poem before it received the [illegible] the author, [illegible] by the suggestions of his friends. But so carefully did Gray elaborate his ideas before committing them to paper, that the variations, though numerous, are not important. [illegible] Mason tells us that it was he who persuaded Gray to call it an "Elegy," and in the present copy it is styled "Stanzas wrote in a Country Church-yard." After the stanza common to both, ending with—

"Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

The first version proceeds

"Forever sleep, the breezy call of morn,
Or swallow twittering from his clay-built shed,
Or [illegible]
No more shall rear them to their ev'ning bed."

The current text is too well known to need repeating. It is a question whether the alteration of the first line to

"The breezy call of incense breathing morn," is an improvement to the solemn reiteration, "For ever sleep." Another change there can, however, be no question about—

"Some mute inglorious Tully here may rest,
[illegible]"

[illegible] in place of the Miltonic [illegible] the [illegible] draught also contains the beautiful stanza before the Epitaph, commencing, "There scattered oft the earliest of the year," which they afterwards omitted as requiring too long a parenthesis; and many other points of interest might be particularized.

FOUR QUESTIONS ABOUT A PAPER.

A correspondent sends us four questions about a religious paper and his answers to them, with a request to give them a prominent place in our columns. We thank him for his excellent article, and in the hope of gaining for it a more careful perusal, place it under the Editorial head. Let all "read, mark, and inwardly digest" its valuable hints.

"Do you take a religious paper? If not, you may never see this query. And yet it is possible you may see it; or if you do not, some one may tell you of it. So I repeat the inquiry, Do you take a religious paper?

"If you do not take one, you ought to do it, for your own sake and that of your family; for their and your moral and mental improvement, and spiritual good. 'A family without a religious paper, in this age of the world, is really an object of pity; a fit field for missionary labour; any well informed Christian would as much feel bound to go on a mission to such a family, to insure the weekly visits of some good religious paper, as to labour for the conversion of a Burman or Hindoo.' Such a paper will constantly be presenting the most important views of truth and duty; it will inform you as to the advancement of Christ's kingdom, and keep alive the sympathies in its progress; it will rouse your intellect, cultivate your taste, quicken prayers, suggest plans of usefulness, interest your children, keep them from pernicious reading, and aid you in a thousand ways to teach, and govern, and influence, and train them aright. By anecdote, poetry, narrative, fact, suggestion, it will become the daily monitor of the household, instructing, counselling, guiding, and thus richly blessing the entire family circle. It will be caught up at leisure intervals, and whisper many an invaluable lesson, where the elaborate treatise would not be undertaken, and the printed volume remain unopened. Next to the Bible have a good religious paper. But I have a second question.

"Do you pay for a religious paper? It is not enough that you borrow one from your friend or neighbour. In this case your reading will be desultory and interrupted; and the feeling of dependence on another, will take from you both the pleasure and profit of the perusal. Nor is it enough that you subscribe for one, while you never think of paying your subscription; for you can hardly expect to be benefited by the paper while coming short of the honesty towards those that prepare and send it—doing what you can to starve the editor, publisher, printer, paper-maker, and all who are engaged in it. You will not be likely to learn the lessons of religion from its columns, while you do not set on the lessons of justice and honour to those who would teach you the former. Pay for your paper, and you will read it with independence and good conscience, and feel that it is your own, and to encourage those who prepare it for you, I have a third question.

"Do you read a religious paper? Not a few take a religious paper, and perhaps pay for it, and yet rarely read it. Week after week, it comes loaded with its precious lessons, to their dwellings; but from indifference, or the pressure of business, or greater interest in other matters, they do not read it. It gives intelligence about missions, but they seek not the information; accounts of awakenings, but they have no interest in the narrative; urges to some duty, but they are not anxious to perform it; admonishes against error or inconsistency, but they are heedless as to the warning. As opposed to this spirit and practice, not only take, but read your religious paper. Keep it carefully and thoughtfully, seeking for some message pertinent to yourself. Look out through its pages on the vast plans and workings of Divine Providence. Look in, through its counsels and admonitions, to the recesses of your own heart. Read it, as the youthful Jeremiah Everts did the book his father gave him, so as to "read all the sense out of it." Question it as to truth, and duty, and usefulness, and growth in grace; as to the way of consistency, and the temptations to which you are exposed; as to Christian experience, and the progress of God's kingdom in the world

MEETINGS OF ANNUAL CONFERENCES

Richmond, Ind., Jan. 23d, 1862

MR. EDITOR:—Please to insert the following and keep it as a standing notice:

The Ohio Annual Conference will meet in Zanesville city, Ohio, April 16th, 1862, at 9 o'clock, A. M.

The Indiana Annual Conference will meet in Indianapolis, Ind., August 15th, 1862, at 9 o'clock, A. M

The Missouri Annual Conference will meet in Louisville, Ky., August 28th, 1862, at 9 o'clock, A M W. PAUL QUINN.

THE CELEBRATION OF REV RICHARD ALLEN'S BIRTH DAY BY OUR SABBATH SCHOOLS

We give timely warning to all of our members and friends of religious literature in our city that the Bethel Church Sabbath School celebration will come off on Tuesday night, the 18th inst.; at which time we hope to see Bethel Church filled to its utmost capacity—especially as its proceeds are to go towards aiding this glorious cause in which we are engaged for our beloved Zion.

THE CHRISTIAN RECORDER.

We still call loud for subscribers to this paper. Now is as good a time as you may ever have. We are convinced that any who have their strength and health, can pay their two dollars, and will be none the worse for it when they die, but on the other hand, will have gained much useful information, if they have perused the columns of the Christian Recorder. We say to our city subscribers, and to all others, let every one be a missionary for the Recorder, and every lady or gentleman who will get me ten cash subscribers, I will present them with a copy of a book called "The Adopted Heir," by Miss Pardoe, Authoress of the "Confessions of a Pretty Woman," of 360 pages, a new book. Now, here is a chance for a prize. We will send it by mail to any one who gets us the same number of cash subscribers out of the city. We have also on hand, copies of Frederick Douglass' great War speech, and any one sending us six penny stamps, we will forward them one by mail.

THE OLD FOLKS' CONCERT

Comes off on the 20th instant, of which we shall speak more fully at some future and timely period.

OUR PAPER

We do not wish to be considered as boasting, but we say that if we don't deserve the commendation and aid of our Church, and of our friends in general, why no one ever did. Many of our white friends in this city, and persons of other denominations, say that there are few men, white or colored, who could have shouldered and stood up under what we have done since the publication of the Christian Recorder commenced. Then, we say to our ministers and people, call your Sabbath Schools together, and do like Brother Seymour, in this city

We have received a letter from Rev. William Desmond, of Newport, R. I., stating that the time for their celebration is set. That's right, Brother Desmond—God will bless you in your effort to do good.

REVIVAL IN PHILADELPHIA.

Brick Wesley Church, the Rev. John A. Williams, minister in charge, is having a revival of religion in his church. The church was crowded to its utmost capacity the night we preached, and some appeared to be in earnest about their souls This meeting has been going on for several weeks Also, at Bethel Church, Rev. Joshua Woodlin minister in charge, has commenced a protracted effort in his church, and has been going on for a week or more. May the Spirit of high Heaven descend in copious showers, and may God's word run and be glorified, and sinners be brought to the knowledge of such as shall be saved in the great day of accounts. We also hear that there is quite a work of the Holy Ghost going on in Newark, N. J., under the ministration of Rev. J. D S. Hall. We hope that the good Lord will lead the van and save us all.

NOTICE.

To all persons who may want anything done in the job-printing line, such as Cards, Bills, Circulars, &c., and in the best manner, with all possible neatness and despatch, we would say that we are fully prepared to receive and execute their orders on as cheap and reasonable terms as can be found elsewhere. We hope that all of our friends will call and give us a trial. They may rest assured that no pains or effort on our part shall be spared to give entire satisfaction at

CORRECTION

We desire to state that the article, entitled "Exhibition of Art," which appeared in our last issue, should have been signed E M. THOMAS, instead of E. M Brown.

QUERY

What has become of our Baltimore Correspondent? Has the communication of our brother, Rev. J. P. Campbell, in relation to the Bishop, silenced, and put him to rest?

SABBATH SCHOOL CONVENTION

We have for some time [illegible] of this matter; we see more and more every day, the need of some step being taken by which the young will be better cared for. We are convinced that our ministers do not properly appreciate the importance of this subject; there is too little said, too little done by them for the advancement of our Sabbath schools. It would really seem as if we were asleep; or blind to our true interest as a church. For in consequence of this indifference of ministers, superintendents, and parents, is not our Zion languishing, and our Sabbath Schools declining? He who claims his commission from Heaven, cannot but be deeply affected as he sees this state of things. If his heart is not thus affected, if he cares not for the children of the Sabbath school, makes no effort to promote its influence, and has no appetite for the same,—we believe he is not fit for his position, and should be removed as soon as possible. The heart of our blessed Saviour was filled with love to children. Others, in their wisdom, would have had him relieved from what they deemed an annoyance. But what an example has he set to his ministers now, in reply to those who thought he had enough to do, in preaching the gospel and visiting the sick He reaches out his arms, and says, "Suffer little children to come unto ME, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of heaven. Beloved brethren, strive to be like Christ in your love for the young. Bring them into the Sabbath school, that nursery of the church, for here they will receive special pruning, training and nourishment

Another thought we would have our brethren to reflect on is, That we will soon be called away, and that the places we occupy in the church must be filled by others. What are we doing to prepare them for it? Shall they be allowed to have any just cause of complaint of negligence in the discharge of our duty towards them? Brethren, wake up to the importance of this question. Take a wide and extensive view of the church of Christ and its interests now, and in future generations. It would seem as if some brethren felt no interest in any part of the church, except the particular charge they may preside over or belong to. But we ought to remember that the church, though divided, is still one. And we ought to rejoice as much in the welfare of A, B and C's charges, as of our own. If more of this brotherly spirit characterised us, the prosperity of the church would be greatly increased Let us pray earnestly to be thoroughly roused to the consideration of this great subject; let us endeavor to shun all envy, malice and strife, and to work unitedly for the glory of God. We are glad to know that Bishop Quinn has extended a fraternal invitation to the other bishops to attend all his Conferences, and has published in the Recorder the time and place of their meeting. This looks like union. Bishop Nazrey has announced the time and place of meeting of his Conferences, which are likewise published

But, to turn to the subject of the Convention, we would recommend to the ministers, sabbath-school superintendents and teachers, that a Sabbath-School Convention, or Association, be held annually, in every Conference district, for the purpose of exchanging views in relation to the best method of conducting sabbath-schools, and to inquire into the manner in which they are at present conducted by superintendents and teachers. We are inclined to think that much benefit will be derived from such a convention. If our ministers, superintendents and teachers, should agree with the plan recommended by us, we could then publish a work for the benefit of our sabbath-schools The subject should be agitated, and constantly kept before the minds of our people, so that they might be constrained to take some definite action in the matter. Besides, in this convention, we see no good reason why Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, &c., (colored,) should not participate. We merely throw out the suggestion, and wait to hear it seconded. The columns of this paper are open to all concerned for the discussion of the whole subject.

By the way, will not all our superintendents and teachers, and those of other churches, subscribe for the Recorder? We think they should. And we hope that every minister having charge of any circuit or station where the Recorder is taken, will read this article to the sabbath-school, that some may be induced to subscribe at once, and to take an interest in the proposed Sabbath-School Conventions. The world is looking at all our movements, and discerns those who are at work for the general good of the people whom we profess to represent, and those who are not. A man or woman may possess the learning of a Webster, a Clay, a Benton, or a Beecher Stowe, but if it is not used to profit—to the general welfare of the people at large, and especially those whom he or she represents—die, and only have the name of knowing, but not of doing

WHO SHOULD LEAD CLASS?

According to Methodist economy, all Circuits and Stations are subject to the regulations of the General Conference. Well, what next? Why, it is said that the ministers who may be appointed to any charge, shall have the power or the right to appoint all leaders, and to change them whenever he thinks it proper to do so. Those who are thus appointed, may be suitable persons to lead class; but are there not others who may, with propriety, be called upon, by the elder or minister in charge, to act as leaders? There are. For instance, an elder, preacher, deacon, or exhorter, are liable to the performance of this duty. But we assert that no individual who is not one of the Church officers we have mentioned,—not even one who is a leader of any class—has this right or power vested in him, unless ordered by the elder in charge. If such a thing is countenanced, imposition is practised in the Church

HOUSE TO LET

There is a very neat three-story House to be let in Gillis Alley, between Lombard and South Streets, adjoining Little Wesley Church. Can be had for the low rent of seven dollars ($7) per month. Inquire at No. 717 Lombard Street, at the [illegible] or at No. 619 Pine Street, Philadelphia

EXCHANGES

We have just received No. 4 of volume 1, of a paper called The Weekly Christian Record, of Indianapolis, Indiana, edited by our friend, Rev Elijah Goodin. It is one of the ablest weekly papers published in that State, and is devoted to the interests of the Baptist Church. We wish it and the editor long and useful lives

The Indianapolis Journal, edited by our friend, Mr Sulgrove, has not yet come to hand. Are the clerks asleep in the office? Our friend Barns informed us that he would have it mailed to us

We find in the Press of Monday, 3d instant, an editorial on Mr F. P Blair's Bill on Confiscation and Emancipation. You say, "He is one of the few statesmen that have fairly met this perplexing question; (you say) there is no single point that could be overlooked."

"What Mr. Bingham treats as a theory, or Mr Lovejoy as a pleasant metaphor, Mr Blair deals with as a plain matter of business."

You say, "His articles afford a simple way of placing the property of rebels within the custody of the United States."

Now, it strikes us that it is just as unwise to confiscate the lands or personal property of the rebels, before you get possession of them, as it is to emancipate the slaves by a general law. But the confiscation follows the army, says the editor. But your law of confiscation precedes the army. Now, if the advancing of the army under the act can confiscate the property of rebels, it can likewise, under a similar law, emancipate the slaves; and we think it would be quite as practical to pass an Emancipation Bill for "Alabama or Mississippi" as it would to pass a Confiscation Bill for their property; either is contingent on possession of those States.

Again, you say, "No single provision in his propositions are unjust." We will examine one of your own propositions. Here are slaves constantly coming within our lines—our army advancing takes possession of their territory, and the slaves that till it. "Common sense says, Hold and use them." (All right.) " " "Humanity suggests that the fetters of bondage be lifted from their limbs." " " "We accept their freedom as an accomplished fact, and deal with them as free persons."

Now, Mr. Blair's proposition is, to take these free persons, and take them away from their homes, where you admit they have labored and toiled, and colonize them, and reduce them into a state of servitude again, under the apprentice or Coolie system. Now, where is the justice in the above, and under what article of the constitution does the gentleman intend to deprive these free men of their right to a home in the land, or of the privilege of free men, to which you acknowledge "they have been elevated?"

Again, you say, "The people who have remained in slavery from generation to generation, will not rise from their condition at any Congressional enactment"

Where is your evidence to that fact? The whole of the facts are against you Look at Port Royal, Fortress Monroe, and other places; even without such an enactment, they are ready, and in advance of our troops. Trust them with the trial, and see if they are not true to nature.

Again, you say, the government will be fortunate if it can transfer these rebel regions into bounty lands, and prevail upon the soldiers to accept them in reward for their services.

Would it not be equally just to give these poor blacks now at Port Royal their freedom, and leave them to occupy the lands left desolate by their rebel masters?

There are several other points in your editorial that need looking at, but we will pass them for the present.

And now for your five distinct questions. 1. How to collect the direct tax in disloyal States. Before you collect, you must have possession. Therefore, according to your own article, it is useless to pass a law until you get possession; but we say, pass both—Emancipation and Confiscation, and leave them both take effect as the army advances, and make the best use of the liberated slaves that you can.

On your 2d we have no fault to find—neither with the 3d.

The 4th is not feasible, as we have shown, as he does not intend to emancipate, but only transfer from one kind of slavery to another.

The 5th. We think, under the constitution, you have no right or power to colonize, without consent of the individual; and if we judge Mr. Blair's faith by his works, in the amount of $100,000, his faith in colonization is not very strong, or else he does not think by his act many will be emancipated.

No, friend FORNEY, leave the emancipation follow the army, and you will find that in doing that which is just and right, you will be sustained by all loyal men, and all true friends of the Government

INFLUENCE OF SLAVERY

We clip the following from the Christian Advocate and Journal, which may prove of interest to some of our readers. They will see that some men, for the love of applause in this life, will jump headlong into the fire:

What an awful curse is slavery to the slaveholder! How it blinds his intellect, stupifies his conscience, and lets loose his passions—more especially if he has been reared in a land of liberty. We have always spoken charitably of those slaveholders who have been raised at the South; but of those who go from the granite hills of New England to hold human arms in chains, and crack the lash over human backs, we can only say—"Lord, have mercy."

It seems that Albert Pike, of Arkansas, is the leader of a band of rebel half-breed savages against a force of loyal Indians from the five principal nations, and that, after having been defeated in two engagements, he took advantage of a period when a majority of the Union warriors were off seeking supplies, to attack their camp, and slaughter indiscriminately all who could not escape.

Why is this son of New England, this teacher of Newburyport, this poet of Boston, this writer of "Hymns to the gods" so changed? Why is he dead to the bright forms of excellence that attend the image of his country' to the pomp of sacred senates, the guardian voice of justice on her throne, and all that wakes the conscious bosom with a patriot's flame?" Why is he a traitor and a savage? He [illegible] The cases of malignant transformation are not all at the South. Slavery is not only an awful, but an all-pervading, curse

Camp Marcy, Va., Dec. 1861.

To the memory of GEORGE, who was slain with the lamented Lyon at Wilson's Creek, Mo., Aug. 10th, 1861.

Peace to his manes, for he is cold in death,
Hushed is that voice unto his mother's ear,
He fell amid the struggle, yielding his breath
To Him that gave; no mother's hand was near.

Stranger, far from her who gave him birth,
Soon bathed his head while on the battle plain;
The green turf his bed, cold pillow was the earth,
Bear him to his rest, we'll ne'er see him again.

From the bed of death the rifle was his bier,
Martial were the notes of the funeral strain
Lay him in the grave, so young and fair
None knew but to love, none to disdain.

Press lightly the earth, and cover his repose,
Place the monument to him who loved his mother dear;
Strew there the evergreen, the lily, and the rose,
Stranger, friend, as you pass, drop the silent tear

LETTER FROM BISHOP NAZREY

I left my readers at Freehold Circuit; from whence I proceeded to Newtown, where brother Seburman, with a vehicle, awaited my arrival. We rode some six miles, and lodged with a friend that night. The next morning, being the Sabbath, we met the congregation in Allentown, N. J., and preached there in the morning to a fine audience; and from thence to Bordentown, a distance of eight miles, and preached at night, and on the following Wednesday evening, I preached at Cookstown, where they have a fine little church We found a number of old friends on this route, with whom we have, in past years, spent precious moments in the service of God.

"I visited Bristol, Pa., on the 30th of December Elder Robison was then entering on a protracted meeting, at which, I have been informed, that he had considerable success. I left there with a promise to visit the other part of the circuit at some future time.

My next point was Trenton, N. J. Here I spent New Year's, and enjoyed the benefits of a Quarterly Meeting in Trenton, on the 1st, and at Lowisville the second Sabbaths in January, on the same circuit. And it is due to Elder Campbell and his flock to say that I have not passed a week or two more agreeably for some time

I visited Germantown on the 2d of February, at their Quarterly meeting. The people there have a fine little house, if they can only master their debt under which they are laboring, and get the house finished, which we have no doubt they will. So far as we have yet gone, our work seems prosperous—and may the good Lord pour his Spirit upon the entire Church on earth, until the Messiah's name shall be known throughout all lands and nations.

CHOIRS IN CHURCHES

BY REV. JAMES LYNCH, GEORGETOWN, D. C.

If there is any part of our worship which, as a general thing may be considered as a mere farce, it is choir singing. I arrive at this conclusion from experience, which comports with the experience of most all who are familiar with church worship. The farcical nature of this part of our worship, may be accounted for by the fact, that our choirs are made up generally of young persons, who are thoughtless, gay, and giddy, whose hearts have never been changed by grace There are some exceptions to this conclusion in regard to church choirs, but the exceptions are too few to relieve the Church in general, from the charge of encouraging a farcical, unmeaning, Cain-like worship.

Praise to God, to be acceptable must be voluntary: it must be real, and not ostensible. The rising vapor, though veiling the bright face of heaven, is the tribute of earth, superinduced by the genial rays of the sun; so praise to God is the heart's great tribute to Deity, superinduced by the influences of the hallowed fire of the Holy Ghost, though contrasting with its object as vastly as the dark cloud contrasts with the clear blue vault, it finds reception above, and like earth's tribute, pours a crystal stream into the heart that renders it a steady, gushing fountain of the Saviour's love.

Choirs made up of the material we have described above, do not accord voluntary praise, and is therefore not acceptable. The state of their hearts renders it impossible. But it may be said, "They sing in the choirs voluntarily, no one forces them in that position." I answer, "Singing voluntarily does not necessarily signify praising God really and voluntarily; nor is it at all certain, that even the singing is done voluntarily, doubtless the "What will people think if I don't sing in the choir?" causes a great many to raise their voices, who feel more in a mood to swear, to cry, to grieve, to mourn, or to revel in worldly mirth, Indeed, you can often go into a church, and read in the movements, in the expression of the singers, all these feelings. You will sometimes see one so ill-humored that his voice is harsh, tone sullen, as he stands in a position as much isolated as possible, singing out of a book that nobody else must look on: you will see another full of mirth, he is, perhaps, a dear lover of music, cutting as many "shines" as possible, singing with all the animal life he has; you will see others that appear to be performing a most arduous task. The lively, sprightly element, generally predominates, tinctured by the vain; this latter element is detected by the extreme quickness to take offence, as well as by the glances slyly, and often cast at the congregation, to see if they are duly observed and appreciated.

It requires far more grace to praise God, than to pray to God: the better Christians we are, the more we can praise; the more imperfect we feel, the more we feel like praying. Sometimes we come home from class or love-feast, with our souls truly blest, and we feel that instead of simply praying before retiring, we must sing a little, can't help it. Now, we would not think of allowing the persons described, to pray in public, unless they prayed for God to convert them, and we should not allow them to sing. In heaven, we will cease to pray—being perfect, we will praise. Let our choirs be judged by this standard, and they would fall far short of the mark. If guilt attaches to the minister in charge, where such a state of things exist, I, with many others would share it. But in mitigation, it may be asked, what shall we do for singing? Well I can answer this, and show how we shall get singing enough to praise God, and that is this: give sufficient opportunity and encouragement to the spirit of praise to break forth in the congregation, and then, if we have but little praise it will be because there is very little of the spirit of praise, and it is better to have a little that is genuine than to have a multitude of that is counterfeit

I am aware that the M. E Church, and the A M E Church, is far less deserving of this criticism, than the churches of other denominations, who have their singing done in almost operatic style by hired [illegible], whose only incentive to praise God is the dimes. Without unmitigated humbuggery, are all choirs that are not impelled in their religious exercises, by the Spirit of God; away with them, they are formalities that belong to former days—they are in keeping with the Romish usages, fitting emanations of the vatican, but a disgrace to a live Christian Church

Humbuggery, like the sucker in the corn, is growing up with the Church; may it be uprooted [illegible] that the Protestant Church after having reached the age of the Catholic Church at the time of the Reformation, may not be equally as corrupt as she, and need the thunder of terrific war—the lightning of Luther, of Calvin, of Zwingle, to extract from her the seed of a Church true to the glorious doctrines of the Cross

For the Christian Recorder.

TRUE RELIGION

That religion which takes away the sin of the world from our hearts, must be a religion of spirit and power [illegible] lusts, of the existence of which, correspondent actions are but the outward proof. He that has the most of this religion, is most a subject of Christ's kingdom; he has witnessed Christ by the sceptre of his Spirit, to bring thoughts, as well as words and actions, into subjection; and, where this interior reformation has taken place, all outward coercion becomes needless. A man then acts from a principle within himself, he does not refrain from immorality, merely because the laws of men forbid it, but because he dare not violate the peace of his own mind; for, certainly, a principle that does not commune at evil thoughts, will never lead any one into evil actions. It is only the will of man, unsubjected to the Divine will, that brings forth those works of death and darkness, whereby the earth, which, but for that, might have continued an Eden of peace, is turned into an Aceldama, and a wilderness of confusion!

Religious societies are like the nations of the earth, which, though distinguished from each other by their peculiar forms of government, customs, and languages, are all enlightened by the same sun; and it must be pleasing to every benevolent mind to believe that, however great the difficulty may be of maintaining an intercourse with each other, however obscured by the corruptions of human nature, blended with the absurdities, or warped by the prejudice of education, our different forms, individual sincerity of intention is everywhere noticed with merciful complacency, by the common Father of all He seeth not as man seeth; and it is mere folly to imagine that where those dispositions are wanting, superior degrees of light and knowledge will recommend us to His favor. For, as "where much is given, much will be required," such advantage, either slighted, or misapplied, can only augment our condemnation.

It is generally acknowledged by the professors of Christianity, that the common depravity of human nature has overspread the minds of universal mankind with a darkness which the Sun of righteousness alone can dispel; that some are favored with more clear and just apprehensions of the evil and its remedy, than others: and that some of these, sensible of the blessings they enjoy, have their hearts so enlarged in love to their benighted fellow mortals, as to covet their participation of it—that they also, becoming believers in the light, may have their false notions of the Divine Being, and the worship due to him corrected Yet it should not be forgotten by such devoted servants, that the light to which they bear testimony, shines independently of them; that all they can do for others, even by its assistance, is to gain their attention to it, and that none receive any farther benefit from instrumental labor, than as they are brought to believe and walk in the same light. To be convinced that the prevalence of the Spirit of Christ in the hearts of mankind will gradually overcome whatever is opposed to it; we want no other evidence than the prophecies which itself has dictated, the correspondent effects of it on minds that are subject to it; and even in societies where it has the ascendency, it invariably produces order, harmony, and concord. Such effects then, need not be referred to future ages; the work is already begun

BISHOP NAZREY AND THE B. M. E. CHURCH IN CANADA

MR. EDITOR:—Permit me, through the Recorder, to say to the readers of the same, that I have noticed some letters from Bishop Nazrey, and others, in reference to said Bishop's relation to the A. M. E Church, in the United States, and also to the B. M. E. Church, in Canada, and I think, that as the peace of our Church, and also of the B M E. Church, in Canada, has been, and is, at present, so disturbed, it would be well to let the matter lay still, until General Conference meets in Philadelphia, in 1864, and then have the question forever settled; for I think the action of our General Conference in Cincinnati, in 1856, in the case of our Church in Canada separating from our connexion in the United States, was certainly one of the worst moves that was ever taken since the formation of our beloved Zion; for well do I recollect what our venerable Bishop Quinn said, in 1856, when the subject of Canada separation came before the General Conference. Bishop Quinn said:—"My dear brethren, be careful, for you are now going to make a breach in our connexion, that forty years can never mend;" and, Oh, how true his words are coming to pass! Now you can see what a trouble is brought on the Church in Canada, by a few seceding fire eaters, both in Canada, and in the United States. Look, if you please, at old South Carolina, and those other Seceding States; they have brought upon themselves a trouble that will not soon be ended. So have a few Secessionists in Canada, brought a trouble on the Church in Canada, that will not be mended soon. I see one writer, from Trenton, says, it was a unanimous vote in favor of our separation in General Conferences, in 1856, in Cincinnati; but I beg leave to differ with the Rev Dr. from Trenton. I voted against it, and I think some members of [illegible] Conference, also voted against it,—but as far as that is concerned, they can speak for themselves. Look, now, at the state of the Church in Canada. Just as it was with the Corinthian Church. Some were for Paul, some for Apollos, and some for Cephas; and so in Canada, there are some for Green, some for Nazrey, &c. Now, in Canada, you will find a great many members have moved from the States, there, and as there is no A. M. E. Church, they have never joined the B. M. E. Church, or any other, and they never can be anything else but African Methodists; and I think, as old John Bull, and Uncle Sam's subjects have lived so long in the A. M E Church together in peace and harmony, it was a great pity that the separation ever took place

Yours, for the prosperity of our blessed connexion, W J DAVIS.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF OUR AUTHORIZED VERSION

The theologian who shall produce a good INTERNAL HISTORY OF OUR AUTHORIZED ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES will perform a work of the highest utility. We have from various hands histories which are mainly occupied with its external history, and of the various labors which preceded it. But we have nothing which can be properly styled an internal history of that noble, and in some respects, entirely unrivalled version. We are not sure, indeed, that the term internal history, will present to every mind, an intelligible idea.

To convey perfectly its meaning, it may be necessary to recall some facts in the history of that version. Between the appearance of the first Protestant translation of the New Testament from the original, and our own authorized version, there lies an interval of eighty-six years. During this period the learning of English scholars, and the interest of the English people, were directed with great intensity to the Word of God. The latest, not the earliest result of this learning and longing, was our authorized version The translation which is at this time in the hands of the German churches, was one of the first fruits of the Reformation, and came from the hand of Luther, substantially as we now have it. Several revisions of it were, indeed, made, and great labor bestowed upon it subsequent to its first appearance, and various changes, less and greater, have been made in it; nor has it remained since Luther's death absolutely as he left it. Nevertheless he who takes up the New Testament of Luther as it appeared in 1523, or the other parts of Holy Writ previous to their union in 1534, and compares them with the current editions of to-day, will feel that their identity has not been lost If Luther could not everywhere recognise his own Church in our day, he could everywhere recognise his own Bible. If it is in some few respects another, it is in most still the same. In England it was not so. Distinct translations were made, not indeed in any case, without constant regard to what had preceded them, yet with an independence, which gives them a decided individualism. They are different translations. The most convenient classification of these for internal collation is, perhaps the following:

A Tindale's translations (1526—1534)

A 1. Tindale's New Testament of 1526.

A 2. Tindale's New Testament of 1534

A 3. The New Testament and part of the Old, in the Matthews' or Rogers' Bible, printed 1537.

B. The Coverdale Bible, the first complete one in English, 1535.

C. The Great, or Cromwell, or Grafton, or Whitchurch, or Cranmer Bible.

C 1 The Great Bible printed by direction of Cromwell by Grafton, in 1539, sometimes called the First Cranmer.

C 2 Whitchurch, or Great Bible revised, now usually considered the first which can be in the fullest sense called the Cranmer Bible, (1541)

D. The Geneva Bible.

D 1 The Geneva New Testament of 1557.

D 2. The Geneva Bible of 1560.

D 3. The Tomson Geneva. The New Testament, (with some changes,) 1576.

E. The Bishops' Bible. (1568)

F. The Authorized, or Royal, or King James' Version, 1611

Now, from the first of these to the last, there is a regular growth. From the last of them back to the first, there was a careful weighing of the work which had been done before; and the translators in general made no change in the previous translation, unless the sacred original, in their judgment, rendered such a change imperative. Hence, there is a beautiful and profoundly interesting evolution and development, from era to era, from one laborer to another, until the consummation was reached in our Authorized Version. And this happy reference to what had gone before it, this wise acquiescence in what had been well done, served to give to our standard version advantages over the versions it followed.

This served also to give to its internal history an extraordinary richness. That history is the history of a whole century of struggle and of Reformation.

IS THERE NEED OF A NEW TRANSLATION OF THE SCRIPTURES INTO ENGLISH?

Much has been written in regard to the desirableness of a revision of our English Bible, or of an entirely new translation. The Baptists in our country have met this question in the only form in which any practical determination of it can be made. In the face of a good deal of discouragement and of some obloquy, they have been bestowing great labor and large sums of money on a new version of the Bible. They have tried to make thorough work, not only conforming the English translation to what they believe to be the meaning of the sacred text on the points in dispute between them and other Christians, but endeavoring to give a translation of every part of God's Word in accordance with the ripest results of modern scholarship. We have looked with great interest at some of the volumes they have issued, and if they were within our reach, would like carefully to examine them all. We do not design to express at this time any opinion as to the extent to which their labors have been successful. Be that as it may, they are testing the question of a new version in the only way in which it is worth arguing. The right of our Authorized Version to its present position is simply a moral right. It stands or falls with its ability actually to challenge comparison with any other English version With us the Regal Imprimatur which gave it authority, has no force. But that imprimatur simply implied that it should be read in churches Before 1611, though the Bishops' Bible was read in the churches, the Geneva was the favorite in the family. The king did not attempt, and if he had attempted, would have failed to displace the versions which were preferred by the people for their private devotions. Nevertheless, our present version gradually displaced them all.

In no case that we can recall, in the sixteenth century, was there an abstract discussion of the necessity of a new version previous to the actual preparation for such a version. Luther, and Tindale, Coverdale, Cranmer, the Genevans, the Bishops, and the King James' Commission, if they had anything to say on the point, said it in the preface of the work actually done. There never has been, and never will be a translation of the Bible in which some improvement is not possible. Why [illegible] ready to make the improvement and submit it to the test? Our Authorized Version superseded the others mainly because of its intrinsic superiority over them. In its time it will certainly be superseded if any man, or any set of men, succeeds in producing a translation superior to it. The time, therefore, that is spent upon a purely abstract discussion of the question, "Whether we need a new English Version of the Bible?" seems to us lost time It is useless to show that we need it, unless there is a possibility of our having it, and the only argument for a new version which will carry the Christian mind with it, will be the new version itself Place before the Christian world a better version than the one we now have, and that version will displace it as surely as our Authorized Version [illegible] displaced the Bible of Geneva, or as they displaced the Cranmer, or as the Cranmer displaced the labors of Tindale and [illegible]

When, therefore, an enthusiastic gentleman or an enthusiastic association proposes to argue the question of the need of a better version, we are prepared, for argument's sake, to say, 'We grant it—now let us have one.' No plea for a better one will make the thorough work with objectors that the better one itself will make [illegible] another for his want of a talent you [illegible] may have others which you want.

NOTES ON AUTHORS AND BOOKS

MEDITATIONS ON THE NIGHT OF A LITERARY [illegible]

"What a world of thought is here packed up together! I know not whether [illegible] more dismay or comfort me. It dismays me to think that here is so much that I cannot know; it comforts me to think that this variety affords so much assistance to know what I should

What a happiness is it, that without the aid of necromancy, I can here call up any of the ancient worthies of learning, whether human or divine, and confer with them upon all my doubts; that I can at pleasure summon whole synods of reverend fathers and acute doctors from all the coasts of the earth, to give their well studied judgments in all doubtful points which I propose Nor can I cast my eye casually upon any of these silent masters, but I must learn somewhat. It is a wantonness to complain of choice. No law binds us to read all; but the more we can take in and digest, the greater will be our improvement.

"Blessed be God, who hath set up so many clear lamps in his church; none but the wilfully blind can plead darkness. And blessed be the memory of those, his faithful servants, who have left their blood, their spirits, their lives in these precious papers; and have willingly wasted themselves into these enduring monuments to give light to others." Bishop Hall.

"Very excellent meditations," methinks I hear my reader say, "and if I had such a library to 'meditate' in, I should be glad to join with the good bishop; but my 'library' hardly deserves the name, and the selection is none of the best." This I can readily believe. It is marvellous how few dollars it takes to constitute extravagance, when spent for books, and how many dollars are within the limits of moderation, when bestowed upon furniture or apparel Many a poor husband is expected to admire and approve of fifty dollars' worth in the wife's parlor, or wardrobe, who is at his wit's end to know how to escape a homily, by smuggling half that amount of books into his "study!" An old bookseller assured us, that all of his customers were held in terror by this bibliophobia [illegible] the female part of the household. Mr [illegible], he remarked, would [illegible] the other day, 'send those books home at such an hour in the afternoon, then I shall be in.' Ah, thought I, have you come to that too! When he said he would be [illegible] he meant the wife would be 'in.' Whether the wives must answer for it in all cases, we will not decide, but certain it is, that in very few houses in Philadelphia can be found respectable collections of books. One of the most eminent of Philadelphia physicians, who was often obliged to sit up all night in attendance upon the sick, complained of the difficulty of finding any books worth reading, in some of the handsomest mansions in which his services were employed. Is not this too true? How meagre an assortment of reading will you generally find in the parlors, or "studies," (as they are villanously styled,) of even the intellectual portion of your acquaintance! A few novels, three or four of Sears's "Illustrated Histories," Miss Leslie's Stories, Hemans's, Sigourney's, Scott's, and Willis's Poems, Headley's Generals and Marshals, Irving's Washington and the Sketch Book, Kane's Explorations, two or three dozen books of Recipes, Domestic Medicine and Travels, a dozen of volumes of old American reprints of standard English authors, (which your father or grandfather was bored into subscribing for,) and thirty or forty books of religion and devotion, and you have something very like a catalogue of such "Libraries."

You say, "If books we are to read," according to your advice, "books we must have, and how are we to procure them?" There are several ways. If unable to purchase for yourselves, the first plan that occurs is "begging," and this mode may be very properly practised by the younger members of the household:—it is to be hoped that your parents will be pleased with your zeal, and "devise liberal things" for your intellectual improvement.

"Borrowing" is available where your friends have a larger stock of books than of experiences of the felicities of lending; but some good-natured people still lend on; though Charles Lamb declared he would lend nobody "less than a whole set," as the broken array of odd volumes in his bookcases distressed him. The final alternative, the dernier resort sometimes practised by those who cannot satisfy their wants either by "begging" or "borrowing," even our lively zeal for your mental culture will not allow us to recommend. We have ourselves suffered from the unsolicited abstractions of those who loved books, or their proceeds, "not wisely, but too well." Of such was the unhappy Eugene Aram.

Begin at once to form a library, and manage to let your friends know of your laudable intention, and you will probably find it growing on your hands more rapidly than you could have hoped. Some will be glad to oblige you or your parents by adding to your store. Let it be well understood, that you estimate the inside more highly than the outside of your volumes. Then, on festal occasions, and in times of bestowal, you may look for books of solid value, rather than the embellishments of binding and pictures, such as accompany the Annual, the Drawing Room Scrap Book, the Gallery of Beauty, and other more show books, not entirely worthless, to those who can afford them, articles of luxury, but of little account in the eyes of those who desire to "add to their" heads knowledge, rather than to adorn a centre-table, or ornament a boudoir.

TO THE PUBLISHERS OF RELIGIOUS JOURNALS.

The undersigned would be glad to receive any number of the different religious papers, or other good reading matter, for gratuitous circulation among the soldiers of the 1st Regiment of the "Kentucky Brigade," Illinois Volunteers, now in Camp Dubois, Anna, Union County, Ills.

A great many are members of the different churches, and nothing can be productive of greater good among them, than the reading of a wholesome religious literature.

A singular but important WANT abroad has just been brought to light in a work on Emigration by a Miss Rye. From the latest reliable statistical tables it is ascertained that in New Zealand there are eleven thousand four hundred and sixty-one fewer women than men; in Victoria, one hundred and thirty-eight thousand five hundred and seventy-nine; in South Australia, one thousand three hundred and eighty-nine; in West Australia, four thousand two hundred and seven—or a total of one hundred and fifty-five thousand one hundred and thirty-six in these two islands. In this state of things it is urged that if intelligent, virtuous, energetic women could be induced to emigrate to these important sections of the world, many of the best interests of the race might be vastly promoted, and good done.

A remarkable career in political life has just been terminated in the death of Mr. George Granville Vernon Harcourt, England. In the year 1806 he was elected a member of the House of Commons from Lichfield, and was re-elected from that borough until 1831, when he was elected from Oxfordshire, and was thence regularly returned until his death—making his membership in Parliament continue thus for the long period of fifty-five years, when he died, seventy six years of age. He was the eldest son of Archbishop Harcourt, who held the See of York for nearly forty years, commencing January, 1808. He [illegible]

Much is doing in favor of the TEMPERANCE Reform in England. Bands of what are termed Leagues of Juvenile Abstainers are forming in various places, and ministers and public men are speaking against the evil of intemperance, who have never until recently taken sides on the subject. At Leeds, a festival was recently held for Reformed Drunkards, and upwards of one thousand four hundred persons sat [illegible] and by much effective speaking on behalf of the great cause.

PITTSBURGH

[illegible] the excess to which our people have devoted themselves [illegible]

[illegible] thing to hear the remark that in no other city had [illegible] ing the side-walks. But this feeling gave place to [illegible] manufacturing and commercial wealth, he would desire to see some of the monuments of public taste, and repositories of learning and of art, which are equally essential to the character of a city with the former. The only thing left us by which to vindicate our character from the charge of selfish materialism would be to point him to the array of churches which almost every street presents, and many of which would attract attention in any locality; and then to guide his steps through the beautiful avenues of the Allegheny Cemetery, whose circuit embraces one of the most extended and tastefully improved burying spots in our land. Materialism has not thus literally provide for the public worship of the Almighty, nor does its influence secure the time and means thus requisite to honor the resting place of the departed.

Notwithstanding our foundries and rolling mills have effectually supplied the deficiency of a National Foundry in the equipment of the Mortar Fleets, east and west, with their armaments, sending forth huge guns and their appropriate missiles of destruction to almost every fortress or expedition which has been equipped by our Government since the rebellion has commenced, and although the ponderous hammers which forge the huge plates to encase our iron-clad vessels seem to jar the very foundations of the mighty hills which surround us, these extraordinary demands upon our industry have not compensated for the loss experienced in the breaking up of the extensive [illegible] into South and West formerly open for coal, iron, glass, &c., and supplied by this city. One effect produced has been a manifest relaxing of the habits and hours of business. Many of the iron-muscled men of our population impatient at the [illegible] desolation which has threatened them, have exchanged the implements of the artisan for the weapons of the soldier, and have gone to the field of strife to deal their sturdy blows upon the rebels arrayed against their country. Another result has been to stimulate the desire for reading. Our Mercantile Library and Reading Room has never before been so much resorted to, and whilst information is chiefly sought respecting governmental and military movements, we are inclined to believe the contact with literature in any form is calculated to engage the mind and win it forward to the expansive and inviting fields spread out to the reader of English literature, which is attainable to all. We, therefore, estimate as one of the compensations of the evil of this war, the improved taste and mental culture which will be made by many of our citizens.

We hope their religious culture will equally advance. You will observe we adopt a less confident tone in expressing ourselves on this topic. Probably we are to susceptible to depressing influences. We have watched with much solicitude in this direction. We said to ourselves, Surely, amidst the earnestness of spirit which these trials shall beget, the Christian will not prove more sluggish than others in his sphere of duty. He will arise invigorated by sympathy with the spirit of the land, and fight more valiantly for that more blessed peace which comprehends the restoration of national and social quietude within its accomplishment. He will now devote some of the hours which he cannot spend in temporal interests to forwarding the spiritual interests of himself and others—but alas! the lecture-rooms of our churches, compared with those of literary associations, testify as formerly, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light."

Our city is rapidly acquiring a notoriety as the emporium of Petroleum or Carbon Oil,—so extensive with that of New Bedford for its whale fisheries. Our wharves are covered with barrels of crude oil, arriving from the wells which abound in this section of the State; and refined oil, which, after distillation is distributed to the four quarters of the globe. The very atmosphere in many parts of the city is redolent with its odors. So prolific are the wells which supply it, some of which are actually overflowing fountains, that the surface of the Allegheny river is scummed over, to a considerable extent, with an oleaginous stratum. Its position on the water prevents it from polluting our hydrants, but seriously interferes with our ice-houses. It is generally believed that the prevalence of the oil will prevent our using any longer the product of this river, which has hitherto furnished our entire supply of a very pure and inexpensive article of luxury. As neither the flavor nor the odor which it imparts is very delectable, we shall be compelled to either acquire a taste for it, after the fashion of the devotees of tobacco, or seek more distant and expensive sources for our supply. Truth is stronger than fiction. Many Dick is shorn of his honors. KIRKPATRICK.

[Correspondence of Lutheran and Missionary

The English Press on American Affairs.—Exception of the Rebel Commissioners.—From the London News, Jan. 14.—The impudence of sending commissioners to us at all is remarkable; and the audacity of appointing Mr. Mason is really astounding. It was bad enough sending Mr. Yancey, after the publication of what he said and wrote in the conventions of the slave States; it was a strong demand on our liberality and courtesy to send here as envoy a man who had publicly eulogised slavery as the proper basis of society, and demanded the re-opening of the African slave trade; and Mr. Yancey's doubtful reception at a public dinner where his presence was by no means desired, might show the Confederate authorities that it would be well not to encroach too far on the instincts of our hospitality. But to send Mr. Mason is a yet more daring proceeding. They must have supposed that we either did or did not know that Mr. Mason is the author of the worst law that is on the statute book of any civilised nation—the fugitive slave law. If we did not know it, it was taking advantage of our ignorance to seek our friendship and good offices through such an agent; and, if we did know it, it was an insult to English feelings to place that man, face to face, with us at all. The worst consequence to us of Captain Wilkes' troublesome escapade is its having compelled us to act as protectors to the man who has traduced our state of society, cast contempt on the working class of every country, declared us incapable of freedom because we give and take the rights of industry through the whole range of our society, and created the machinery of law by which 20,000,000 of free citizens were made the kidnappers of the slaves of half a million; by which the brave and strong negroes who had escaped were delivered back to the whip and chain, and the passions of their tyrants. When these elect gentlemen, sent to represent Southern society here, appear among us, we must make sure that everybody knows how they regard themselves and us. They think it low to work, or to pay others for working for them. They think that political freedom means a very few persons doing what they please with all the rest of society. They think it is a low state of civilisation when members of society enjoy, as nearly as may be, the benefits they earn by intelligence or toil; and they extol, as the highest refinement, the scheme by which the smallest number take possession of the largest share of the earnings of others. Old England and New England are alike in a vulgar and pitiable condition, because every man is theoretically a worker, or the payer of other men's work, and because every individual has an interest in the common weal; yet, the superfine gentry who so regard Old and New England are trying to gain over the one against the other by soft words and sordid inducements, and these men are the agents sent to rouse our minds against our free kindred of the Northern States, and to soothe our selfish fears about cotton. Let them pass on one side. We have simply nothing to say to them. Let them pass in their way to the [illegible] of [illegible] neglect.

The Morning Herald comes to the rescue of Slidell and Mason, and denounces the journals which have calumniated them. It says they are gentlemen of the highest position, and the most unblemished character, and as to their being slave owners, why, Washington himself was one, and some of England's best friends are slaveholders. It claims that "Mason and Slidell are entitled to be received in England with courtesy and honor, as men of the highest distinction themselves, and as the representatives of a gallant, chivalrous, and friendly nation."

The Late War Panic and the Press.—From the London Star.—The people and the press of the United States deserve the highest credit for their demeanor during this trying crisis. With the exception of one journal, which really may be taken as an exception when praise of any kind is spoken, the newspapers of the United States evinced throughout this dispute a calmness and a moderation as honorable to them as rebuking to some of their British contemporaries. Only those who were [illegible] journals during the late period can form any true idea of the manner in which it contrasted with the temper and language of two, at least, of the principal [illegible] to learn what extent of brutal bullying may be tolerated and encouraged in a moment of national passion, can do nothing better than to read over, in a calm moment, the leading columns of the Times and the Morning Post for the past three or four [illegible] of the manner in which, day after day, the [illegible] slandering, taunting [illegible] and the people of the [illegible] go more foul and bitter [illegible] by either journal if the [illegible] is confirmed, and it is rumored that Jeff Davis will, in person, take command at Manassas after his inauguration.

One of the letters found in Zollicoffer's den, written by [illegible] says: "The Union party in East Tennessee is quiet at this time, and some think forever crushed, but I am of a different opinion. We have large numbers of Lincolnites among us yet, who are only awaiting a safe opportunity to join their Northern friends."

U. S. Commissioners.—Bishop Ames, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and Hon. Hamilton [illegible] the United States prisoners in rebeldom, left the city at 11 o'clock. They proceeded to Richmond, via Fortress Monroe and Norfolk, and they have been furnished with appropriate passes, stating the object of their mission.

The Rebel Pirates to be Treated as Prisoners of War.—Hon. Alfred Ely, Member of Congress from New York, and late prisoner at Richmond, had an interview with the President and Mr. Secretary Seward, yesterday, and it has been determined to place the rebel privateers now in New York and Philadelphia, upon a footing of prisoners of war. An order has been issued removing them to military prisons, with a view to their exchange for citizens of the United States incarcerated in the South. This important and humane course on the part of the Government may result in the return of Colonels [illegible], Lieut. Worden, [illegible] Hudson, and the other officers held as hostages for these privateers. A general exchange of prisoners will, it is believed, speedily follow. The interview with Mr. Ely, in conjunction with several of his associate members of the House of Representatives, was not only interesting, but is described as affecting.

Hon. J. K. Moorehead.—No member of the Pennsylvania delegation in Congress dispenses a more liberal and [illegible] hospitality than the distinguished Representative from Pittsburg. His large wealth, accumulated by years of industry and enterprise, is employed for the noblest purposes. He was serenaded at his residence, on Sixth street near E, last Wednesday evening, by the band of the Sixty-second Penna. Regiment, which by the vote of all the officers, was christened the "Moorehead Regiment," on the first of the New Year.

Romney.—The expedition of General Jackson to Romney is said to have been without the sanction of his superior officers, and has resulted in great sufferings and loss of life to his command. They were caught in the mountains in a heavy snow storm, many were frozen to death, others frost-bitten, and all are reported to be in a deplorable condition. A greater portion of his force had returned to Winchester broken down with the exposure, fatigue, and hardships they had been called upon to endure. The withdrawal of the Federal forces from Romney on Jackson's approach is regarded in military circles at Richmond, as having been another evidence of General McClellan's military superiority.

Release of Privateers.—The Secretary of State, on Friday, directed the release from Fort Lafayette of all the persons taken from on board the rebel armed vessels, and they have been sent to Fort Warren to be dealt with as prisoners of war.

Cephalic Pills
CURE
Sick Headache
Nervous Headache
All kinds of Headache.

By the use of these Pills the periodic attacks of Nervous or Sick Headache [illegible] are prevented, and when the system has once been thoroughly regulated by their use, but few doses will be required.

They seldom fail in removing the Nausea and Headache to which females are so subject.

They act so gently upon the bowels—removing Costiveness. For Literary Men, Students, Delicate Females, and all persons of sedentary habits they are valuable as a Laxative, improving the appetite, give tone and vigor to the digestive organs, and restoring the natural elasticity and strength of the whole system.

The CEPHALIC PILLS are the result of long investigation and carefully conducted experiments, having been in use many years, during which time they have prevented and relieved a vast amount of suffering from Headache, whether originating in the nervous system or from a deranged state of the stomach.

They are entirely vegetable in their composition, and may be taken at all times with perfect safety without making any change of diet, and the absence of any disagreeable taste renders it easy to administer them to children.

A CHILD'S MORNING THOUGHTS

The Lord has kept me all the night,
And let me see the morning light
[illegible]
Who thought I see the morning bright

To me he hath given pleasant sleep,
While others wanted it, watch and weep,
And while they toss on beds of pain,
I rise to joy and health again.

Kind friends all here around me move
To make me happy with their love;
While others [illegible]
Last night, to dear ones cannot [illegible]

In far off lands, on heathen shores,
This morn the child his offering pours
To gods of wood and stone; while I
Am taught to pray to God most high

They never heard how Jesus gave
His life a dying world to save;
[illegible]
That guides to happiness and heaven

The Lord has crowned my life with good,
With home and friends, and [illegible]
While at my work, and at my play,
I'll try to please the Lord to-day

THE YOUNG HIGHWAYMAN

Just in sight of my youthful home, in a country beyond the broad Atlantic, stood a beautiful mansion, once owned and occupied by an aristocratic and wealthy family, consisting of husband and wife, and an only son, their hope and joy. No doubt their fancy painted for him a bright future, and a high place among the gay and fashionable of his day. (It may be noted here, that God was not honored in this family. They were rich, and considered moral people.) When about the age of twelve years, God was pleased to lay his afflicting hand upon this darling son, and he was prostrated upon a bed of sickness. Every day his case became more alarming; and, finally, the physician pronounced it hopeless: he must die. The mother on hearing the sad and alarming intelligence, did not say, "Good is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good." No; but she burst out into a fit of passion, saying, in substance, God cannot, and he will not take from me my darling child: he must not die, and such like expressions.

Several anxious days and sleepless nights followed. At length the child showed symptoms of recovery; and he did recover, contrary to the opinion of the most skilful physicians, as well as of all who saw him. Years roll on. At length he arrives at the years of manhood. He is what the world would call, a clever, dashing young man, with plenty of money, and free in spending it. He soon had plenty of friends among the gay, the thoughtless, and the wicked. About this time, (for it is many, many years ago,) there was a regularly organised band of highwaymen and robbers, extending from one end of the land to the other, the fear and dread of every traveller. Sometimes the members of this band assumed the dress and appearance of the wealthy, and sometimes the rags of the beggar, just as circumstances seemed to dictate. At last this young man made the acquaintance of some of the members of this band. They opened to him their secret, painted to him, in glowing colors, their life of revelry and daring exploits. He is pleased and delighted, and resolves to become a member of the band at once. He forsakes his home of plenty and of luxury, his kind father and mother who so fondly loved him; but from his hiding place he kept up regular communication with home, by means of letters. His parents, almost distracted at the thought of their darling boy being a highwayman—a robber, beg him to return, and they will pardon him. They offer him a large sum of money as a daily allowance, the best horse or horses the country could afford, to ride or drive; in short, any thing that money could procure, if he would but return. But he obstinately refused, preferring the life of the highwayman. But a short time had elapsed when the country was shocked with the news of the horrible murder of a traveller for the sake of his money. All the detectives, and officers of the law, were employed to seek out the perpetrators, and their efforts were soon crowned with success. The guilty parties were found, and among them this young man. He is safely lodged in a prison till the day of trial. The day arrives; the jury are impannelled; the judge on the bench; the case is tried, and he with his companions found guilty, and the penalty was death. So that mother who could not give her son to God who gave him, had the unspeakable shame and sorrow of seeing him die on the gallows. This, my young friends, was the awful end of that young man, who slighted a parent's love, disregarded the voice of warning and entreaty, choosing a life of sin and shame.

And now, my young reader, whoever you may be, learn from this sad story, that obedience is your duty, and the only path of safety. And whatever be your station or occupation in life, acknowledge the Lord therein, and he will direct your steps. Thus you shall prosper, and be happy and honorable in life, and at last, that child whom you humbly serve will reward you with everlasting life and glory in heaven.

Parents, is there not a warning to you also in this sad, but true story? G.

JOSIAH.

This good man was king of Judah. He came to the throne at the age of eight years. His father Amon was a bad man. By his example idolatry and wickedness were greatly increased in the land. But Josiah did not follow his example. He was a pious and virtuous boy. In his sixteenth year we find him forming plans to reform the people, and to have them worship the living and true God. At the age of twenty he began to carry his plans into effect. His first step was to destroy the worship of idols in Jerusalem. Then he sought to break down the altars and idols which were set up in other parts of the land.

During the reign of his father the temple service had been neglected. Hence, Josiah, in his twenty-sixth year, employed men to repair the temple, that the pure worship of God might be restored. While this work was going on, the book of the law which had been hid in the temple was found. By this book he determined to be guided in all his work of reformation.

But the Israelites were so much in love with sin, that they resisted his plans of doing good. They would not hearken to his voice. They grew worse and worse, till God in anger visited them with great calamities. Josiah himself was killed at Megiddo, in the thirty-ninth year of his age, and many mourned for him with a great lamentation.

Now if any little boy, whose father is not pious, reads this story, I hope he will strive to be like the good Josiah. Seek to be pious in childhood. Avoid evil wherever you see it. Do all the good you can to others. Ask them to come with you to the Sabbath School, and to the house of God. Then he will reward you. He may not make you a ruler in a great country; but he will make you a king in heaven. He will give you a crown that will never fade. You will not be slain as Josiah was, but will live for ever, where there is no more pain nor death. JOHN.

HONOR THE AGED

See that old man. He was once a babe, a boy, a young man, a man in the prime of life. He has lived through many a winter's storm, and many a sultry summer's heat. He has toiled and watched; he has laughed and wept; he has made friends and parted with them. How often, dear children, has he stood beside the death-bed of some loved one. In his youth he parted from joyous companions, in his prime he laid the loved ones down to rest in the cold and silent tomb. O, children, if you saw the amount of his joys and sorrows, his plans and purposes, and the labors he has undergone, it would present to your eye a strange and curious sight.

Then, honor the hoary head, when you think what trials and toils have bleached those white hairs. Honor the face of the old man, when you consider that every line of his shrunk and furrowed countenance may be said to have its history,

[illegible] of the [illegible] that [illegible]
[illegible] a school where lessons can be taught only by time. "Multitude of days" has given him wisdom.

THE WONDERFUL INKSTAND

"This was a long and difficult piece of work," said Edward Muller, the copyist, as he folded up nearly thirty full sheets of manuscript. "It has taken me many hours, and I have written as neatly as I could: so I hope the government Secretary will pay me well for it. I ought to have at least four dollars for my labor. But he lives near our house, and I will soon find out my remuneration."

"Oh," replied Gertrude, his wife, "I do hope he will pay you better than he has been doing. You know it is very hard for us to get along, though [illegible] we have [illegible] to support."

"Take courage, my dear wife, we have never missed a single meal, and you and I are well provided with clothing for the winter. The wages I shall get for this piece of copying will, no doubt, be enough to buy a cord of wood and half a gallon [illegible]. And we don't owe a penny to any person. Really we have no reason to complain, many people are much worse off than we are."

So saying, Edward made ready to call with his manuscript at the house of the Secretary. As he took down his hat he saw the thumb worn out of his favorite author, Thomas a Kempis, and opening at one of the best chapters, he placed it upon his wife's lap, that she might read it in his absence. These were the first words her eyes fell upon: "There are many people who are impatient and vexed if matters do not occur according to their wish. It is not always in our power to make our way smooth; it is God's to give when he will, to whom he will, and as much as he will—and no more."

Gertrude was much encouraged, and a new light seemed to have sprung up in her soul. She could read no more; it was enough to think about that day that one human being have no right to meddle with God's business.

Edward had not gone two blocks before he met a messenger with a large letter addressed to him. The charge on it was a dollar, and he paid it though he had but twenty-seven cents left. Important news was there for that poor man's benefit. His rich uncle, who lived in Prague, was dead. He had started himself to amass wealth, and had no nearer relative than Edward Muller, and leaving no will, the poor copyist fell heir to all his estate. He was notified to come to Prague with in a week, and take possession of the inheritance.

"A rich man! A rich man! these are very strange words for me to utter of myself. But what shall I do with this writing that I have been commissioned to do? I will go and take it to Secretary Shuts, as he appointed the time for me to call. I would prefer to go home first, and tell Gertrude about our unexpected fortune; but then I would be later with my business than I promised. Duty first and pleasure afterwards."

When he reached the Secretary's house, a distressing scene presented itself. There lay the secretary dead and cold, and his little girl of three years old, was playing on the floor. The weeping widow was almost bewildered with grief, and the city magistrates were there to take possession of what property was left, in view of the ten thousand dollars which, they said, the deceased secretary had defrauded from the Government. In vain did the disconsolate Madame Shuts declare her husband's innocence; in vain did she point them to that child which must not only be impoverished, but disgraced by such a heinous charge.

Edward saw her distress and extremity, and he thanked God he could assist her. So he gave his bond on the spot for the entire sum, and the officers departed. He was to pay the deficit just thirty days hence.

"May God bless you! may God bless you!" exclaimed the widow, when she witnessed his noble generosity. "The time will come when my dear husband's innocence will be proved, and the money shall be returned."

Both the officers and Madame Shuts were astonished that poor Edward Muller could give his bond for the smallest sum of money. Everybody knew how indigent he was, and that he could barely do enough copying to support his wife. Still nothing was said, but he had ground for his beneficence. It was the happiest day of his life, when he found it in his power to do a good act toward a suffering fellow-being. May all who read this narrative have as kind a heart as he had!

Why should I speak of the joy he felt in telling his good fortune to Gertrude when he returned to his humble home? That can be imagined perhaps, but my pen has no power to describe it. When the pleasure had quieted down a little, and Gertrude herself had thanked God for providing for them so bountifully, the great question to be settled was, "How should Edward get money to pay his expenses to Prague, whether he must go to take possession of his great wealth?"

To borrow—that was a hard word for them to say. But it must be done; yes, thirty dollars must be borrowed. It was easily raised, for there was not a man in the whole city who would not trust Edward Muller for any amount of money. At the end of three days, he found himself in the Blue Star Hotel, at Prague. Having rested and taken some refreshments, he commenced the search for his uncle's dwelling. Several hours passed by before he could find it. At last he discovered it in a very dirty and obscure alley. The door was ajar and nobody in the house. Truly it did not look like a rich man's home, but I have intimated that its owner was a miser, and that explains all. Every article of the homely, broken furniture was covered with thick dirt. I do not think the floor had been swept for a year. Loose papers and old rags were scattered about everywhere. But not a sign of money could be found, save a few coppers in the pocket of an old vest. Every corner was searched, and nothing was visible that was worth taking away. Four days did Edward continue the search and finally he had to give up his task without success. The last day he was there, a neighbor called in and told him that his uncle sold all his houses and lands the previous year, and having put the money for them in a large chest, he set out for Egypt; he only returned the other day, and the lover was on him of which he died; he brought nothing back with him except those old rags and papers you see scattered about. That was melancholy news for Edward, but it was vain for him to remain longer. No one can tell how heavy his heart was, when he went home again and had to tell Gertrude that all their hopes were blighted.

"And did you bring nothing from your uncle's house?" she asked in a tone of sadness.

"Nothing, save this inkstand, though it is hardly worth its weight in oak leaves. I thought I would bring it because a little memento of our rich relative. It is of very thick glass and hard ebony wood. Gertrude, isn't this Widow Shuts's daughter?"

"Ah, yes, Edward. Her poor mother died of a broken heart while you were at Prague, and no one would take her little child, owing to her father's defrauding the Government. So I went and brought her here. I think we can manage to support her."

"A noble act, Gertrude; it repays me for my disappointment. We have stern duties to meet. Ten thousand dollar bond I can never pay; the thirty dollars I borrowed cannot be returned immediately. What we shall do our heavenly Father only knows. May he help us to bear what ever fate awaits us."

Edward and his wife curtailed their expenses to their real necessities. They resolved to drink no more tea or coffee, and only eat meat twice a week. They both worked night and day to supply their wants. But the time was at hand when the bond must be paid. Where will the money come from? That was a question of hourly [illegible] tion and meditation. They could think of but little else, and dreamed about it every night. Still they believed that would deliver them and preserve their little home to them. Finally the dreadful day came, and three officers presented themselves at the poor man's cottage. Edward invited them in and told them all that had happened. He implored their mercy another month, another week; but all to no avail. They said it was not in their power to show any leniency, they were servants of the law, and had only its commands to obey. They commenced to pack up the various articles of furniture preparatory to taking them to the auction room. Gretchen, the little adopted girl, became frightened at the officers, and running by the table, knocked off the inkstand that Edward had brought from Prague. The ink flew all over her clothes, and the inkstand was broken by its fall. The sun was shining brightly through the window, and amid the fragments there shone the most beautiful object that any one there had ever seen. It was a magnificent diamond. It could be no other. The wealth that Edward Muller's uncle had taken away was exchanged by him for that diamond, and he had concealed it in the inkstand between the glass and the wood. He [illegible] was now the richest man in the kingdom. [illegible] the officers exempted the legal [illegible] and his companions that it was [illegible] for them to leave. The family were [illegible].

The first thing done in that household was the singing of Martin Luther's grand hymn, "A sure fortress is our God." They each kneeled in prayer, and little Gretchen—always lovely, but now lovelier, because she was the instrument of deliverance—folded her hands as directed, and tried to speak her prayer. But she could not, and the falling tears catching in her brown curls looked like dew-drops on the flowers of spring. She was, in reference to the things of this life, what many a little child can be in regard to the more important matters of eternity, The angel of Salvation.

THE CHERRY BUD.

God sometimes seems a great way off, and we wonder if he cares for us. I know Jesus told us to say, "Our Father," and the Bible teaches that "He is nigh to all them that call upon him;" and yet we cannot help sometimes feeling that he is too great to mind our small affairs, and has larger interests to overlook than ours. This is not a happy feeling. Oh no; it is unhappy. While I was feeling so one day, I walked out on the piazza, and pulled a bud from the cherry tree. It was in the early spring, and the trees looked bare as winter. It seemed as if Spring, like hope, was frozen up.

The bud was not a Spring bud then. No. It was made last summer; for summer is at work, not only to make leaves and flowers and fruit for its own year, but it begins a bud—it begins millions of buds for the next year. What a forethought that!

But a bud is a tender thing. Are they not running a great risk to come so long beforehand, for how can they weather the winter storms, frost and ice, and wind and snow? The cherry-bud which I held in my hand survived all this.

"How did you live, little bud?" I said, carrying it into the house. Then I began to uncover it, and that led me into the secret. How much do you think that one cherry-bud had on? First I took off thirteen little chippy coverings, hugging it round like the coats of a pine cone. That showed as if somebody cared for it. Then I found three larger, finer, thicker ones; and under these three more, woollier and warmer. Here were six blankets, besides thirteen coverlids.

What do you suppose I found between two of the blankets? The smallest insect you ever saw, no bigger than a hair's breadth, but with legs to run away fast enough, when I waked him up. "Did your mother put you in this warm cradle?" I asked. "Have you slept sweetly here all winter?" It did not answer, and seemed impatient to go.

"What did you find inside the blankets?" Three little buds—blossoms to be, and cherries in July. They looked like three tiny babies fast asleep, and not yet ready to get up. They were not ready, for I was not the one to rouse them. It belonged to that good nurse, the sun, who was fast warming up for the work. Now I was about it, however, I thought I would look a little farther.

"Is the flower all there inside you, little bud?" I peeped in, and found atoms of the most delicate white leaves you ever saw, all beautifully grained; and Oh, had I lighted on a mine? for here was a nest of gold—golden specks, moulded and rounded with the rarest skill. How many? Thirty-five. Here indeed was the blossom, and these were the pollen boxes of the stamens, for I found each gold speck perched on a little stalk; and all these grouping round the heart of the blossom, the future cherry.

Who would have thought of finding this little world of life and beauty here? such delicate painting, such exquisite workmanship, part fitting part, many parts forming a perfect whole, and not only one, but hundreds, thousands, millions, clinging to the dry black branches of the garden trees! I looked out of the window and thought of all these, living, growing, perfecting, with no haste—noiseless, hid from all eyes, all eyes but One. He knows them all, counts them all, watches them all, loves them all as they strengthen and ripen, bearing another life in their warm, white bosoms, the full fruit, the rich, ripe, delicious "White Hearts" of July. Ah, the garden trees looked no longer bare.

Will the great God have such care and love for a bud, and not care for you and for me? Then God seemed no longer afar off. He was near, very near. A sweet sense of his love and care folded me round, and I was happy, very happy.—Exchange.

THE LITTLE SNOW SHOVEL

The front yard had a thick coat of snow on when Lewis put on his great coat and comforter, shouldered the new big snow shovel, and went out to clear a path to the street. The storm was over, and as the bright morning sun shone on the snow capped twigs, rails, and posts, they sparkled with a thousand brilliants.

"See him, mother," cried Mary, who stood at the window watching Lewis, and enjoying his somersets in the snow before beginning the more serious business of shoveling. Mary thought it was delightful; she thought everything Lewis did delightful. Lewis, in her eye, was a hero of heroes, and she never was happier than when she could do some service for him. Lewis knew it, and though he didn't mean to do any serious wrong, he sometimes used his power rather harshly, like too many boys with their sister.

The sun, the snow, and Lewis, proved almost too tempting for the little girl. She wanted to go out too.

"Is it not rather biting for a little girl who is not very well?" asked her mother.

"I won't play in the snow, mother," said Mary; "let me have Lewis' little shovel, and go out and help him."

"Perhaps he doesn't want you," said her mother, quite willing to throw a hinderance in the way.

Mary did not believe that, so she said, "Please do, mother."

Mary had been sick, but she was better, and her mother thought, maybe, if her little girl was well wrapped up, the clear winter air might be good for her; shovelling, too, would help to keep her warm and glowing. So the mother put on her little red hood, cloak, mittens, and tippet, and put into her hand the small wooden shovel which Lewis had outgrown, and out Mary skipped as happy as a snow bird.

Lewis was well along with his path, he prided himself on [illegible]. He was glad indeed to him, with the little shovel in both hands.

"I come to help you, Lewis," she cried in her loving tones, at the same instant scooping up the light snow. It scattered and flew back on the clean path.

"Get out!" cried Lewis, hastily. "I don't want girls bothering me. They are more plague than profit."

"Shan't I help you, Lewis?" asked Mary, timidly.

"No," answered the boy, with a boy's unthinking roughness. "You are a real bother. You are always in my way. Stand back, won't you? What are you out here for? and what business have you with my shovel? Always getting my things." Mary stood back. Lewis took no notice of her [illegible] shovelling [illegible] as if he were working on a wager. The disappointment was almost too much for the little girl. She [illegible] into the house, and threw herself into her mother's arms.

"Lewis doesn't want me," she sobbed, and the tears ran fast and thick down her little cheeks. Mother tried to comfort the little grieved heart.

After awhile Lewis came stamping in. Seeing where his sister was, and the tear in her eye half blurring the look of affectionate reproach which she cast on him, "Why, what's the matter with Mary?" he asked.

"I am afraid you hurt her feelings," said mother.

"Our Mary is getting to be a real cry-baby," he said, marching off, but with a small twinge in his conscience. O, if Lewis had only known it was to be his last chance of being kind to his little sister and making her happy! That night the scarlet fever set in, and after ten days Lewis saw her no more.

A miserable boy was he. "If I had only been kind to Mary. If I'd only said, So you shall help me, Mary, and showed her how to shovel," he repeated to himself again, and again, and again. "If I only had, if I only had."—The is remorse, conscience biting back again.

The sight of the little shovel quite upset him. Once he took the axe to chop it up, and get it out of his sight; but he could not do it. Mary held it last in her dear little hands; and after a long, long while, when the bitterness of his sorrow was past, he loved the little shovel for her sake. Lewis is a man now, and he would part with everything he owns rather than that; and many a tear he still sheds over it.

PLAYING FOR KEEPS.

We are told that this story is real, as children say. There are a great many little boys who are in the habit of playing for keeps. We hope they will not only read this story, but that they will resolve never to take this their first lesson in gambling.

"See, mother, what a lot of marbles I've got!" said John. "I want you to make me a great big bag to put them in."

"Why, where did you get so many, my son?" asked his mother.

"I won them from Pete Jones. See, I got his glass taw, too! I loaned him one of mine to play with, while he put that in the ring. Isn't it pretty?"

"How much did you pay him for them?"

"Pay him! Nothing. He and I played for 'keeps,' and I was the best player, and won all his."

"How much did they cost Peter, do you suppose?"

"If he bought them, they must have cost him about a dollar."

"And you got them for nothing?"

"I played 'upon the square,' and Pete said I got them all fair."

"So now you have got a dollar's worth of marbles for nothing, for which you never paid one cent!" said his mother slowly, and with emphasis.

John, who was an honest boy, looked at her as if he did not fully comprehend the extent of her meaning.

"Mr. Lowly," continued his mother, "is a gambler, and he wins other people's money in the same way. He plays 'upon the square,' he says."

As the truth flashed upon John that he was a gambler, he burst into tears, and asked his mother what he must do. After showing him how little evils expanded into greater, and how persons were tempted to cheat and defraud when there was a prospect to make anything by it, she told him to return all Peter's marbles, and then go and ask God to forgive him.

Peter seemed very thankful to get his marbles back. John left, whistling a merry tune, which seemed just like he was saying, "Johnny ain't going to be a gambler."

EIGHT DIRECTIONS.

"How shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him?"—Judges xiii. 12.

When a child is born into the world the parents should deeply ponder this question. And we answer it thus:

I. Regard the child as having entered upon an immortal existence.

II. Heartily dedicate him to God as Hannah did Samuel.

III. Pray for him and teach him to pray.

IV. Store his mind with the truths of God's Word.

V. Set him a Christian example.

VI. Train him to habits of obedience, order, generosity, industry and economy.

VII. Check the first buddings of evil, and cherish the first indications of right feeling.

VIII. Rest not until his heart is given to Christ, and you have good evidence that Christ has been formed in his heart the hope of glory.

From the Youth's Evangelist

HISTORY OF JOSEPH.

We have already noticed the striking of the bargain between the ten brethren and the Ishmaelites. Joseph's is the first case on record of a person having been sold as an ox, a horse, or a mere chattel. It is the opinion of some learned men, however, that slavery, or involuntary bondage, existed long before this time. My young readers would, no doubt, like to know something about the origin of such an inhuman institution as slavery. We would like to gratify them, if it were in our power. But to give a history of the different kinds of slavery which have existed in the various nations of the world, would occupy too much of our space, and interfere with our original plan. We may remark, however, that its origin has generally been ascribed to a state of warfare. "In the rudest stages of society," when persons were captured in war, it was found to be advantageous to put them to death immediately, owing to the difficulty of procuring subsistence for them. But in the advanced stages of society, the captives of war were turned to a profitable account by their owners or captors. Their labor was of great importance. Hence the Latin word which we translate slave, is supposed to have been derived from a verb which signifies to preserve, and indicated that the person to whom it was applied, had his life preserved on the express condition that his life of labor was to be given to his captor.

There were various ways by which the ancient Hebrews fell into a state of servitude. In addition to having been taken as prisoners of war, as we have just now stated, they might have been reduced to such a state of poverty, as to bring them under the necessity of selling themselves, Lev. xxv. 39; or, they might have been reduced to it for their criminality, as thieves and robbers; or, by their being born of bond servants; or, as in the case of Joseph, they might have been made slaves by an involuntary sale, after being kidnapped.

Slavery, then, is never spoken of as a blessing, but as a curse. There never has been domestic, social, or national peace of any duration where it has existed. God has cursed every place where it has been established, and hath only permitted it as a punishment for crime. He, however, can bring light out of darkness, order out of confusion, cause the very wrath of man to praise him, and restrain the remainder of the wrath. Joseph is now on his way to Egypt, let us follow him thither, and mark attentively his future history, and we shall find that the wrath of his brethren shall redound to the Divine praise, his own glory, and their [illegible].

May we not hope that the present war with which our nation is convulsed, and into which it has been plunged by our wicked and wrathful brethren, the slaveholders in the South, may also be overruled for good? Let us pray, that, as in the case of Joseph's brethren, it may result in the very salvation of the men who have been its origin and its mainspring.

You will remember that Reuben would not consent to the murder of Joseph, and that it was at his suggestion that he was cast into the pit. Reuben's design in this was good. It was his intention to rescue Joseph from the pit on the first opportunity that offered itself, and "deliver him to his father again." He had already commenced to carry this praiseworthy purpose into execution instead of sitting down with his brethren "to eat bread," for which, under such circumstances, he could not have had much relish, he took a circuitous walk, intending to return by the pit and relieve his young brother. He was entirely ignorant of what had transpired in the mean time. He had not observed the travelling caravan, and knew not that his father's son had been sold as a slave, and that perhaps with less ceremony than the same parties would have sold a cow or a sheep. Accordingly, we are informed that when "Reuben returned unto the pit, Joseph was not in the pit; and [illegible] Reuben." This was a very common way in those days of giving [illegible] and is [illegible] of frequent occurrence now. There are many instances of it recorded in the Scriptures of Divine truth.

When Reuben failed to find Joseph in the pit where he had left him, the thought, no doubt, flashed upon his mind that his brethren had murdered him during his absence. This, we think, may be justly inferred from the language in which he addresses them as soon as he returned to them: "The child is not; and I, whither shall I go?" How tender, pathetic, and touching are these words! The child is not; and I, whither shall I go? I cannot return to my father when his darling, beloved and idolized boy has been cruelly, fatally, unnaturally murdered by the hands of his own brethren. Alas! I must become a fugitive on the earth, for under such circumstances, I could never return to the paternal roof!

After having given vent to some such expressions of sorrow as these, his brethren relate the whole circumstance. Whether or not Reuben was satisfied with what they had done, it is difficult to tell. It is more than likely from his complicity in the matter of deceiving Jacob, that he was. It seems that his only grief was that he had been slain by his brethren. He cared not if he had been torn by wild beasts.

But whether he is sorry or not, it is now too late to have the matter remedied. The caravan has gone a goodly distance. Joseph is on his way to the land of Misraim.

Our New Testament Joseph had to flee into Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod. Reuben sought Joseph in an empty pit. The women sought the Saviour in an empty tomb. If we are seeking salvation in any other way than through Jesus, we are seeking it in an empty tomb.

DON'T FRET.

Some little boys and girls are never cheerful except when every thing pleases them. When denied something that they desire, they cry and murmur. Robert Page having heard some bad men talking upon the street about the sweet pleasure of an evening spent in the theatre, came running to his mother, saying, "Please let me go to the theatre to-night." His mother was pious. She loved Robert tenderly. But she said to him, "I cannot let you go. You are too young. Besides, those who go to that place do not fear God. They do not love the Bible, and seldom go to church. I think too much of you to let you go into bad company. In this way your soul might be lost for ever."

Now, though her denial was kind, yet such was his disappointment that he began to cry, and remained sulky all the evening. His mother was pained to see him so fretful. Her eyes grew moist with tears, as she knelt beside him in prayer. How sinful it was in him to occasion such grief to his loving mother! How much better if, when she told him that he could not go, he had said, You know what is best for me, and I will cheerfully obey your will.

You must learn to bear disappointment. Though many things are denied you which you desire—though many things are taken from you which were dear to your hearts, yet say, I will not fret, for God gives me far more than I deserve.

Little Mary B appeared at the door of a neighbor, looking quite serious. Said the lady, "What is the matter, my dear, that you look so sad?" Said she, "Mother is dead. But she was so happy last night before she died—she felt so sure that Jesus loved her that I cannot fret over her decease. My loss is great, but her gain is far greater." She was resigned to the will of her heavenly Father. And so should you always be. Never fret or complain. Pious people dislike it. Christ, who was meek and lowly in heart, don't like it. Delight yourself in God, he will give you the desire of your heart. JOHN.

COUSIN SARAH.

A REVERY.

Come here, little sweet-voiced Kitty,
And sit beside my knee—
There, let me take your hand in mine,
For grandma cannot see,
Look at the clock, the kind old clock,
And tell me when it is ten;
I feel as if my heart would break
When they toll that bell again.

"Grandma, here is a little rose,
I knew they would not care
If I took just one from the pretty crown.
They plaited for her hair,
It didn't seem she could be dead,
She looked so sweet and fair."

Pretty rose, she was always fair,
And she came so, every day
[illegible]
Out of the sunshine's way.
Ah me! to be so still and blind,
And she to go the first,
Kitty, I wish that I could cry,
For my heart is like to burst.

"Grandma, here is a little shred
I picked up from the floor
Because you always liked to know
What Cousin Sarah wore:
I think a dress so soft and white
She never had before."

Pretty lamb, it was none too white—
It was none too soft for her.
But, Kitty, she folds that lie on her heart
No breath of life will stir,
She wears in heaven the spotless robe,
Whiter than this, I know—
It may be wrong for me to grieve,
But, Kitty, I miss her so.

"Grandma, here is a little braid;
When you went to see her last,
You smoothed the damp locks of her hair,
And when her hand you clasped,
She turned her head, that you should not feel
The tears that fell so fast."

Pretty one, did she grieve so much?
[illegible]
Turn my chair to the window west,
That is the way they will go.
Hark! the bell, and I hear the wheels,
I did not think it was ten,
She never used to pass my door,
But it is not now as then.

"Grandma, grandma, Kitty is here,
I will love you all the more.
There, let me wipe your tears away,
And sing you the "Shining Shore
[illegible]
She has only gone before."

So it is best—I see it now,
But it seems so long to wait.
[illegible]
I have murmured at my fate:
But sing me again the hymn we love,
[illegible]
When the sheek of corn is fully ripe,
Then will he cut it down.

This is the only Composition known which will successfully resist extreme changes of all climates, for any length of time, when applied to metals, to which it adheres firmly, forming a body equal to three coats of ordinary paint, and much less, and will LAST THREE TIMES AS LONG, and from its elasticity is not injured by the contraction and expansion of TIN and other METAL ROOFS, consequent upon sudden changes of the atmosphere.
It will not CRACK IN COLD OR RUN IN WARM WEATHER, AND WILL NOT WASH OFF.
LEAKY TIN AND OTHER METAL ROOFS can be readily repaired with GUTTA PERCHA CEMENT, and prevented from further corrosion and leaking, thereby securing a PERMANENT WATER TIGHT ROOF FOR MANY YEARS.
The Cement is peculiarly adapted for the preservation of IRON RAILINGS, STOVES, RANGES, PIPES, AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS, &c., also for general manufacturers' use.
GUTTA PERCHA CEMENT.
For preserving and repairing Tin and other Metal Roofs of every description, from its great elasticity, not injured by the contraction and expansion of Metals, AND WILL NOT CRACK IN COLD OR RUN IN WARM WEATHER.
These materials are adapted to all climates, and we are prepared to supply orders from any part of the country, at short notice, for GUTTA PERCHA ROOFING in rolls, ready prepared for use, and GUTTA PERCHA CEMENT in barrels, with full printed directions for application.
AGENTS WANTED.
We will make liberal and satisfactory arrangements with responsible parties who would like to establish themselves on a GENERAL and PERMANENT business.
OUR TERMS ARE CASH
We can give a [illegible] for [illegible] in favor of our [illegible] proved Reliable Materials, having supplied them to several thousand Roofs in New York City and vicinity.

Poetry.

For the Christian Recorder.

Hark how the angels sing
Anthems from heaven!
Tidings of joy they bring
Jesus is given!
He comes the world to own,
Earth, hail thy King.
Children, come, seek His Throne
Your praises bring.

Oh! lovely Bethlehem!
Had we been there,
Guarding our tender lambs
With fondest care,
We, with the Shepherd's throng,
Flowers might bear,
With the rose and the song,
Glad'ning the air.

Still in his temples here
He deigns to dwell,
Deeming sweet childhood's prayer
Richest perfume.
So flowers He'll receive,
Strewed at his feet,
While the song childhood gives
To him is sweet.

PRISCILLA TALENT.

THE PROPS.

FROM THE GERMAN OF MARTIN LUTHER.

I.

I looked out from my window,
And saw the stars above,
Upon the vault of midnight,
Shine like the eyes of Love.

But I saw no props rise sky-ward,
No columns strong and tall,
Hold up that vault majestic,
And yet it did not fall.

There are men now, who, trembling
For fear the blue dome drops,
Beat hard their breasts, bewailing
They cannot find the props.

And still they seek to find them,
And touch them with their hands—
The sky heeds not their groping,
The firmament still stands.

II.

I looked out in the morning;
[illegible] clouds around, on high,
[illegible] onward like an ocean,
[illegible] overspanned the sky.

I saw beneath no pillars,
And yet they fell not down,
But saluting me, their watcher,
They gloomily passed on.

And, as they passed, the rainbow
Came suddenly in sight,
The great dome's slender, delicate,
Sustaining arch of light.

When fierce cloud-waves press downward,
A vast aerial lake,
There are, alas! too many
Who fear the bow will break.

Though its strength you cannot measure,
Fear not the clouds will fall;
Do not disturb the rainbow,
'Tis strong enough for all.

GOSPEL LIBERTY IN SYRIA.

We some time since gave our readers an account of the cruel beating and imprisonment of Faris, a Mohammedan convert in Syria,—his release on the interference of the American consul, and the punishment inflicted on his persecutors. The following letter from an American missionary there, gives a statement of the events connected therewith since that time:—

You will have seen in the papers copies of the letter sent by our President to his Highness, the Viceroy of Egypt, thanking him for his prompt and vigorous action in punishing the perpetrators of the outrage upon our man Faris at Osiout. I enclose a copy of the viceroy's answer, for the sending of which for publication, our consul has received the necessary permission. It is a document which deserves publication, even to the ends of Christendom. It is a firman of religious toleration, and it is clear and explicit, and not as such documents have too often been, equivocal in its terms and dubious in meaning; and what is best of all in it is, that it is a "word" after a "blow;" the saying, "A word and a blow," will not answer here where people have become accustomed to thousands of words without any corresponding action. We have the more reason to congratulate ourselves on the state of feeling towards us, of which the case of Faris is at once the index, and the aid, from the fact that we hear that it is very different in other parts of the Turkish Empire. One of the missionaries from Constantinople, who has lately visited us, says that the Government there takes frequent opportunities to show opposition to the mission work, and that Dr. Hamlin, who has received a large sum of money for the building of a college there, has been induced, principally from this cause, to dissolve his connexion with the mission, and that having the land and every thing ready to commence building, he has been laboring for several months, and as yet in vain, for permission to commence the work. In Syria it is much the same. Faris has lately gone there to bring his family, and I have just received a letter from one of the missionaries, saying: "I advised him to keep rather close, for if the Maronite bishop should claim him as a runaway monk, the Government would give him up. [illegible] can passport (our consul gave him a passport for the trip,) to the contrary, notwithstanding. In fact his passport would make it worse for him, for the Government here are taking every possible opportunity to show their ill-will to Franks, and what is worse, the European powers, or rather England let them do it. It is a great pity that England has been led, from views of policy, to take the stand which she has taken in Turkey. It is true her position has been a very delicate one but she might, we think, have carried out that figment which she seems to think essential to her own welfare, viz.: the integrity of the Turkish empire without becoming, as we fear she is doing, the tool of the Turkish government and bigotry. The present state of things puts the opinion which I have long held as to the comparative tolerance of the governments of Constantinople and Egypt. Still, we will not boast. We know not how soon things here may take a turn. The house of Mahomet Ali has always shown itself tolerant, but Islam is always and every where the same. Of this, as to Egypt, the persecution of poor Faris is sufficient proof.

But I will leave these speculations to give a few facts in connexion with that case, and showing its effects. When the Viceroy gave the sentence, he was on the eve of departing from the capital to visit the new sultan. Before leaving, he stated to Mr Thayer that some of the most sentenced, and especially El Kashif, were men of such influence in the country that he feared evil might result from their long imprisonment, and requesting him, as a special favor, in the course of a month or so, to ask for their pardon. The Viceroy returned after a month, and soon after Mr Thayer asked him to release the men from imprisonment and pardon them, which was done. In the meantime we had been receiving letters from Faris, showing that the most happy effects had followed the execution of the sentence of the Viceroy, but which led us to fear that the new popularity, and, indeed, power which Faris had acquired in Osiout might prove a snare to him, and that he might compromise himself and us; and as he was also writing very urgently for one of us to come and assist in the work which had now received a great impulse, the brethren decided that I should go. Mrs. L., your sister, (who was just recovering from a severe attack of illness, and very much needed the change,) and I, prepared to depart, and we left Cairo on Wednesday, the 9th Oct., in our favorite "Ibn." She gave us, as usual, a swift passage, and on Saturday, the 12th, we reached Osiout. As our arrival was unexpected, I immediately went up to ascertain the "statu quo" of affairs. I found Faris with his house full—pupils, parents, patients, people from Osiout and the surrounding villages, seeking his interference in all sorts of political, priestly, and family troubles—in short, he was evidently "master of the position," and the centre of a powerful influence, which was quite a contrast to his former state, when for weeks, and even months, while under the priestly ban, he could scarcely find a man to return his salutation. We remained ten days, and were happy to find that he had shown as much prudence and tact in prosperity, as he had fortitude and endurance in adversity.

I can describe but a small part of what took place during those ten days. I will only attempt to state a few facts, showing the new direction which the popular current has taken.

In the first place, Faris had been instrumental in saving another woman from the meshes of Islam. It was, even more clearly than the other, a case in which the woman had been forced against her will to marry a Muslim, or rather, he laid claim to her as his betrothed, for the marriage had not yet been consummated.

Another case will be sufficient to show his political influence. The Nile was unusually high this year. In many places it did immense damage to the country and crops, and the people were doing all they could in building up the dykes to keep out the overflowing flood, which, in many places, was even sweeping away the villages. In a village near Osiout, the sheikh, (Muslim,) called out the people for this purpose, and he very wantonly had them take away the dirt from around the church to put upon the dyke, in a way which left the church exposed to be undermined and ruined by the waters. The priest went over and entered his complaint with Faris. The latter finally consented to go and see. He took with him a number of influential Copts from Osiout, and went to the house of a friend near the sheikh's house. The villagers crowded in, and among them a spy from the sheikh. Faris seeing this, began to talk largely. He said that the sheikh thought he could do any thing because he was wealthy and had some land; "but," he said, "we will see what will happen to him. El Kashif also had land, and his wives had since needed it to cast upon their heads," &c., &c. The spy left, and the sheikh soon came and kissed Faris' hands and head and begged for quarter. Faris told him that he must take back the earth which he had removed from the foundations of the church, which he promised to do, and it was done.

As to the prisoners;—the telegraphic wires had been broken by the flood, and so the pardon had been delayed nearly two weeks; and, on reaching there, I was much surprised to find that it had only reached a few hours before, and the prisoners had been released only that afternoon. The whole town was in an excitement of wonder, and especially when they heard that the pardon had been granted at our request. This they could not understand. They crowded around us, Christians and Muslims, and asked how it was. The Muslims were full of joy. Some of the Christians slyly hinted that we should have left them to finish their year. I told them that after having given them an example of the justice of the gospel, we wished also to show them its clemency and mercy; and to the Muslims I said: "The Koran imprisoned you, and the gospel set you free." The day after our arrival, El Kashif sent word that he wished to call on us. I sent back that I did not receive calls on Sabbath, and, besides, that I had no particular desire to see him, after what he had done. The next day, however, I heard things concerning him, which convinced me that he was truly penitent of what he had done, and, on the repetition of his request to be permitted to call, I consented. He came, and with him and after him about fifty of the chief of the Copts. After getting as many of them seated as we could, and the usual complimentary pipes and coffee, I handed him my copy of the Koran. He looked at it, and said: "The Koran—and a fine copy it is." I said: "Yes; proceed now." He answered: "How? With what?" I said, quoting a passage from the book he held: "Produce your proof, if ye be true." He was confused, and endeavored to avoid the issue. I said: "No, but you must bring your proofs for this religion, for which you have shown your self so valiant. You have tried the sword with us, and found that it would not work. That time is past; but we are ready to hear proofs, and, if conclusive, to receive your religion." He still declined. Then I said: "I find some difficulties in this book, of which I wish your solution." I stated a couple, when he, finding the matter was turning against him, turned it off in a pleasant way, saying, "I am not the man for this; you will have to send for El Ghouse" (El Ghouse was one of the culprits, and a most fanatical man against the Christians, as well as obnoxious to the Muslims, he having made an attempt to get up a fight at Assiout. I am sorry to say that this man escaped the punishment which he so justly deserved. His name was mentioned in Faris' letters but not amongst the thirteen at the head of the Kadi's letter, and so he was overlooked, which all olamas at Osiout lamented.) I said: "Then why did you do what you did? You certainly saw that such an outrage was against both the laws of religion and humanity." He answered: "It was a temptation of the devil." This closed the matter, and our subsequent [illegible] was very agreeable. Indeed, he seemed an amiable sort of man, and all the Christians bore witness to the truth of his assertion, that he and his family had always before shown themselves friendly to them. I had a word ready for them also. The Arabs always divide the whole of a thing into twenty-four parts, for the denominator of their fractions, as we do into ten in our decimals. I told them that twenty-out of the twenty-four shares of the guilt of the outrage upon Faris belonged to them—that we had come to them with brotherly love in our hearts and the Bible in our hands, and that they, from the first, unlike the people of all Upper Egypt, had met us with coldness and [illegible] and uncommunicativeness, and that thus their treatment of Faris and our cause had emboldened the Muslims to do what they had done. This charge was too true to be denied, but they promised for the future to do better.

In brief, on leaving, it was as to [illegible] and take coffee with him the next day, and at ten o'clock the next morning, he sent his donkeys and servants to take us up. The ladies could not go, so I went alone, little anticipating the reception which had been prepared. He had invited a number of the leading Copts, together with Faris and our other adherents—and, when the time came, a grand dinner was brought on the carpet, opening with a sheep, roasted whole, and followed by turkeys, chickens, &c., to the extent of some thirty courses. Faris and I sat one on each side of him, and he took particular pains to show his good will to Faris; among other things, saying, that if ever any thing else happened to him, we must hold him responsible. The day was mostly spent in discussion of the truths of Christianity, and, I trust, to us profitably. On Thursday we had a similar, though still more sumptuous, feast with our Consular Agent, Wasef, with nearly the same company. I am sure El Kashif heard more of Christianity during those two days, than he had heard before all his life. On Wednesday we were invited to the house of a man on the other side of the river, who had been one of the few who clung to Faris, even in the darkest day. As his village was some distance off, we did not expect that the man would come, in usual Oriental style, to tell us that "all things were ready," and so we went over in our boat, but on reaching the house found he had gone for us. We remained a couple of hours, calling in the family and neighbors, and expounding a chapter for them. (In this village, though there is a good number of Christians, there were neither church nor priest.) On our way back, we met the man. We were not guilty of a breach of etiquette, as he had not expressly invited us to dine, but, poor man, he was evidently sadly disappointed.

On Friday we went up to Benoub, several hours up the river. It is the native village of our consul, Wasef, and our priest, Bakhtor, and they went with us. Here another great feast awaited us. Before it came on, we had a couple of hours' very pleasant conversation with a number of the people. I was happy to find one priest—the leading one of the town—quite imbued with Protestant doctrines. He had removed the pictures and images from his church—which is one of four churches in Upper Egypt in which this has been done by the common consent of priest and people. The man of the house at which we stopped, was also a Protestant. He had been enlightened by our priest, Makbiel, in Cairo. In the evening I was escorted down to the boat by a cavalcade of some twenty or thirty, with lanterns, &c., and the whole village seemed to be moved. On reaching the boat, I found that three sheep, and a quantity of bread, milk, &c., had preceded. But enough of this. Suffice it to my, that the appearances were that, had we remained and been willing to consent to the arrangement, we would have been feasted and fed to this day. Every day, too, El Kashif sent down his white donkey with two servants to take us up through the town, which caused no little remark among his Muslim friends. He himself sent an intercessor, and afterwards, before we left, the next Tuesday, came himself to say that he soon intended coming to Alexandria, to obtain, if possible, American or English protection, and wished my kind offices in the matter. He even said, that, if necessary, he would go to America for the purpose; but I told him that I could not assist him in the matter. The fact is a very significant one, when we remember the frequent admonitions in the Koran against taking the Christians or Jews, or any other infidels, as friends or protectors.

Faris had been able to re-open the school, which contained, when we were there, fifteen boys, and we hear that it is soon growing. This, notwithstanding that some of the priests are still doing all they can against it, but not now openly, as before. The Bishop is very favorable to our cause, but he is a simple-minded old man, who has not much influence.

We brought Faris with us. His wife and child were in Kums, and he was longing to see them. He has now gone to bring them. Poor fellow, he was much more severely beaten, than even his letters gave us to understand. It is a great wonder how he escaped with his life,—and it would hardly have been possible, but that he was a very strong, vigorous man. As it was, he received a severe blow on the back with a club, which, we fear, has affected his right lung, as he has ever since had a severe pain in it, and all the way down, and until he left here, he coughed terribly.

What I have written will show you the happy effects which have resulted from the decision obtained in his case. Nor are these limited to Osiout and its neighborhood. Wherever we stopped, all the way down the Nile, it was the same. This decision has shown the people, that we are backed by a power sufficient for our own and their protection, in case they cast in their lot with us. It has drawn the attention of the indifferent to our work, and has given the timid and wavering confidence. It is now more than ever our duty to consecrate to this, and we await the divine blessing.

Yours truly,

G. LANSING

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WEST

A night on the prairie—Western hospitality—The Southerner's Cabin and his Bible—A feast on Musk-rats—Self-sacrifice of a Circuit preacher—Three characters—Revivals in the West—Hard Times—Scarcity of money—Back to Iowa—Fatal accident—Concluding Thoughts, &c.

On the fourth of July, 1857, having received my first wages for labor done on the American continent, I started off early in the afternoon to visit the nearest grocery store at the village of Berrien, in Berrien county, Michigan, five miles distant, to lay in a stock of groceries; and set out to return home, lighter in pocket, but a heavier load on my back, in time to arrive there before dark. I had to cross the river St. Joseph in a ferryboat, which usually made a trip every time a person wanted to cross over, but on the present occasion the ferry-man was not at his post, and did not make his appearance before the shades of evening began to chase away the light of day. My road home lay through a wood, and a person unacquainted with the route would have found it difficult to travel in the open day, but the ferry-man, who told me where to turn to the right and where to the left, said I could not possibly miss the road, as he could find the way blind folded. I set off at a quick pace, fully satisfied in my own mind that if I could reach an old log shanty, about three miles distant, I could find the rest of the way easy enough; onward I went, but not as fast as at first, for my load of groceries, which felt light at first, began to feel heavier, and I thought it time that the log shanty should come in view. I went on for some time longer, when I came to the junction of three roads, which I felt certain did not come in my proper path. I threw down my load, looked around in the darkness, and when the conviction forced itself upon my mind that I was lost, I sat down upon a barren rock. I was soon, however, brought to my senses [illegible] and resolved to retrace my steps. [illegible] I had taken care to buy a newspaper. To collect [illegible] combustible materials did not take much time, and soon a cheering fire sent up amongst the branches. I [illegible] ing trees countless sparks every time I threw on a log, and the blaze not only enabled me to read, but kept the troublesome insects before mentioned, at a comfortable distance. I sat down by the stump of a tree and commenced to read my newspaper, but the paragraphs did not interest me. I felt a strange and irresistible desire to turn my head, first to the right and then to the left, as fancy painted strange, fierce-looking Indians, with scalping knives and tomahawks, dancing and brandishing their weapons of death as they moved quickly about amongst the surrounding trees. But the long hours of night at last passed away—another day was breaking upon the hills and vales, the rivers, lakes and prairies, and the dark, deep woods of the western world; and never, Oh! never did a sail greet the eye of a ship-wrecked mariner with greater joy than did that rising sun, which drove away the darkness of that sleepless night.

Of the three roads which lay before me I took the one which appeared to be most travelled, and in about an hour I came to a clearing in the woods, where the sturdy woodman's axe had recently been at work. Then came in view a field of corn and other signs of industry. A little farther on a large log cabin came in sight, and the blue smoke was curling upwards amongst the great branches of a tree which stood like a sentinel over that lonely cot.

The farmers of the west are noted for their hospitality to strangers. The honest traveller always meets with a hearty welcome at the log cabin of the new settler, as well as at the more comfortable house of those who have been raised there. If the traveller is hungry, he is welcome to have without charge, such fare as the house affords. I have often been surprised at the readiness and hearty good-will with which even poor men will welcome to their tables such as may need a meal to help them on their way. In Michigan, Indiana, and in other states of the west, the new settler may always count upon the willing and gratuitous help of his neighbors at his "raising," as they call the placing in position of the large logs of timber which form the outside walls of their log cabins. But to the question. I made my way up to the door of the house, knocked, and was invited to enter. I explained my situation, and was made welcome. The house belonged to a Scotch family, and consisted of an old man, his wife, two daughters, and three sons, and the wife of one of the latter. They emigrated to this country from Scotland many years ago, but had only recently come to Michigan from Ohio. When the morning meal was ready the family met in the principal room; the old man took down, from a shelf which contained a few other books, a large, old family Bible—read a chapter therefrom, and then asked a blessing on the food we were about to eat. The Bible was an heirloom of the family—had belonged to the old man's father, and was brought to this country when they emigrated from their Highland home, in Scotland. The precious volume was carefully preserved, but was old and discolored, as, indeed, it might well be, after a daily use for so many years in this country and in Scotland. The family were Presbyterians in Scotland, and had always attended on the same means of grace in this country whenever they could. But there was no place of worship near their home in Michigan. Sometimes ministers of various denominations—often a Campbellite—came to preach at a small school house four miles distant. I was told that several Scotch families, who were originally Presbyterians, had joined other churches, when they would have preferred the religion of their fathers. The Campbellites have planted many small churches and taken possession of obscure and out-of-the-way places in Michigan, where the people would have preferred some other church, if such had been offered. This state of things can only be accounted for by supposing that that church is always the most successful which is the most energetic in sending out missionaries to collect the scattered sheep in these waste places of the west.

At and near Pipe Stone, as well as in other parts of Southern Michigan, the colored settlers and inhabitants are quite numerous. Many of them are well to do farmers, and all of them, so far as I could learn, are honest and industrious, and possess the good will and good opinion of their white neighbors. They are intelligent, too; and I know from the manner in which I have heard their white neighbors speak of them, that when they are engaged to labor for another person they may be depended upon. I have been in many of their cabins, which are clean and orderly, and from all that I could see and learn of them, they are as honest and as honorable, as good and as virtuous as any other class of the community, and it is one of the greatest wrongs which can be inflicted upon an innocent race to deprive them of any social, civil, or political rights which are allowed to white men who are not more worthy.

There are many thousands of people scattered over the west who work at repairing the railroads. The men who do this work on the Illinois Central, the Ohio and Mississippi, and nearly all the other roads, are chiefly Irishmen; some few are Germans, and it is very seldom that a representative of any other nation may be found, except in the capacity of a "Section Boss." As these men are scattered over the whole length of the Roads, and most of their work lies far away from towns or villages, or settlements on the Prairies, the shanties and board at "Section Houses," which are built by the company on each Section of five or six miles of the road. The Section Boss is often, also, the boarding Boss. I have been in scores of these boarding houses. They are generally miserable places, quite unfit to accommodate the number of men they are often made to contain. Smoking and drinking red-eye whisky prevails to a most alarming extent amongst these men. Often, on the Sabbath, I have seen these "Section hands" mount their "hand cars" with their large stone jugs, and propel themselves twenty or thirty miles to Centralia, Sandoval, Mattoon, and other places, for the purpose of getting whisky and to fill their bottles. These people are chiefly Roman Catholics, and though they love whisky, they do not forget the priest who comes to visit them at regular stated times on the two roads named. A dollar is generally and cheerfully paid by each man. Sometimes a single man will pay the priest five dollars. Should any one object to pay, he at once becomes objectionable to the rest of the men, who either force him to pay, or by abuse and coercion, drive him off the road. Marriages and "christenings" are generally put off till the priest comes round, when the confession, the marriage and the christening are all done at once, followed by dancing and whisky. Fatal accidents very often follow these scenes of drunkenness. I have myself known several persons killed, when walking to their boarding houses on the rail road, after these drunken bouts. I knew one person in particular who had been [illegible] on the track at Richview, a few miles south of [illegible] instantly rushed into eternity without a moment's preparation, by a train of cars passing over his body.

Thousands of those railroad laborers are naturalized citizens of the United States. Nearly all of them are Democrats, and favorable to slavery, as I have heard [illegible] a Railroad agent at a depot in Marion [illegible] Illinois Central rail road, was put [illegible] peace, to be a justice of the peace. He was elected by [illegible] ment could not command the votes of the railroad laborers, who were treated to a plentiful supply of whisky for their votes.

It does seem as if such men are ill might worthy to have and enjoy all the rights and liberties of [illegible] who, [illegible] colored men as I have described be debarred from the same? CONVERSION OF THE UNGODLY

"Home objects for prayer. The conversion of the ungodly, the cessation of intemperance and immorality, and the spread of vital religion in our families and households among our rulers, the rich and poor, our soldiers and sailors, the authors of our literature, [illegible]

The above constituted the subjects for united prayer, on one of the days during the week of prayer. The week of prayer is now past. We hope many earnest prayers were offered to God, during that week, and that, in answer to those prayers, God will grant an abundant outpouring of his Spirit, to revive his people, and arouse the impenitent. But in order that God would answer those prayers, and revive His cause, His people must follow up the prayers of that week, with works of efforts in that cause. We must not cease with this feeble effort. We must continue our prayers without ceasing. We must [illegible] we have prayed. Let us keep the subjects of prayer, of that week before our minds; think much about them, and pray much over them, during the entire year. Let our efforts correspond with our prayers and meditations, and with God's blessing we may expect a reviving time among us.

One of the objects of prayer stated above, is "The conversion of the ungodly." What true child of God does not earnestly desire this? When we remember that the great end of man's existence, the glory of God, is thus advanced—when we remember that perishing souls will thus be saved from eternal death;—when we remember that our ungodly friends, and neighbors, and acquaintances, will thus be made better friends, better neighbors, and better acquaintances, as well as become fitted for entering that rest that remains for the people of God, can we fail to earnestly desire it? If we earnestly desire it, will we not plead with God for its accomplishment? If we pray earnestly for it, will we not make an effort for its accomplishment?

We think Christians very often fail in their prayers and efforts for the conversion of the ungodly from a want of speciality. They are accustomed in their social meetings, in their families, and in their closets, to offer up petitions for the conversion of the ungodly in general. But very seldom do they take the case of some dear friend that is ungodly, or some near neighbor, or some one with whom they have daily intercourse, to the throne of grace, and plead earnestly for their conversion as individuals. They are accustomed to put forth some efforts for the conversion of the ungodly in general, by contributing something for the spread of the gospel among them. But how seldom do they go to the ungodly individual, and speak kindly to him of his condition, as an enemy of God, and of Jesus as the only hope of the sinner.

Now, here we think is the great fault with us all. We should pray for that ungodly friend and acquaintance in particular. Have a special reference to his or her particular case. We should continue so to do, being importunate in prayer. Let no day pass by without carrying the case of that dear one before God in prayer. God may require us to wait, and to wait a long time, to try us, and see if we are in earnest. If some dear one was condemned to suffer death, and there was any hope of pardon, would we not go with great earnestness to the pardoning power, and plead on behalf of that dear one? Would we be satisfied with a mere formal request? Surely not. Now that sentence of death, if not removed, would take that dear friend away from us, as long as we continue upon this earth. It would deprive him of life in the present body. But the terrible sentence to which he is exposed, because of sin, if it is not removed, will take him away from us—away from God—away from heaven, with all its glories, forever. It would deprive him of that life which is eternal, and introduce him into that death, which is of the same duration. Now if we would be earnest about his deliverance from that death which is less terrible, will we fail to be in earnest about his deliverance from that death which is so much more terrible?

But while we are praying with a speciality we should also labor with the same reference to the individual case. How inconsistent our conduct, as Christians, often is! We are on terms of intimate daily intercourse with an ungodly man. We transact various items of business with him, from day to day. We give him counsel and encouragement about the management of his worldly business. We are in earnest to do all we can to aid him in this direction. He sees it, and is thankful to us for it. Now, how seldom do we manifest even the same degree of earnestness about his eternal interests? How seldom do we speak to him about Jesus, and His salvation, and the need he has of that salvation? He sees this. He knows we profess to believe, that the salvation of the soul is more important than all other things together, and yet, while we seem deeply interested in his worldly prosperity, he is sensible that we never speak to him of his salvation. Now is it not natural for him to conclude, that, after all there is not much reality in the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, or we would be more concerned about his having an interest in it? Such a course is calculated to drive that one away from Jesus, instead of drawing him towards Him.

On the contrary, if we would, whenever opportunity affords, talk with that individual about Jesus, in a kind and friendly manner, not in that harsh and repulsive way in which some are accustomed to speak to such individuals;—might we not expect that such a course, by God's blessing, would lead the impenitent one to Jesus?

Here an incident occurs to my mind, which I heard related some years ago. There was a very ungodly man in the neighborhood. Several pious persons agreed to pray together for his conversion. After praying for some time, and seeing no change upon him, they concluded they must work as well as pray for that end. One of their number, who was intimate with the man, was appointed to see him, and speak to him on the subject. He found him at his anvil. The pious man, unaccustomed, as most Christians are, to speak of such things, hesitated. Finally, naming his friend, in a subdued earnest tone of voice he said, "I feel deeply concerned for the salvation of your soul." He could say no more. He left. That ungodly man began to think. "He is evidently anxious about my salvation, and why am I unconcerned about it?" That thought was followed by others similar to it, until he was finally led to Jesus. So it would be, Christian reader, in thousands of cases, if we would go and do likewise.

THE REVIVAL OF ANCIENT SCEPTICISM.

Tacitus supposed that the events of history recur again in a perpetually revolving cycle, and that the acts of one epoch will be repeated in the acts of another. More correctly he might have stated that opinions, however overthrown, have to themselves a tendency to revive. The superstitions of Rome have been [illegible] in every age, yet in every age they start up like new discoveries in the hands of an energetic priesthood. A generation dies and its convictions are forgotten; by and by there rises up another king who knows not Joseph, and the work of refutation and conviction has to begin again. In [illegible] heart [illegible] which buries forth either into infidelity or Romanism. The student, yearning at truth and yet arguing against truth, finds himself at last unable to believe. He has sought to become wise above what is written, and he fails. Nothing lies before him but to sweep away all that is revealed, or to substitute some human creature to be master of his thoughts. The one sinks into the darkness of scepticism, the other makes the priest his God, and there forms shadowy forms into realities. Like the Titan, he mistakes his cloud for a Juno, and rules a hideous figure in garments of light. 'Twas ever so. Men sow the seed and in another generation the crop springs up, although a prior harvest has been destroyed.

About infidelity, as about Romanism, there is no novelty. To Hobbes and his followers the [illegible] school of naturalists as the [illegible] the cloudy dreams of Spinoza, and the sparkling sarcasms of Voltaire, are but repeated in the French school of deism and the English school of infidelity. To say there is nothing new in the teachings which have perverted the congregation of St Chrysostom's, is but a truism. The fallacies promulgated with sophistry and elegance by the writers of Essays and Reviews are to be found in more homely and less seductive garb in the writings of our old English deists. They were exposed and refuted then; but error has a charmed existence, for it clings to the passions of the human heart, and grows there. The plant may be cut down like a garden weed, but human frailty again produces it. The story of the Hydra is but an emblem of the prolific vitality of error. Cut off one head, and seven spring up of the same blood and in the likeness of their predecessor. It is not always there is an Iolaus at hand to sear the wound.

3. The mystics of Asia spoke of the "order of the universe." They led men look up to the starry heavens and worship the deities visible to them there. These were great gods, they said, —the sun which ripened the corn, the moon which regulated the year, the stars guiding the mariner. They appealed to visible objects and visible powers. Our modern mystics also speak of the "order of the universe," but they speak without understanding. They do not mean the sun, the moon, and the stars; they look for something underneath them. They propose a regulator, but that regulator must not be the Deity of whom Moses wrote. It must be something,—a Platonic ideal, an embodiment of order made up of a thousand orders—a thing no one can comprehend, but which it suits them to name. Their Shibboleth, when required to pronounce the foundation of their hopes, is "the order of the universe,"—terms unexplained, because inexplicable.

4. In early times science bore the name of religion, and the priest who ministered at the altar in the temple was the priest also of the starry temple of the heavens. Because men now can calculate the motions of the stars without a belief in a Redeemer, they bring up the discoveries of science as antagonistic to religion. They imitate not that Eastern king who elevated science in the person of Daniel, the "chief of his wise men;" they copy Herod rather, who made use of the Magian science to hunt down the new child's life. We can predict the day, the hour, the place of the star's return; and because it is fulfilled, we suppose there exists in the stars themselves the principle of their own motion, and we look not for the Creator who gave orders to the universe and bid it roll on forever with its own fidelity.

The Bible speaks of the rising and the setting sun, and therefore speaks what philosophy has demonstrated not to be true. This is the argument of reasoners like Mr. Macnaught. Some Hebrew Descartes or Newton endeavored to explain the cosmogony of the world, and that is the Mosaic account of the creation. Did it never occur to these men that the Bible was not designed to teach a system of astronomy, but to reveal the existence of a great Creator? Did they never think that a written or oral revelation must make use of terms and appeal to idioms current amongst those to whom it is delivered, as otherwise it would be unintelligible? Was any astronomer or any peasant yet misled by the terms "rising and setting" applied to sun or moon? Do not the best educated amongst us use the phrases daily without fear of ridicule? Is our knowledge a vapor, and our learning a cheat, because we use words which are scientifically untrue? Or is our truth doubtful, because we use ordinary language in speaking of ordinary fact?

5. And then come the priests of the "Theory of Development." These tell us that Nature produceth all things, and is sportive. She plays with and adds to or mimics the creatures she has made. The sage dogma is proclaimed to admiring moons "that new species must have originated either out of inorganic elements, or out of previously organised forms." Is there any man bold enough to propound simply and intelligibly what is contained in the first clause of this sentence? Will any one maintain that stones become men, or pebbles cattle? And supposing that the second clause were true, and "that new species did evolve out of organic forms," how can they reply to us if we assert that that very development is part of the law of their being, and as such, points to an Almighty Legislator who arranged it so?

And these objections are made, not by men who are themselves scientific, but by those who are lost in amazement at the extent of their discoveries. These say, "Is religion to stand still while all sciences are so progressive?" This phrase catches the imagination of the young and ardent, yet how unsound it is! All the discoveries of science are owing to the truth of its first principles; all the influences of religion through out the world depend upon the truth of its doctrines. No man lays down different principles of science as true because of the extension of science. The data are the same, whether the range of their influence be narrowed or extended. But who can with patience weigh the absurdity of comparing the results of science, which deals with outward objects, with those of religion, which affect the heart? Who could suppose that truth, purity, holiness, are to be measured trigonometrically, and piety is to be estimated by the balance and the rule?

These modern revivers of an exploded school claim infallibility either for themselves or others. Some yield to the Tractarian or Romish priest at once, and he is infallible to them. Others are infallible in themselves. They have discovered a new goddess, which they call the "verifying faculty." Opening the "Hebrew account" of the cosmogony, if anything opposes their notions, it is at once condemned by this "verifying faculty." Each man is a Pope to himself, and the lights among the zealous desire to be as Popes to others. This "verifying faculty," to be a rule of life, should be equal in all men. Then, the Mormon's verifying faculty approves of his beastly doctrines, the thief approves of his plundering ethic, the murderer of his debauchery. There would be no law, no standard, to regulate human life or morals. Every man would be "a light unto himself," and the world would be in confusion. Yet this is the end of the teaching of those who tell us that all revelation is contrary to the "order of the universe" except their own.

Let us appeal to the "inner consciousness," or "verifying principle," to judge of the men who preach it. The most distinguished priests of the new [illegible] were ordained many to teach the doctrines of the Church of England, and so teach the Scriptures. They laugh at the prayers of that church as "fusty," "mediæval," "ridiculous" forms. They scoff at the doctrines as well as the narratives of the Bible. They are false to their trust, yet they take the money of the church. Appealing to this "verifying principle," it answers comfortably, and assures them that they are quite right, quite pure, quite loveable, because they take the funds of the church for teaching doctrines directly subversive of her existence.

Now, would any merchant amongst us wish to have [illegible] clerk who appealed, as to his [illegible] to a verifying principle so visionary [illegible] Liverpool Courier.

Rev. SAMUEL M. WHITING, a missionary for some time of the Baptist Church in Assam, Burmah, has received a call to settle with the Baptist Church in West Chester, Vermont, and will probably accept it.

RESULTS OF BAD PENMANSHIP

People who wish to obtain favors of others, ought to write their requests in a legible hand. Some ludicrous blunders have occurred from a neglect of this caution; and even the Iron Duke of England once made himself a laughing-stock by the unpardonable chirography of a lady. A correspondent of the New York Evening Post tells the story.

Mrs. J. C. Loudon, widow of the celebrated landscape gardener, took a great delight in prosecuting the favorite studies of her husband's life. On one occasion, wishing to make some researches in the department of arboriculture, she wrote to the Duke of Wellington for permission to see his Waterloo beeches (the celebrated avenue planted on his estate to commemorate his greatest victory.) Mrs. Loudon's chirography was none of the most legible—so that when the Duke read her letter, he mistook beeches for breeches, and supposed the epistle a request for the inspection of that indispensable garment worn by him on the field of Waterloo. At the signature he was again deceived. The n in Mrs. Loudon's name he took for an u, and accordingly read the whole signature "J. C. London," which was none other than that of the Bishop of London himself. Accordingly, though much astonished at such a desire on the part of a grave dignitary, he wrote him in answer a note, which we may imagine created equal astonishment in the recipient:

"My Lord:—My valet tells me that the breeches I wore at the battle of Waterloo were long ago given away to Mr. Benjamin Robert Haydon, for the purpose of his historical painting. Regretting deeply that I have not the breeches to show your lordship, I remain,

Your lordship's very humble servant,
WELLINGTON."

THE PIN OF SCANDAL.

Mr. Wilberforce relates that at one time he found himself chronicled as "Sir. Wilberforce" in an opposing journal, and the following given as an instance of his Pharisaism: "He was lately seen," says the journal, "walking up and down in the Bath pump-room, reading his prayers, like his predecessor of old, who prayed in the corners of the streets to be seen of men." "As there is generally," says Mr. Wilberforce, "some slight circumstance which perverseness turns into a charge of reproach, I began to reflect, and I soon found the occasion of the calumny. It was thus: 'I was walking in the pump-room in conversation with a friend; a passage was quoted from Horace, the accuracy of which was questioned, and as I had a Horace in my pocket, I took it out and read the words.

"This was the plain 'bit of wire' which factious malignity sharpened into a pin to pierce my reputation. How many ugly pins have been manufactured out of smaller bits of wire than even that!

A POPULAR AUTHOR.

The sale of Hugh Miller's works has been much larger in this country than in Great Britain. The Testimony of the Rocks has reached a sale of 27,000 copies in England, and the same in America. Next comes the Footprints of the Creator, in which the American sale has entirely outstripped the English, the former being upwards of 19,000, and the latter about 6000. The Old Red Sandstone has sold 16,000 here to 9000 in England; the Schools and Schoolmasters, 16,000 here to 10,000 of the English; and the First Impressions of England, 9000, against 6000 in Black's edition.

OLD PAMPHLETS.

Not long ago the librarian of Harvard College saw a man stuffing some bags with old pamphlets and papers in a Boston auction-room, when, to his surprise and delight, he espied among them a pamphlet for which he had been looking for eleven years, in order to complete the volume of a valuable periodical

EPISCOPAL VISITS.

By the divine permission, I will be at Frankford, Pa, and will spend the Sabbath there, which will be the 23d inst., with Rev R. Robinson. I will also remain with or on his circuit some two or three days, and should the pastor see fit to make any other appointment, we will attend to it up to the time above referred to.

REVIVALS—GOOD NEWS.

We are receiving information from many of our brethren of the glorious work of the Holy Ghost among them. Bro. Wilkerson, of Leavenworth, Kansas, who is a missionary for the good work in that part of the country, states in his letter to us of the 31st ultimo, the following:

"The Lord has been pleased to pour out his Spirit upon us. For the last three weeks I have been engaged in a protracted effort. Many precious souls have been brought to bow at the altar of prayer, some of whom have found peace with God, and fifteen have been added to our number during the meeting. The Lord be praised for the manifestation of his presence."

We say to our young brother in the far West, Be faithful, and the Lord will bless your labors continually.

Brother Treves, of Richmond, Indiana, says that he has been engaged in a protracted meeting for some time past, which has resulted in twenty-one conversions, all of whom have joined the Church, besides which some thirteen more have joined, making in all thirty four.

Still the work goes bravely on. Rev. Joseph Smith, of the Burlington circuit, is also having a glorious outpouring of the Spirit of God. Since the work has commenced, sinners are becoming alarmed, and are fleeing to God for succor, as they find him precious to their souls. God be praised for his goodness.

Brother Jackson, of the Vincennes (Indiana) circuit, is still going on with the good work. Bro. Woodlin, of Bethel Church, Philadelphia, is also carrying on a protracted meeting, and some interest is being manifested. We also refer our readers to the case of Rev. Brother Gould, of Princeton, New Jersey. God is pouring his grace upon his Church. We are truly glad that the working of the Spirit of God is plainly to be discerned among the people, both in and out of Church.

THE CHURCH IN PROVIDENCE.

Our Church in Providence, of which Rev. Geo. A. Rue is pastor, has been in a deal of trouble about their building, as they have been obliged to move it off the ground of its present position. We see by the accounts given in the pastor's letter that the members have formed themselves into an association, by which they can raise means to erect a good and substantial church edifice to worship in.

BETHEL SABBATH SCHOOL CELEBRATION.

The 25th anniversary of Bethel Sab. School will be celebrated for the birth-day of that great and good man, Rev Richard Allen—Tuesday, the 18th instant—in Bethel Church. The doors to be thrown open at half-past 6, and the exercises commenced at half-past 7 o'clock. The price of admission is fixed at the low sum of ten cents—the proceeds to be applied to the benefit of the Christian Recorder.

It is to be hoped that Bethel Church will be crowded to its utmost capacity on that occasion. Let every person who takes our paper in this city come and hear the members of the school acquit themselves on this particular evening. Come, friends, remember the worthy object, invest ten cents, and, our word for it, you will never regret the expenditure.

Remember, Bethel Church is in Sixth Street, between Pine and Lombard.

NOTICE.

A special meeting of the United Beneficial Sisters of the Rev. J. Woodlin Society will be held on Thursday, the 20th of February, at 7 o'clock, in the evening, at Wealthy Dorsey's, Rodman St., below Tenth St. Punctual attendance is requested. By order of the President,

Elizabeth Harris, President.
Eliza Stokely, Secretary.

MONTHLY REPOSITORY.

We have just received the first number of this publication, of which Rev. John M. Brown, of Baltimore, is the editor. For the last four years it has been published for the benefit of the literary societies of the Indiana, Missouri, Baltimore, and New England Conferences, and was issued quarterly—but we observe that they are now all left off, and it is published at No. 64 Henrietta St., by Rev. John M. Brown. They have reduced the number of pages to twenty

Brother Editor:—Permit me, in behalf of Rev. J. G. Bulaugh, to call the attention of the itinerant ministers of the Philadelphia Annual Conference District to the resolution passed by said Conference in the printed minutes, page 8, as follows, on motion:—

That J G Bulaugh receive $5'00 per month from the Preachers' Fund, and that all ministers having charge of stations and circuits take up a collection for him in each of them, and forward the same to Rev Henry Davis, Treasurer of the Preachers' Fund. We hope the brethren that have not attended to it will not accordingly, as Father Bulaugh is much in need at present.

MAN IS BORN TO LABOR

It is to man, the unalterable decree of heaven, that "in the sweat of thy brow thou shalt eat thy bread;" and this in respect to spiritual as well as outward food. The sustenance of natural and spiritual life must be obtained by labor, and without this no blessing, either outward or inward, can be fully enjoyed. We were not created for idleness, or dependence upon our fellows, either for bodily or spiritual sustenance, but rather upon the means placed within our reach, by the hand of Divine Providence, which we are bound to improve, not only for our own good, but the honor of God, who ever helpeth those who help themselves, and honoreth them that honor Him. We must earn our own bread if we expect to be satisfied with the abundance of peace, and depend neither upon alms, fraud, nor oppression, nor upon the labors of others, for our outward or inward supplies. By the labor of our own hands, and fervent exercise of spirit, in humble prayer unto the Lord of our lives, are we to reap the rich reward promised to the faithful

For our talents of time, mind, and strength we are responsible to Him who created us for the purpose of His own glory, and great, indeed, is our responsibility, whether we may be gifted with the many talents, or only with the few. The penny of peace is promised to all the faithful, however poor or mean, weak or ignorant these may be. So there is promised not only sufficient in this life, but in the world to come life everlasting. Therefore, let not those to whose allotment it may fall to occupy an humble position in life, be discouraged from seeking through faithfulness unto God the inestimable blessing of the heavenly inheritance, whereof all of every nation, kindred, tongue, and people, are lawful heirs, whatever their trials, difficulties, or oppressions may be; however much they may have to suffer from ignorance, privations, or want. The Lord knoweth the hearts of all flesh, and His ears are open to the cries of the humble, who are more often found among the poor and afflicted than among the rich and prosperous, and His arm is stretched out for the help of these.

Let it be remembered by the poor, for their encouragement, that "the Lord hath chosen the poor of this world rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love Him;" and though they may have to labor, and yet be deprived of many outward comforts enjoyed by their more opulent neighbors, let them not forget that greater will be the reward of the industrious, and frugal, and thankful, and faithful poor, than of those who have ungratefully enjoyed the abundance of outward substance, not remembering from whom every blessing, however small, is derived, but living in ease and forgetfulness of God; and, therefore, without Him in the world, even as they may, without repentance, in the world to come. Remember, O ye afflicted and sorrowing ones, that this world is not your home, but the place for the trial of your virtues, and a preparation for the everlasting joys of heaven! Labor continually, therefore, that ye may be permitted to enter into your eternal rest, when this present, wearisome life shall come to an end. Be industrious in your outward callings, "pray without ceasing." As the apostle enjoins, "be diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord."

OUR VISIT TO BRISTOL ON LAST SABBATH

REVIVALS, &c.

On last Saturday evening we left our place of residence to attend Father Robinson's Quarterly Meeting at Bristol, Penna., on Sabbath morning. Love-feast was celebrated, and it was a love-feast indeed, in the true sense of the term. Never before did we hear young converts talk more sensibly, or give a better evidence of the hopes they had of heaven

Brother Davis, a local preacher, gave us an exhortation, which was followed by several other ones.

At half-past 2 o'clock, P. M., we preached a short sermon, after which Elder Robinson consecrated the Lord's Supper. On this occasion it was an unusually solemn and impressive scene. After the communicants had all partaken, the brethren commenced singing, and they remained in the church until near 5 o'clock. At half-past seven o'clock the church was pretty well filled Father Robinson imposed the duty upon us to preach again, and, as an obedient servant, we did so. By 8 o'clock every seat was occupied, and some thirty or forty (white and colored) standing God, upon this occasion, opened a window of heaven and poured down in copious showers his divine blessing, until the measures were filled to overflowing. Yes, God was there. After we got through with our remarks, Father Robinson presented an opportunity to all those desirous of joining the church; and nine, who professed to have been guided from the darkness of sin to the marvellous light of the Gospel of the blessed Jesus Christ, stepped forward and joined. Oh, how the parents of those persons rejoiced to see their children brought to God Father Robinson informed us that he had, through the power of Almighty God, been holding a protracted meeting for eight weeks on the Frankford circuit, and that there had been about thirty souls who claimed to have been truly converted to God. Oh! what glorious news—poor sinners coming to Christ, their Saviour. The work is still going on. Next Sabbath his Quarterly meeting is at Bensalem We would be glad to be there if we were not otherwise engaged. Our earnest prayer is for the work to long continue and prosper in God's holy name

We must not forget to say while in this connexion that Father Robinson is a strong advocate for the interests of our paper. Why should not all of our brethren take the same interest in its welfare?

We took with us some forty copies of the Recorder, and succeeded in disposing of them all—while others paid up for their subscriptions, besides which we obtained the names of several new subscribers.

Father Robinson is one of the oldest, if not the oldest quite, itinerant ministers we have in the connexion at the present time. He is among the founders of the Church, and is well acquainted with all of her movements, her Book Concern, &c., and is well pleased with our style of conducting the Book Concern and paper

May that God who is King of kings bless him in his noble efforts to do good in his declining days.

OLD FOLKS' CONCERT

We would again remind our friends that Father Burrs' Old Folks' Concert will come off on the 20th instant It will be a rich treat. All lovers of good music should attend

LETTER FROM OUR BALTIMORE CORRESPONDENCE

Rev. Editor:—You inquired in your last, what had become of the Baltimore correspondence Had the communication of J P Campbell in relation to the Bishop silenced him or put him to rest? We answer, neither one. There was so much inconsistency in Rev. J. P. Campbell's communication, that it appeared to me that it required a man that was "non compos mentis" to understand him. It was like the argument of two men: one was trying to prove the sun only shines on one side of the globe at one and the same time. The other thought he was so learned that he could prove that the sun shines on both sides of the globe at the same time. This is the position taken by Rev. J. P Campbell. The contention has been, which side of the lake does Bishop Nazrey belong? Observer says this side of the lake is where Bishop Nazrey belongs. Rev. Wm. H. Jones and myself say he belongs on the other side of the lake. Then up comes Rev J. P Campbell from the Capital of New Jersey, and says, Gentlemen, you are mistaken. I have discovered a new science which teaches that the sun shines on both sides of the globe at the same time, and that by agreement between the sun and moon.

This is what Rev. J. P. Campbell says he has found out from reading that Bishop Nazrey is Bishop of two distinct Christian bodies in different countries and under different laws. I ask every reasonable man, if this is not the strangest argument that ever came from the pen of any man. He proves it by referring to the argument entered into by the two bodies: the one in the states, and the other in Canada. He has failed to satisfy me that the sun shines on both sides of the globe at the same time, and he also fails to prove that Bishop Nazrey is Bishop of the A. M. E. Church and the B. M. E. Church. When he can prove the former then he can prove the latter.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr Editor:—For some weeks past, days of rainlessness have indeed been scarce. The streets and avenues in the city are filled with mire, and everybody, whether devoted to the peculiar institution or not, are compelled to carry a good deal of free-soil about them, the mud on many of the crossings being several inches deep. The bad condition of the streets is attributable, mainly, to the long spell of wet weather, and the incessant transportation of army stores in the United States teams.

On Monday and Tuesday, 3d and 4th insts., the choir of our Church gave two delightful concerts, and though the weather was unfavorable, and kept some of the vocalists from appearing, Mr. George Cokely, the leader of the choir (and by the way, a weekly subscriber to the Recorder,) succeeded in bringing before the public, some of the best musical talent in the District, of which we felt proud. Mr. Cokely, with the invaluable aid of Mr. John Butler, has done much to develop the musical talent of this place, and we should not be surprised if another Miss Greenfield, or Jenny Lind made their appearance on a Northern, or European stage, who was born and bred in Georgetown.

Where all deserve so much praise, it is embarrassing to make particular mention of a few, but as every galaxy in the heavens has its brightest stars, we must notice particularly, Miss Agnes Gray, whose graceful mien, and genial smile, captivates the audience, which her voice thrills with pleasure. The tall and prepossessing Miss Beckett, who appears perfectly at home, while, with the rich melody of her voice, she sets the heart aglow with joy, like the nightingale chanting its morning orison, from the tall oak bower. The unique, vocal execution of Miss King, where the whole soul seems to be in making music, whose very body appears, while singing, to be transformed into a harp, fascinated all, and would do honor to the stage of an Ullman. The grave and pious Miss Lee, gave dignity to the musical demonstration, by her modest bearing, and sent forth strains that made one think, and then admire. The trustees join with the pastor, in thanking Messrs. Cokely, Butler, Lee, Dailey, Cartright, Gross, Thomas, and Hays, the celebrated pianist, also Misses Grey, Lee, Beckett, Canter, King, and Mrs. Johnson, for this creditable effort to assist the Church Mrs Catherine Hawkins, made ample preparations in the basement, to satisfy the inner man.

Messrs. Johnson and Turpin, of Liberia, are here, no doubt, using all their influence for the recognition of Liberia by the United States. Their mission is good, and as they disclaim any affiliation with the American Colonization Society, their stay among us is pleasant and profitable. Privately, they express the opinion, that our only hope is in building up a negro nationality. This opinion should not belong to this age. An entirely African nationality, may be an auxiliary in our elevation, but indispensably necessary to it, never. We are happy to concede to Hayti and Liberia, the advantages of the reflex influence of their nationalities upon our people in the United States, but will never admit that emigration to either of those countries, or any other Colored Republic, Empire, or State, is the only hope for us. We believe our destiny on this continent, is inseparably joined to the now dominant race, our hopes are all bound up in the future of this, our country, (though as I have once before remarked, we have little incentive to say, "our country") There are those who

"See the triumph from afar,
And seize it with their eye!"

They see it through the smoke of battle—they hear the onward march of liberty's car, in the booming of cannon, the clanking of the sabre, and the sound of the drum as it beats to arms! Time will not allow us to dwell upon this topic, however important

To-day, we witnessed the escort of a few Secession prisoners to the prison east of the Capitol. They had just been taken in a skirmish near Fairfax. They forced a cheerful look, and "don't care" aspect, but doubtless, as they were marched in between a file of soldiers, they felt they were paying dear for the whistle. On learning for the gentleman, who Mr. Bright calls "His Excellency," Jeff Davis. A guard raising his gun, and making the trigger say "chickuck," as he cocked it, suggested to him the propriety of silence.

Paper money is getting very plentiful here, and to some considerable extent has scared away the gold and silver. So we have to support our temporal life by faith in Uncle Sam and the State banks. If men would only exercise half that faith in the great bank of Jesus, how many would be saved that will now be lost.

KEOKUK.

January 4th, 1862

To the Editor of the Recorder:

Dear Brother Weaver:—You may have thought that I have been living regardless of the claims of your valuable paper, the Christian Recorder, but this is not the case; the reverse of that is true. Lack of pecuniary means has made me seem indifferent.

Here I am, in what is known as the great city, one that was built in time of speculation; but that time has passed away some six years ago, and now, in these troublous times, four miles from the Missouri line, we have a general scarcity of money, but plenty of provisions, and no place to send them to at this season of the year. Many of the friends have promised to take the Recorder in the Spring as soon as they can get some money. I have not received any salary yet; so the winter has been rather slow with me. I would have sent my subscription or paid up the back dues before this time if it had been in my power to do so. But I could not, for I am at this time over fifty dollars behind, and my taxes unpaid. I cannot raise money enough to pay them, but still I hope for the best.

I send you one dollar, due the Recorder for 1861. Three months it was sent to Salem, Indiana, and three months to Keokuk, to the first of January. I am glad that you still remember a poor missionary in the mission of Iowa. I hope to live to repay to the Recorder the kindness of its editor by laboring more ardently for its support. I also send you the balance on those hymn-books. I sold the last one this morning. The people need books out here, but have no money to purchase them. I speak of the Church; others outside of the Church are doing better, in a financial sense.

But I think that this will be the best society in the State of Iowa after a while. The present state of religion is changing; many have thought themselves sanctified, so they have been taught that when their work was done they had no more to do but to die well. They are not dead yet, and they find that they need more grace to keep them from backsliding—yes, to enable them to labor for mourners. They learn, or are learning, that there is more required than shouting and singing ditties over souls smitten down under the weight of their sins. I find that the people must first be instructed in the Scriptures before they can make proper Christians.

We now have a protracted meeting on hand. We commenced with the new year, and are still continuing it, and we have from one to ten mourners every night on the anxious bench, but no conversions as yet. We have had one backslider reclaimed—but the Lord knows his own business, and in his own good time will send his Spirit to the relief of those that seek him with all their hearts.

Now, dear brother, pray for us, that the good Lord may help us, and that we may be delivered from the Devil and secession.

In conclusion, I have a question or so to ask. 1. Can a man be a loyal citizen or subject of Great Britain, and, at the same time, be a loyal subject or citizen of the United States? 2. Is there not a difference in the discipline of the B. M. E. Church and that of the A. M. E. Church?

Please answer the inquiries of your servant on the west side of the Mississippi. I have noticed all the published arguments in your paper on the subject, but none have answered the question.

Rev. A. F. Hall.

[Answer.—A man may be a citizen of Great Britain and live in the United States for a term of years, and be loyal to his own country, and, at the same time, be subject to the laws of the country where he is living for the time being. 2. In relation to the difference between the discipline of the A. M. E Church and that of the B. M. E. Church, there is a difference, and the initials of the names are a proof of that.—Ed.]

LETTER FROM PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Mr. Editor:—I permit me to say something about Providence station as a church in the past and present, and her future prospect. I have two objects in view:—1. To induce our people to take the paper. 2. To encourage the young ladies and gentlemen in their noble work begun for our church It may be well to say, that many of our brethren, as well as the bishops, are somewhat acquainted with the history of our church in Providence, R. I., down to the present time; therefore, for more than twenty years, our people have been riding good old Hope to obtain a permanent spot of ground to call their own, and build a house of worship upon. Now we must up and begone, and old Hope positively declares he will ride us no farther than next May, for his back is sore. This being a fact, what will become of their great name when we review the ability and point of privilege in scholastic intelligence compared to those in the land of oppression? We can but exclaim, in tones of pity, O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself

I come now to speak of the young ladies and gentlemen of our beautiful city, who, beholding the condition of the church, have risen in their majesty and formed themselves into a club of the best material in the city, which will be known hereafter by the name of "The Young Ladies' and Gentlemen's Excelsior Club." They have said something must be done As old Hope's back is sore, we will mount the horse of Action. He never fails if guided right. Hence, on Thursday, 30th ult., they gave their first grand exhibition. The earth was, and is, dressed in the beautiful garment of snow. The creaking trees, bending to the winter breeze, were beautifully hung with icicles, while the silver queen of night poured forth her rays of glory, lighting up the path for the maidens to travel securely beneath her beams at the hour of eight. The house was full The curtain rose upon a beautiful lady dressed in bridal attire, kneeling gracefully on a stool; and, while in this position, another lady, in the nun costume, presenting the bride a casket of jewels. The audience were charmed by its beauty The bride was Miss Lucy Bayo, and the nun was Miss Mary E. Johnson. Four young ladies sang a very sympathetic tune called "The Orphan's Prayer," each dressed in white. They are as handsome as the generality. The singing was delightful, and admired by all Robert and Mary Adams, brother and sister, about nine and eleven years old, sang two lovely tunes, and appeared as two little lambs. The speakers, both ladies and gentlemen, were exquisitely grand. It gladened the hearts of the aged Christians, causing them to say, "We will not despair, though we be cast down." For fear of becoming tedious, I will now speak of the gentlemen They did well. Mr. James Williams, a very promising young man for usefulness, was chosen stage-master, and acted well his part, gaining laurels that will not soon fade if he be born again May the good Lord bless him, and may he soon fill the place which God designed he should. Mr Williams was escorted by John Scott, who took an active part with the ladies. Strange to say, he is not yet a child of God by a change of heart, as we do pray for, although he will still continue to be where our young sisters take delight—in being in the house of worship. May the good Lord save him The doorkeeper, Mr. Thomas Chambers, (a married man,) is one who loves Bethel and her well being, but he is not a professor of religion, yet strictly moral. The ladies confided in him, and chose him for that responsible place. Brother C was the subject of our prayer on said evening The club realized the sum of $15 57. The people were so delighted, they asked to have it repeated. The club, though much exhausted, consented, and on Tuesday evening, the 4th inst., the place was crowded. On this evening, Miss Sarah Hall performed the part of the nun to the same bride. It far exceeded the first, because the participants were not so bashful as on the previous occasion. The proceeds added $17.28 to that of the former one. Presented to the Sinking Society, for the church, Wednesday, the 5th inst., $30.00, the expenses being small. May they thus continue in well doing until they shall see the foundation laid for a new house of God, and be the recipients of its benefits; for on such as these our church must depend. Suffice it to say, there are twenty-two of them—twelve ladies and ten gentlemen—each attached to good society. The following is the list of officers:—Miss Eliza Forrest, President; Miss Elizabeth Hall, Vice-President; Miss Maria Morris, Secretary; Miss Sarah Hall, Assistant Secretary; Miss Lucy Bayo, Treasurer; Mr T. Chambers, Guardian

Now these, and many more, wish a copy of the Recorder which contains this article. They will also buy a paper each week if sent on to them. I think the way is open for the circulation of the paper. Send me on twenty-five, and after this, twelve. Rev. George A. Rue, Pastor

Mr. Editor:—We think it would be of interest to your readers to hear how the work of God is prospering in this quarter of the vineyard. We have been holding a protracted meeting in Princeton for about three weeks, and the good Lord has been pleased to pour out his Spirit on the church. He has blessed the feeble efforts of the church and its pastor, and many souls have come forward to the altar, falling down as did the jailer before the apostles, crying out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do to be saved?" Westrove to point them to the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world, and to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and they should be saved. We thank God, that many that sought have found salvation, through our Lord Jesus Christ. They now tell us that they enjoy peace which the world did not give, and cannot take away. We closed our meeting on last evening, with a love-feast. We had a blessed season. The Lord was in our midst, and to own and bless us. We have taken in fifty-one on probation, and a large number of them are Sabbath School children.

May God bless and keep them all faithful until death, and bring them to his kingdom. Our prayer is, that the word of God may run, and His name be glorified until the whole earth is filled with the knowledge of Him. We have formed a new class at Grigstown, and made it one of our regular appointments. We have about twenty persons, and we hope to get more We are going on with our new church in Princeton, and we hope we shall be able to have it consecrated during the session of the Annual Conference in Trenton. Pray for us, that God may continue his blessing on us

A GREAT CRY IN THE FOG, AND CLOUDS, DARKNESS AND GLOOM.

Who is right—the General Conference, Bishop Nazrey, or those brethren who write on the subject? Now, Mr. Editor, they cannot all three be right. Somebody must be wrong in this case. What would be the result if we who are in the dark would exclaim aloud to the world that all three are wrong, and let it go for what it will until the sitting of our next General Conference—and then and there let all acknowledge to their wrong, and promise before the great Head of the Church to try and do better for the time to come? Let us act like Christians. Dear brother, I know it is hard for one to suffer and all the rest gonn their way rejoicing; but, if it cannot be settled before then, let us all suffer together, and wait patiently till our change comes

Oh! that we could for each other care
And each the other's burden bear:
And to the Church of Christ the pattern give,
And show how true believers should live

Now, dear brother, a writer to the Recorder of January 18th, 1862, strikes a heavy blow, and that not at the foot of our beloved Zion. He says that the two associate Bishops, in all the Conferences which they held from 1856 to 1860, decided that Bishop Nazrey was legally a Bishop in both the A. M. E. and B M E. Churches. He says, in this capacity they not only acknowledged him, but did also labor and act with him. Now, sir, we believe they might have submitted to it for the time being, for peace-sake—but, sir, we can never believe they decided its legality. Sir, this is something we cannot believe, unless you get us out of the fog. Now, Mr. Editor, in looking over your respectable sheet, some of our good brethren put me in mind of a circumstance that transpired in my boyhood. I lived in a village where there was a great excitement created by a band of robbers, who broke into a certain wealthy gentlemen's house, and the proprietor hearing them, he ran to find the place at which they came in; and while he was thus engaged, the robbers got a large sum of money belonging to him, and escaped in another way! Now, sir, reason teaches us that he had better have got the robbers out first, and then shut up the place they got in at. By doing so he might have saved his money

Now our good brethren refer us to the General Conferences, and to motions, and movers of motions, as though they were searching diligently for the place where the wrong got in; and it appears that nobody is trying to get the wrong out, but all appear to be searching for the place to get in at Come, mark the place there. He might have save[illegible] money."

Look well at this, and interpret it in your own mind The B M E Church has made a start and we should take great care that the same spirit does not come across the lake. We love our Bishops and brethren.

Please suffer me to ask the question,—What right has Queen Victoria's Cabinet to request Mr Lincoln to resign his office of President, and all pertaining thereto, before he presents it to them to whom he belongs?—or what right has he to submit to such an unreasonable request?—or what right has he to go over to Great Britain, and sit at the head of affairs, and still claim his former right in the United States?

Dear brother, compare the two cases together, and the one appears to us, in the fog, just as legally as the other. Dear brother, because the Lord permits man to sin, we should not say it is lawful for us to sin. God forbid!

Yours fraternally, Old Gum

A DISCOVERY OF INCONSISTENCIES.

Mr Editor:—It does seem to me, sir, that the subject, whether Bishop Nazrey belongs to the B. M. E Church, or to the A. M. E. Church, as discussed now for a long time in the Christian Recorder, is a most perplexing one. When I saw first this subject brought out before the public, I did not once think, that it could be made so embarrassing, as it turns out to be. I do not think that I ever saw a subject discussed, in the course of investigation, with less consistency.

The General Conference of 1860, decided most positively, that Bishop Nazrey was, at the sitting of that Conference, "identified with the Canadian Church," by which decision, I suppose, she meant for us to understand, that he was a member of said Church, and also an officiating Bishop at that time; at least Dr. Revels, and others seem to have so understood said General Conference. How Bishop Nazrey came to be such property of the Canadian Church seems not to be clear, in the minds of some. Bishop Nazrey, on the 12th page of the same General Conference Minutes, states most emphatically that he stood then, in the same relation to the A. M E. Church, that he had formerly stood. Well, we know that he was a member and a Bishop in the A. M. E. Church, formerly. Now, then, either the General Conference, or Bishop Nazrey is wrong, unless it were possible for Bishop Nazrey to hold membership, and officiate as Bishop in two different and distinct denominations, at one and the same time, denominations known throughout the land by different names; and denominations, too, existing in different countries: one in the United States, and the other in British America. This, I contend, is impracticable. Hence, we here see a wonderful discrepancy, indeed. Now, one of three things is true and certain, and no two of them can be, as I shall undertake to show.

When the division took place, and when the B. M. E. Church withdrew from the A. M. E. Church, and when these two organizations became two and distinct, as they now stand, Bishop Nazrey went with one or the other of these organizations, or he was left outside of both of them. Now I hold that one of these things is true, and no two of them can be. For instance he could not go with the B. M E Church, and hold his membership there, and be out of that Church at the same time, or he could not go with the A. M. E. Church, and hold his membership in that Church, and be out of it at the same time, nor could he have gone with both of said church organizations, and hold his membership properly, in each one of them at one and the same time. These are the three conditions in which he never could have been placed, only one, at one, and the same time. Where is the consistency, then, or agreement of the statements of the General Conference and Bishop Nazrey, made in the General Conference of 1860? Who is wrong? It is evident that somebody is.

But still there are other inconsistencies to be noticed. If Bishop Nazrey officiated in the B. M E. Church, it could not have been legal, unless he held his membership in that Church, at the same time; and if he held his membership in that Church, then he would have to resign that membership, before ever he could become a legitimate member anywhere else, after which resignation he would be obliged to attach himself to any other church of his choice, before he could be considered or held as a member of such church; and in the neglect of this duty, he could not be otherwise than considered or held, as being outside of all churches, and of course this would prevent him from enjoying the privileges or immunities of any church, while he remained in this condition; nor could he make one motion in the way of officiating, as officer or member, without being considered an intruder, and that properly.

Now, I know it is said, that Bishop Nazrey did resign the B. M. E Church. Well, that will do; he had a right to resign that Church, if it were his pleasure to do so. But this goes to show that he belonged there, else he could never have resigned: a man certainly could never give up a thing he had never owned. But the next question is, did he join the A. M. E Church after he had resigned the B M. E. Church? if he did, I have not been informed of that fact. Now, if it be true, that he has not joined the A. M E. Church, since he resigned the B. M E. Church, in what sense can he claim to be a member and Bishop of the A. M. E. Church? or with what propriety can any body else claim it for him? I ask this question in view of the fact, that if a member of the B. M E. Church should withdraw from that Church, nobody in the A. M. E. Church, nor in the world would consider such a person a member of the A. M. E. Church before he had attached himself to that Church. Such a person could not claim membership in the A. M. E. Church before joining it, by virtue of having been a member of the B. M. E. Church. I could not, with any sense or propriety whatever, claim membership in the B. M. E. Church without joining it, on the account of having once belonged to the A. M. E. Church: it would be perfectly ridiculous for me to come to such a conclusion. Now, then, what are the facts in Bishop Nazrey's case? Why, if I knew which one of the church organizations he went with, in the division of the churches as named above, and if I knew how often he had resigned since; and if I knew what church or churches he has attached himself to since such resignation, I would know then precisely where to go to find him, and in that way I would put a stop to any further wrangling or jangling on the subject.

If what we have said be correct, then Bishop Nazrey knows to-day what his true position is, better than any other living man. But I must make this remark before I close: Bishop Nazrey must certainly have known, or at least he should have known, that it was impossible for him to have held the same relation to the A. M. E. Church, at the sitting of the General Conference of 1860, as he had formerly held, because, on the 10th page of the same General Conference Minutes, as referred to above, we see that the General Conference passed a resolution to give him time to meet the Conference of the B. M E Church before he should resign his relations with the B. M. E. Church, which British M E. Conference was to sit a number of days after the adjournment of said General Conference. What, then, was there to hinder him from knowing what his true position was? The Committee on Canadian affairs, as we read, page 52 of said Minutes, seems to have had the same idea of the impracticability of double Episcopal functions, that we have already advanced, showing it to be contrary to the co-animo of our church government; and I would add not only contrary to ours, but to all other regularly organized church government throughout Christendom

GREAT SPEECH BY JOHN S. ROCK.

John S Rock, Esq., made an exceedingly able address at the Anniversary of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, held in Allston Hall, Boston, on the 22d ult. The Boston Herald, a Pro-Slavery Democratic sheet, says: "John S. Rock, Esq., the colored member of the Suffolk Bar, made the ablest, most ingenious, and most sensible speech of the day." The Boston Journal says it was "a most brilliant argument. Mr. Garrison, who was to be the next speaker, said he could add nothing to what had been so ably said; apologized to the audience, and declined to speak after Mr. Rock. The audience declined to excuse him, when he said, with much earnestness of feeling:—

"Mr. President:—It is too late, I think, for me to make even a brief speech; and I feel extremely reluctant to intrude upon your time, or your bodily endurance, as a mere matter of courtesy or kindness. It seems to me, that, after the speech to which we have listened, nothing need be added to deepen the impression of this audience in the right direction, in favor of the cause of the oppressed. Had I not better sit down? (Loud cries of "Go on," "Go on.") I will, then, say a few words. (Great applause.)

"One such speech as that which has just been made is a complete and triumphant answer to all the folly and nonsense that we have heard for so many years in regard to the intellect and the possibilities of the black man (applause)—whether he is an inferior being or not—whether he is capable of civilization—whether, if free, he can take care of himself—like other men. Is there a man in this house who would not be proud to be able to make such a speech, whatever his complexion? I, for one, hesitate about going on after its delivery (applause)—a speech so well reasoned, and so thoroughly conclusive in all its positions."

A Large Communion.—From twelve to fifteen hundred persons partake of the sacrament each communion day, at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's. This large number are served by eight deacons, and so perfect are the arrangements that the service of the bread and wine are each completed within from five to six minutes, and all without the slightest appearance of haste.

Churches in New York.—The Journal of Commerce says:

"Speaking of churches, many of them are in a hard way in this city. In the large, aristocratic, up-town houses of worship, where the salaries are $5,000 or $6,000 per year, and the aggregate expenses nearly double this amount, there is financial distress. Most of the pew-holders are men of reputed wealth, but the failures and losses of the war exert a powerful influence, and fearfully cripple their resources. Large assessments for church purposes are met with reluctance, and the funds for parish expenditures are collected with difficulty. Even the benevolent and charitable contributions of many of those hitherto prolific-in-good-deeds places of religious worship, are largely restricted and greatly reduced

Died.

Mr. Editor—The painful duty again devolves upon us of recording the death of a beloved brother, Phoenix Titus, who departed this life on Wednesday, the 29th of January, 1862, in the 46th year of his age.

He was one of the founders of the A. M. E. Church, in Rocky Hill. He has been an exemplary Christian, and his deportment in life proved that he had been with Christ and learned of him to be meek and lowly in heart. But in his last illness, which lasted about five months, he exhibited great patience and Christian resignation to the will of his Heavenly Father

We had the opportunity to visit him several times, and he seemed to be getting stronger and stronger in the faith of Christ. A few days before his death we called to see him, and he said, "Brother Gould, you do not know how glad I am to see you. I love to have you sing and pray for me. It strengthens my soul."

He also referred back to a previous visit made by Elder Campbell in company with myself. He said, "Ever since you and Elder Campbell was here and prayed for me, I have had more light than I ever had before." These words were encouragement to us to try to be more faithful in the discharge of our duty in visiting the sick

Brother Titus suffered much in body, but his suffering is now over, and he is resting from his labors. He has left a widow and four children to mourn his loss; but while they mourn the loss of an indulgent husband and father, and the Church one of its pillars, we believe that their loss is his infinite gain. May God bless Sister Titus and her children, and may they not forget to put their trust in the widow and orphan's God Rev T. Gould,

Pastor of Princeton Charge.

Died, in this city, on the 20th ultimo, Miss E. H. Thomas, formerly of Wilmington, Del.

About seven years ago she became a member of the Hanover Street Presbyterian Church in that city

During the last four years of the period that she resided here, she worshipped with the congregation of the Lombard Street Central Church, and, by her death, this church, its choir and Sabbath School, have lost a true friend and a most efficient and useful laborer.

Useful while in health, and patient in sickness, her end was triumphant, and she passed from earth away to heaven, like a weary infant to its mother's arms.

"When faith is strong, and conscience clear,
And words of peace the spirit cheer,
And visioned glories half appear,
'Tis joy—'tis triumph—then to die"

TRIBUTE

TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. PLATO LEE, DECEASED, BY HER PASTOR, DR. LYNCH.

She lived a life devoted to the cross,
She showed her faith by works of love:
The storm might rage, and the billows toss
She kept her sacred trust above.

Attentive to her duties all,
No lack of zeal, or careless ease
Was [illegible] in her all,
She ever sought Christ she strove to please

If this be so, why weep for her
Whom God hath taken to the skies?
Methinks in heaven her voice I hear, [illegible]
With angels' notes, "where pleasure never

Let Georgetown Church her pattern take,
[illegible]
Be like her as like Christ she was,
That they may live, when dead, a life anew.

Missions.

Rev. Herbert Carter, missionary of the Wesleyan Church, at Ocho-Rios, Jamaica, died on the 29th of September.

The Missionary's Reward.—Mr. Mahan, a missionary in a heathen land, had been preaching on the Lord's day about heaven; at the evening he was standing by the bed of a dying convert from idolatry. "Teacher," said the dying man, "I understand that you have been preaching about heaven to-day; before another Lord's day I shall be there, and the first thing I shall do after I get there, will be to go to Jesus, and thank him for sending you from your home across the ocean to this dark land, to teach us poor heathen the way to heaven; and then I shall return to the gates of Paradise, and there wait, wait, until you come; then I will take you by the hand and lead you to Jesus, and tell Him, "This is the man that taught me the way hither."

Madagascar.—The news from Madagascar is most encouraging. The young Christian king, who has succeeded his pagan and persecuting mother, is openly favorable to Christianity. A great deal of manœuvering has been employed by various parties, both religious and political, to get possession and control of the young king's mind; but he is said to be decidedly favorable to Protestantism, and to English Protestantism. The real evangelization of Madagascar would be a great acquisition to the kingdom of Christ. While we regret apostacies at home, yet on the whole religion is making vast progress in the world, while great and effectual doors and fields white unto the harvest are presenting themselves in all parts of the earth.—Church Guardian.

Christians in Syria.—An interesting writer of sketches upon Syria, in the Halifax Presbyterian Witness, gives, in a description of the different religionists of the Holy Land, the following:—

The Christians next deserve notice. Under this designation are included Greeks, Greek Catholics, Maronites, Armenians, Jacobites or Syrian Christians, Latins, &c. We must remember that the term Christian, in Syria is merely the name by which a party is known, and conveys no idea of the character of those bearing that name, such as we are accustomed to associate with it. For these so-called Christians are one in language, one in habit, one in character, in almost every particular, with those around them. They are even more vindictive than their Mahomedan neighbors; and had they the power so missionary would be tolerated in the country, and Moslem blood would flow as freely as theirs has done by Moslem hands. I am not speaking at random. During my brief stay in the country, two missionaries were obliged to fly for their lives from Zahleh, the only Christian town in Syria. The house of one of the missionaries was attacked by the mob led on by the clergy; volleys of stones were sent in at the windows; the house was then entered and everything upon which they could lay their hands was hurled into the street, chairs, tables, beds, books, &c., all shared the common fate, while the missionary made good his escape with his family by a back way. When the French army entered Lebanon, crowds of these model Christians followed in its train, and feeling themselves secure under its protection, mercilessly butchered every Druse, man, woman and child that happened to fall into their hands. To say that they were revenging the blood of their friends is no palliation for such revolting crimes.

Help for Missions for India.—The Foreign Missionary Department of the Methodist Episcopal Church says:—

Our missions in India are growing in favor with the people, as indicated by the very liberal support they give them. In a letter from Rev Dr. Butler to the Corresponding Secretary, dated at Bijnear, Nov. 16th, he says:

"I feel satisfied now that we shall raise more money in India this year than ever before in one year. Send us the men we need, and must have, and if any one asks why, tell them publicly that our friends in India will pay down this year at least 15,000 rupees ($7,500) to have them sent, a large portion of which will take the form of regular annual income. Do this, and the stream of our prosperity cannot be stopped. God and man beckon us onward, and onward we must go. I am just finishing my round of visitation. All well throughout the mission."

Trouble for Missionary Funds.—The Lutheran Church in this country, has important missions in the foreign field, especially in India. We are informed that the troubles of the times render it quite difficult for the Executive Committee of Foreign Missions to meet their financial engagements with the laborers now engaged in India. The secession of the South has decreased the receipts, as that section of the church contributed with the rest to this common object. The failure of the session of the General Synod, last spring, was also detrimental to the treasury of the Committee. With a view of meeting this difficulty, the Executive Committee contemplate sending Dr. Strobel, one of their number, on a collecting tour to visit some of the churches in Pennsylvania.

A New Missionary Paper:—The Evangeliste, a French Methodist paper, informs us that a new missionary journal has made its appearance in the French Evangelical church, with the following title, "Evangelical Missions of the Nineteenth century: a monthly paper, giving an account of all missionary labors." It is published by the missionary Society at Basle, and edited by Rev. L. Nagel. Besides missionary news, this journal contains the most interesting and instructive histories of missionary labors in the past.

Religious Intelligence.

Effect of Kindness.—A servant of the Rev. Rowland Hill very lately died, and his master preached his funeral sermon to a numerous audience; in the course of which he mentioned the following anecdote: Many persons present were acquainted with the deceased, and have had it in their power to observe his character and conduct. They can bear witness that I speak the truth, when I assert that for a considerable number of years past he has proved himself a perfectly sober, honest, industrious, and religious man, faithfully performing, as far as lay in his power, the duties of his station in life, and serving God with constancy and zeal; and yet this very man, this virtuous and pious man, was once a robber on the highway. More than thirty years ago, he stopped me on the high road, and demanded my money. Not at all intimidated, I argued with him. I asked him what could induce him to pursue so iniquitous a course of life? "I have been a coachman, sir," said he, "but am now out of place, and not being able to get a character, can obtain no employment, and am, therefore, obliged to resort to this means of gaining subsistence." I desired him to call upon me; he promised he would, and kept his word. I talked further with him, and offered to take him into my service. He consented, and ever since that period he has served me faithfully, and not me only, but he has faithfully served his God. And instead of having finished his life in a public, ignominious manner, with a depraved and hardened mind, as he probably would soon have done, he has died in peace, rejoicing in hope, and prepared, we trust, for the society of just men made perfect. Till this day, this extraordinary occurrence has been confined to his breast and mine; I have never mentioned it even to any dearest friend . . . a London paper dated 1800

Personal.

Edward Peet, A. M., a well known and successful Professor in the New York Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, died on the 27th ult., at Washington Heights, New York city.

Mr. Isaac Tunnell, who has been for fifty-four years Cashier of the Farmers' Bank of the State of [illegible] at Bridgeton, and for the last [illegible] Bank Cashier in the United States, has resigned his office, and is now in the 94th year of his age.

George Douglass, a well-known citizen, of Douglass Farms, Flushing, Long Island, and one of the most liberal supporters of the Bible and other benevolent institutions, died on Saturday evening, the 1st instant

T. J. Conolly, Principal for several years of the High School at Kenosha, Wis., has been captain of Company L, First Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry—a company that is called the Teachers' Company, from its being made up mainly of teachers in Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, says, in his late annual message to the Legislature of Massachusetts, "I deplore the presence of the penalty of death still lingering in the statute-book of Massachusetts."

Dr A. W. Mitchell, formerly of this city, and well-known for his prominent connexion with the Presbyterian Board of Publication, and other enterprises of the Presbyterian Church, died on Saturday, the 18th ult., after two days' sickness, at St. Louis, Missouri.

Domestic Items.

From the Upper Potomac—A Flag of Truce Disgraced—The Torch Again Applied to Harper's Ferry.—Sandy Hook, Md., February 7th.—This morning Captain Baylor and three of his men (rebels) ensconsed themselves behind a stone wall, just above Harper's Ferry bridge, while a black man, (or a white man painted to represent a negro,) by displaying a flag of truce, induced a loyal Virginian to go over. When nearly across, Baylor and two others fired at and killed the ferryman. Our batteries on the Heights then shelled the buildings, and subsequently a party of Federal troops crossed and set fire to twelve houses, including the Wager House and another hotel, the railroad buildings, etc. The whole lower part of the town is now in ashes

A necessity existed for burning these buildings, as they have afforded a hiding place to rebel ruffians, who have been annoying our troops for weeks

The number of the rebels was not ascertained, but many were seen to mount their horses and leave for the outskirts of the town by the Charleston road.

This afternoon a rebel flag of truce, in the hands of three of Baylor's men, came to the ferry, but they were warned off by Col. Geary.

A large rebel mounted picket was stationed all the afternoon near Bolivar.

An important reconnoissance of Fairfax Court House was made, on Friday, by Col. Friedman's cavalry regiment. Our troops captured fourteen men and ten horses, and gained valuable information in regard to the position of the enemy.

This is the first regiment which has passed so far beyond Fairfax since the Bull Run affair.

The subject of enrolling free negroes into the military service of Virginia, came up in the House of Delegates in that State on the 4th inst. Various propositions were made as to the term of service to be exacted, and the manner in which the enrolment should be performed. In the course of the debate on the subject, Mr. Rives said: "If it were in his power he would convert them all (free negroes) into slaves to-morrow."

The Riot in Richmond.—Baltimore, Feb. 8.—From Richmond papers, we learn that a serious disturbance broke out in Richmond, on Tuesday night last, which for a time threatened disastrous consequences to life and property.

It is said to have first commenced in a drunken brawl. At this a crowd collected, which soon grew to formidable proportions. Three or four persons are said to have been killed, among whom were some of the police.

Houses, stores, &c., were broken open and ransacked, and it seemed impossible to check the violent proceedings until late the following morning, when many engaged in the mob retired of their own accord.

The Dispatch, speaking of this affair, calls it a disgrace to the city, and shameful in the extreme It calls for the city to be instantly placed under martial law. The citizens (women especially) were greatly alarmed.

Rowdyism in Richmond.—The occurrences of Monday night, we think, ought to satisfy every person that it is time the strong arm of power was put forth to hold in check the spirit of lawless brutality now rampant in Richmond. It is time, too, that we should call things by their right names; for, disguise it as we may, the city is at this time infested with a gang of ruffians, whose presence, morally speaking, is as much to be deprecated as that of the enemy of our race. The shameful practices of drunkards, libertines and profligates, who have neither sensibility, honor nor shame, are not natural to the South; and it is with pain and regret that we contemplate the introduction here of these controlling elements of Northern Society.

Victory on the Tennessee River—Our Gunboats Attack and Reduce Fort Henry.—Cincinnati, Feb. 7.—The expedition against Fort Henry, on the Tennessee, has been entirely successful, and the fort is now in the possession of the Federal troops.

[illegible]

St. Louis, Feb. 7th,—The following is announced from Headquarters:

"Fort Henry is ours.

"The Flag of the Union is re-established on the soil of Tennessee. It will never be removed.

"By command of Major General Halleck.

"W. W. Smith, Captain and Aid-de-Camp."

[illegible]

Cairo, Ill., Feb. 7th.—Fort Henry, on the Tennessee river, surrendered yesterday afternoon, at two o'clock, after a determined resistance.

The fight lasted an hour and twenty minutes, being conducted by the gunboats Cincinnati, Essex and Saint [illegible]

The gunboat Cincinnati fired one hundred and twenty-five rounds, and received thirty-four shots from the rebel guns. Only one man was killed.

The St. Louis fired one hundred and ten guns, and received no damage.

The Essex was disabled at the tenth round by a ball striking her boiler.

Thirty-two of her crew were killed, being scalded to death

Captain Porter was badly scalded, but not dangerously.

One rebel general, one colonel, two captains, and one hundred privates were taken prisoners

The fort mounted seventeen guns.

The land force did not reach the scene of action for two hours after the surrender.

The Mound City and [illegible] miles above the fort, has been taken possession of by our troops.

The Victory in Tennessee.—Our gallant navy has added another to its already brilliant list of victories. Fort Henry, situated on the [illegible] of the Tennessee river, just on the State line of Kentucky and Tennessee, has been reduced by our gallant Western navy, and the rebel flag which lately flaunted from its intrenchments has been replaced by the glorious stars and stripes. The official report published regarding the capture states that the gunboats Essex, Carondolet, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Conestoga, Taylor, and Lexington, under the command [illegible] quarter's bombardment of Fort Henry, forced the rebels to surrender unconditionally that fortification. The fort contained twenty guns and seventeen mortars, and was gallantly defended by General Tilghman, who, with his staff and sixty prisoners, surrendered to the Federal forces. The Federal loss, as far as known, is put down at nine killed, twenty five wounded, and five missing, while the rebels state that their loss was five killed and ten wounded. About four thousand rebel soldiers were encamped outside of the intrenchments, but when the bombardment [illegible] fugitives to oppose our gunboats The soldiers must have been panic-stricken, for they abandoned every thing [illegible] their flight. A vast deal of plunder fell into the hands of the Federal troops, including a large [illegible] of ordnance stores. As a strategic point, the Federal possession of Fort Henry [illegible]

It is reported and credited by some [illegible] that the rebel troops from Fort Henry [illegible] to the rebel cause, but took advantage [illegible] tunity offered by the attack to run away from a fight that was distasteful to them.

Evacuation of Romney, Va by the Rebels.—Pittsburg, Feb. 7.—The Wheeling Intelligencer of yesterday says: "We learn from a [illegible] that the rebels evacuated Romney on Monday night last. They either feared an attack from [illegible] from contemplated making one in another direction.

General Lander, having been reinforced marched on Thursday at the head of between seven and eight thousand troops, upon the enemy stationed at Romney.

The rebel forces were about equal to his own. They declined fighting, however, and retreated across the river, destroying the wire bridge in their rear, and running off, probably to Winchester.

Arrest of Brigadier General Stone!—General Stone, commanding a division of the army on the Upper Potomac, was, on Sunday, arrested by the military authorities in Washington, and he is now safely lodged in Fort Lafayette. Ever since the disastrous affair at Ball's Bluff, when the lamented Baker fell, vague suspicions have existed in regard to his capacity and loyalty, and they have culminated in his arrest. The charges preferred against him are of a most serious nature, and if they are sustained he will meet the fate of a traitor.

New Orleans, Feb. 7.—Four hundred and ninety-two prisoners left yesterday for North Carolina, to be exchanged.

Another Victory.—General Burnside captured Roanoke Island, North Carolina, on Sunday afternoon. A Baltimore despatch states that we have taken a large number of prisoners, captured two gunboats, and sunk or dispersed the others. As the fight lasted three days, the [illegible] must have been [illegible] of us to retire without [illegible]

Roanoke Island was defended by a rebel army variously estimated at from ten to fifteen thousand men, under command of Brigadier Gen. Henry A. Wise, ex-Governor of Virginia.

Foreign Summary.

It has often been said that, while Christian nations have borne the best of blessings to the heathen, so also have they the worst of vices. The Bardarshak, a Hindoo paper, recently charged upon England the guilt of introducing drunkenness in its worst forms, especially among the young men of Bengal. Not, it says, that this vice is taught in English books, or is formed merely from the study of the English language, but "the true reason of the prevalence of the vice is to be found in the residence of Englishmen in the country. The multiplication of gin-shops in the land is owing to the English people." This is an awful charge for a heathen country to bring against a pre-eminently Christian one.

The Roman Catholic leaders have recently given another instance of the care with which they look after the reading of their followers. Under the auspices of the Society of St. Nicholas, of Lyons, and Paris, they have brought out an expurgated edition of Sir Walter Scott's novels, carefully removing everything that made an unfavorable allusion in any way to the Romish Church. What right has any man, or body of men, to make a man now dead not speak what he did speak, or seem to speak what he actually never did speak in any way? Is not the system that does this or fosters it a deceiver and a lie?

Ocean Telegraphs operations are expensive. The famous Atlantic Telegraph sunk £300,000.—the Red Sea, £800,000; and now, Messrs. Glass, Elliott & Co., the makers of the Atlantic Cable, offer to lay one from Milford Haven to Halifax, and have it completed by July, 1862, for £700,000. Ere long, at these rates, a cable might be laid across the ocean out of the gold and silver expended in these works!

A moral movement of much moment has just been set on foot in Switzerland. It is the formation of a Society, in an earnest, zealous spirit, for promoting a better sanctification of the Lord's Day throughout that country. It has branches in various places, and promises much good.

The Church of England has lately shown, in a somewhat unusual manner, its ability sometimes to become all things to all men, that it may gain some. Not long since, a man wished to be admitted to her membership, but desired to be baptized by immersion. This wish was granted, and in a public manner, and with considerable display, the rite was thus administered.

An important Bill has just been passed by the Chamber of Peers, of Wurtemburgh. It denies to the Government the right to permit "the Order of the Jesuits, or any other Order or congregation allied to it, to settle in the country without being authorised thereto by law." Another Bill was passed, by 24 years to 14 nays, providing that civil rights are independent of religious persuasions—thus, among other things, emancipating the Jews.

A new Methodist Church has just been opened at Dieu-le-Fit, Department of Drome, France, with very encouraging prospects. It seats five hundred persons, and is constructed with sliding doors, so that hundreds who may not be able to find room within may well hear the gospel on the outside. The people around gladly received the word, and great good is doing.

The Emperor of France has just purchased from Prince Anatole Demidoff the San Martino Museum, of the Isle of Elba, at the goodly sum of 1,500,000 francs. This Museum derives its special interest to all Frenchmen from the fact that it is entirely made up of souvenirs of the first Napoleon, and is therefore a special remembrance of him.

Singular as it may seem, Mormonism is largely successful in infatuating the minds of many in England. In the three counties of Warwick, Salop, and Stafford, there are said to be eighteen hundred, and the Mormon Conference recently held at Birmingham was large. At this meeting the Mission which had been made to Ireland was reported to have been an entire failure.

The habits of Queen Victoria since the death of the Prince Consort have a peculiar air of sadness. While at the apartments of the Royal family due regard is paid to economy, such of the relatives or connexions as may be visiting there, she admits but one at a time to be with her at her table. For this, each is selected in turn. All other company is rigidly excluded, and she preserves the strictest retirement. Her grief is deep and genuine.

A most liberal collection for religious purposes is just reported in Scotland. It was in the case of the Free College Church, of which Rev. Dr. Buchanan is pastor, in Glasgow. The Rev. Dr. Guthrie, of Edinburgh, preached from Acts 12. 5, and the object was to clear off a debt which was upon the church. The collection taken up was £2,654 sterling, or over $13,000 of our money. Truly, this was liberal.

JESUS WEPT

John xi. 35.

Jesus wept! Why, Saviour didst thou weep?
What mean those tears the living stream?
Couldst thou not break the bruised reed,
And rob the grave of all its fear?

That man, poor fallen man, should shed
A thousand bitter drops of grief,
That one a wretch like it bleed,
Earth a world should for without relief.

Were but the bitter pangs wrung
From fruit of sin's forbidden tree
The tears are shed by conscience stung
By fangs from which it can't flee

But, Saviour, thou no sin didst know,
Thy holy heart from guile was free,
From thy pure orbit gushed the flow
The tears thou wept, were not for thee

No, no! but thy responsive heart,
Thrilled to the wail of others' woe,
Thou felt'st thy soft affections start
When others' tears began to flow

When Martha's sobbing voice awoke
The muscle of a brother's pain
When Mary's gushing spirit spoke
In sad, responsive tones, the same,

O, then, for those thy heart so near,
Thy meekly lifted eyes did weep.
And from thy quick deep fountain clear,
Thy sympathetic tears did leap

The wasting form before thee laid,
Immured in cold corruption's cave.
To thee, O Saviour, was not dead,—
Thou mighty conq'ror of the grave

Thou knewest that thine almighty word
Would pierce the dull, cold ear of death;
That, at the summons of the Lord.
The wasting lungs would heave with breath

Thou knewest that ere thy tears were dry,
Lazarus upon thy neck would weep;
That ere was spent the sister's sigh,
Her bounding heart with joy would leap

Then wept! but, O, 'twas not the grief
Of Mary's—Martha's heavy heart;
Thy tender soul sought sweet relief,
To share in others' griefs a part

Perhaps thy heaven directed eye
Raised it before the great white throne,
The weeping spirit back ward fly
Again in cumbrous flesh to groan

Perhaps the motive of thy sigh
In Lazarus',—not his sisters' tears;
Not in the grave, but in the sky,
Perchance, thy cause of grief appears

As on a rude and treach'rous tide,
The storm-chased sailor sighs for home,
And long, 'mid heaving waters wide,
Prays for a safe and quick return

And when, at last, far off, he sees
His snow-white cottage on the shore,
He bends to Heaven his grateful knees,
Thanks God for sight of Home once more.

And, bounding to the long sought shore,
With kiss his waiting children greets;
And now within his cottage door,
To friends at home his tale repeats

Could now some hard and sad decrease,
Tear him from home's delightful charms,
And hurl him back beyond the sea,
Again to battle with its storms;

O, then his failing heart might know,
A tithe of what a spirit pure,
Who's left this stormy world below,
And made the port of bliss secure—

Endures, when, summoned from the skies
To wear its load of flesh again;
To fight once more, to win the prize,
Once more to sin, and suffer pain

So, thus, 'twas meet thy power to prove,
And stubborn unbelief to slay,
To drag a spirit from above,
Again to wear its house of clay

No doubt then also didst bewail
Man's sin, and bold rebellion vile;
What curses o'er his heart prevail.
How guilt and sin his soul defile.

No doubt the thought of Joseph's tomb,
Which open for thy body lay,
Cast o'er thy mind a sad'ning gloom,
And wrapt thy spirit in dismay.

The grave, a lesson bad for thee,
Which man, alas! too rarely heeds;
It told how dreadful sin must be,
Which such severe chastisement needs

At Lazrus' grave this truth I scan,
Faith hath in sacred silence trod,—
Thy quaking tears do prove thee, MAR.—
The bursting grass proclaims thee—God

Baltimore, Md. SWAYNE.

THE MODEL YOUNG WOMAN.

1. The model young woman takes care of her health by a proper observance of the laws of health in all ways, but especially with regard to diet, dress, and exercise. Her diet is simple and sparing. Her dress is so constructed as to keep her person warm—especially the lower extremities—and not to impede locomotion. She exercises frequently in the open air, thus bringing the flush of health to her cheek, and sending healthy life blood, unhindered by tight lacing, to every part of her system

2. She is modest. Modesty is "synonymous with chastity, or purity of manners." There is such a thing as affecting modesty sometimes seen among women; but wherever this is witnessed, it is the sure evidence that the genuine article is missing, for it is always unaffected and natural "Unaffected modesty is the sweetest charm of female excellence, the richest gem in the diadem of their honor." Modesty is natural to women, and may be preserved by cultivating only the sweetest and purest thoughts

3 She has good taste. Taste is nice perception, or the power of perceiving and relishing excellence in human performances; it is the faculty of discerning beauty, order, congruity, proportion, symmetry, or whatever constitutes excellence. It is not altogether natural, nor is it entirely acquired, but it may be cultivated highly.

Good taste will manifest itself in the dress, and conversation, and general appearance; and will regulate all her intercourse with others, especially those of the opposite sex. It will abash the vulgar and impure, and encourage and strengthen the good. Modesty and good taste will build around the possessor a strong tower of defence.

4 She is intelligent She acquires intelligence in all suitable ways, especially by observation, reading, and conversation She looks upon the world around her as a great volume of facts wrought out by the Almighty Artificer, and pores over it for her to study; and in the tiny leaflet or the granite boulder, she sees the work of God, and endeavors to understand it. She reads good books carefully, and tries to make the facts and ideas contained therein her own. Her conversation is with the wise and good, and in it she is getting or giving truth. She knows but little about that which is called "small talk," and never practises it—such food is too frothy for her intellectual appetite.

5. She is emotional. As a well toned harp will answer quickly and accurately the fleet and most delicate touch of the player, so her heart feels deeply and acutely. The recital of the sorrows of another finds an answering chord in her heart, that echoes responsively the bitter wail. And the sight or sound of joy in others, makes her heart leap as leaps the bird which, rising from its lowly nest toward heaven, sings with quivering melody its song of praise and gladness.

6. She is self-sacrificing She is always ready to make sacrifices of her time or labor, or any thing she can, for the good of those in whom she feels an interest. And this is no mark of weakness in her, but it is noble. Christ manifested the same spirit, and it is one of the noble traits in his character.

7. She is affectionate. She loves every lovable thing Love is the mainspring of her actions. She labors for those whom she loves, because she loves them, and such is the intensity of her love, that no sacrifice can be demanded so great that she will not make it for them

8. She is pious. Her soul is the abode of her Saviour. In the light of religion, she walks as if treading upon a rock. Here she acquires her decision and strength to deny herself, and refuse to do wrong with as much firmness as she would do right with cheerfulness. This is the keystone to the arch of her character, supporting and beautifying the whole—the crown of light and purity surmounting all the rest, and sitting there as the cloven tongues sat upon the disciples at the pentecostal baptism. The hinderances to the formation of such a character, are, bad company, bad books, and bad habits. Eschew these and take firm hold of their opposites, and any young woman of ordinary cultivation and under any ordinary circumstances can become a noble and lovely character. I have directed others above. Young sisters, ponder and profit thereby.

TOO POOR TO SUBSCRIBE

The Intelligencer of New York, the organ of the Dutch Reformed Church, thus expresses itself in a late number of that paper. What is true of the Dutch Church will apply with equal force to other communions, and therefore we commend its perusal to the public in general and the readers of The Christian Recorder in particular:—

We once, in a weekly meeting, talked with a man when an agent of one of our religious societies, having presented his cause on the Sabbath, had begun to open his battery on Monday, and to pour in red hot shot for the man's individual benefit, spiked his guns in a moment by the courteous but decisive reply, "Oh, the cause is most excellent, and requires no argument, but I have got no money." So with the religious newspaper: 'The thing is admirable; it would elevate, comfort and strengthen the family that it enters, but we have no money to pay for it." Were the pies genuine, we would have no word to say. But can it be more than a wretched pretext for neglecting a religious duty on the part of the great mass of the families that of for it? Can it be that of the upwards of 30,000 families composing the Dutch Church, more than 20,000 really lack the means to provide themselves with the paper of our Church, or could not provide themselves with it without seriously jeopardizing the temporal interests of their families? The bare idea is a reflection upon these families, and an indignity to that bounteous Providence which has poured abundance into their laps.

What is the yearly cost of a religious paper? Hardly sixpence a week! Only the price of a coarse pair of shoes—for the plain blouse in which he performs his daily toils—for the mattock or spade with which he turns up the soil, and for less than many give for the privilege of ejecting disordered spittle from laboring mouths all the day long, or causing the fumes of the Indian weed to curl up around them. And will a Christian family yet tell us they cannot afford a religious paper? How, then, can they afford this superfluity, and that comfort or luxury, and it may be extravagance, which might easily be retrenched, if retrenchment were necessary to enable them to introduce into their house a positive utility, and of a kind that it becomes more valuable the better it is known, and more loved the longer its acquaintance is enjoyed. Let no family, then, which takes no religious newspaper, put it on the ground of inability to do so, but put it on the real ground of indifference to, and want of interest in the contents of such a paper, or want of disposition to bring the light and influence of such a paper to bear upon themselves in their social and individual relations.

Family Circle.

DON'T SNUB THE CHILD

Many a child has been wilted into silence, and frightened out of success, simply by being snubbed. It is very easy to snub a child; equally easy to encourage the child, and lead him on to the accomplishment of something useful

Children have strong sympathies, warm and tender hearts. They soon form attachments to those who are placed in authority over them, or else they regard them with a feeling very nearly allied to hatred. What child ever loved a cross, snappish teacher? What child ever hated a teacher or a parent who showed a loving interest in the child's success?

Very easy indeed is it to discourage the little student. He has spent an hour or two at home over a lesson which seems dull to him. Father, mother, and the big brothers, not being well versed in the subject, gave him no assistance. He goes to school, hoping that he will make a pretty good recitation. He is not quite up to the mark. "Dunce," "booby," "blockhead," says the unwise teacher. The poor little fellow's heart sinks all the way to his ankles. What ess is there of his trying? He is a booby. Why should he learn any thing? Has not his teacher, who certainly knows, told him that he is a dunce? Is not his head made of mahogany? He feels it to see, and as he goes home with tearful eyes, he despairs of ever succeeding, sits down in a fit of sulky despondency, and makes a positive failure in his lesson for the next day. Had the teacher encouraged him a little, kindly pointed out to him his deficiency, and showed him how to set his faults right, he might have come the next day with a merry heart, a cheerful face, and a well learned lesson.

Another little disciple comes bounding home from school in high glee. He has done well in his lessons. He has had a good time with the other boys, coasting or skating. Who can sympathize with him, and enjoy his enjoyment, so well as his parents? He rushes into their presence. "There, now, you noisy calf!" "Wipe your feet this minute, sir." "How dare you" An extinguisher is put upon him Whether his sins have been great or small, he feels the condemnation great, and sullenly sneaks off to his room by himself, or goes to the kitchen corner, behind the stove where he soothes his ruffled feelings by stroking the cat, ensured that there is some sympathy between them even if human beings do snarl at him and discourage him.

Sunday School Times.

THE DOMESTIC TYRANT

It is to me a disgusting sight to see, as we sometimes do, the wife and child of a family kept in constant terror of the selfish bashaw at the head of the house, and ever on the watch to yield in every petty manner to his whims and fancies. Sometimes, where he is a hard wrought and anxious man, whose hard work earns his children's bread and whose life is the sole stay, it is needful that he should be deferred to in many things, but the overtasked brain and overstrained nervous system should break down or grow unequal to the task. But I am not thinking of such cases... I mean cases in which the head of the family is a great, fat, bullying, selfish man, who devours sullenly the choice dishes at dinner, and walks into all the fruit or dessert, while his wife looks on in silence, and the awe-stricken children dare not hint that they would like a little of what he is devouring I mean cases in which the man himself is extremely well dressed while his wife and children's attire is thin and bare; in which he liberally tosses about his money in the billiard room, and goes off in autumn for a tour on the continent by himself, leaving them to the joyless routine of their unvaried life It is sad to see the sudden hush that falls upon the little things when he enters the house; how their sports are cut short, and they try to steal away from the room.. Would that I were the Emperor of Russia, and such a man my subject. Should not he taste the knout? Then would he his suitable punishment, for he will never feel what worthier men would regard as the heavier penalty by far, the utter absence of confidence or real affection between him and his children when they grow up He will not mind that there never was a day when the toddling creatures set up a shout of delight at his entrance, and rushed at him and scaled him, and searched in his pockets, and pulled him about; nor that the day will never come, when, growing into men and women, they will come to him for sympathy and guidance in their little trials and perplexities O, would to think that there are parents, held in general estimation, too, to whom their children would no more think of going for kindly sympathy, than they would think of going to Nova Zembla for warmth.

Chumley Parson

IMPORTANCE OF GOOD HABITS.—Man, it has been said, is a bundle of habits, and habit is second nature. Mahomet is entertained so strong an opinion as to the power of repetition in act and thought, that he said, "All is habit to mankind, even virtue itself."

RIDICULE

Dear children, do you ever amuse yourselves by laughing at the defects of others? Some persons spend most of their time in this way Even in the presence of the deformed person, they are as rude and unfeeling as to laugh at him If any of my little readers engage in this sinful sport please think of this scriptural question, Why maketh thee to differ? God is no respecter of persons. He looks not at the outward appearance, but at the heart. Is he then pleased with your conduct? Your are breaking the command, Love your neighbor as yourself. Take this for my motto:

Be sure I others kin I and true
As I'd have others be to you.
And neither do nor say to men,
Whate'er you would not take again.

Do you remember the account of the forty children who were torn to pieces by bears, when mocking the prophet Elisha? If not, read it in 2d Kings, second chapter, and think of it when disposed to deride any one. That this may be more firmly fixed in your memory, I will tell you the story of little Elsie. A short time after the number of inhabitants, in the quiet village of Woodville, had been increased by the removal thither of Mr. Walcott's family, Mary Page, the minister's only child, and Lydia Howard, a daughter of the physician, made a formal call on Miss Sophie Walcott. Among her first inquiries was, which one of their playmates they liked the best. The both instantly replied Elsie Smith "Who is she?" "Her mother was a crazy woman who wandered here with Elsie. She died a few weeks after, and Mr. Smith, out of compassion, took her to his home, where she has lived. They are very poor, but you could not help liking Elsie, she is so kind and good." "Do you think I would visit a little poor child? No, indeed! My mother would not permit me to have any thing to do with such a girl" "My mother says we should be very kind to orphan Elsie," replied Mary. Lydia was influenced by Sophie's words, and, from that time, they only spoke of Elsie to ridicule her But Mary was taught to admire worth, in whatever form it presented itself.

The next summer, Aunt Nancy Smith went to visit her married daughter, leaving Elsie to take care of Uncle Peter. On Saturday evening, Elsie felt very tired, having been busy all day, that there might be nothing to do on the Sabbath. Sophie and Lydia wishing some amusement, and curious to know how Elsie would keep house, came and joined her on the little front porch. Presently they saw a poor, old, humpbacked man approaching He seemed to have travelled a great distance, for his clothes and shoes were dusty, and he leaned heavily on his cane. Sophie and Lydia laughed at him, and made unkind remarks about his appearance and tottering steps Elsie's face expressed pity. "Please give me water," said he, as he sunk upon the steps Elsie immediately bathed his temples until he revived, then assisted him into the house to lie down. The other girls shrank tittering into the corner, in a manner that seemed to say, "We are afraid of you, you ugly creature." Uncle Peter was much pleased, on his return from his daily labor, to hear Mr Allen's account of Elsie's kindness. He related her singular history, and even showed the clothes worn by her and the insane woman when they came. The next morning Mr. Allen went away feeling much refreshed, and very grateful to Elsie. A few weeks after this, Mary Page had a tea-party. For awhile she was out of the room, when Sophie commenced ridiculing Elsie's coarse shoes, and old-fashioned dress. Poor Elsie burst into tears. It was more than she could endure.

Our little readers will recollect that we left off our story at Mary Page's tea-party; and that Sophie had wounded Elsie very much by ridiculing her coarse shoes; indeed, Elsie was so grieved that she burst into tears. At that moment their attention was diverted by the unusual sound of carriage-wheels, and a handsome carriage, with beautiful black horses, drove up to the hotel opposite. The landlord's son came running over. "Where's Elsie Smith? Some people at our house want her." Elsie was frightened What could she have done? Why did they send for her? Pale and trembling she entered the room, when this scene presented itself: Mr. Allen, the gentleman of whom she had taken such good care, was sitting upon a sofa; a tall, fine-looking man, greatly agitated, was pacing the apartment; a beautiful lady leaned for support against the window casement. Both the latter sprang towards her, exclaiming, It is our own, our darling child. She, almost bewildered by these words, was informed that she was Miss Henrietta Inglewood. "Then that crazy woman was not my mother?" "No, her little child died, which caused her derangement, and having escaped from the lunatic asylum, near which we lived, stole our little one away from the door, where the nurse had left you but an instant before. For long years we have looked in vain, and had almost given up all hope, when joyful tidings came. Mr Allen, an assistant in the asylum, saw a resemblance between you and your mother, and recognised the clothing which the insane woman wore. On his return he told us, and we immediately started to find you."

Mr Allen now spoke, "If you had treated me as those other children did, ridiculing instead of relieving my wants, you might never have been restored to your parents." The next day they distributed some presents among Lizzie's friends, especially Mary Page who had always taken her part, and had them promise to visit her in her new home in the great city, where her parents were distinguished for their piety, learning, musical talents, and wealth.

You can imagine, my little readers, the feelings of Sophie Walcott and her companions. They had only ridiculed her; but now, how far was she beyond them! Elsie's altered condition did not make her proud, or forgetful of her more humble companions and former friends. She became a refined, intelligent woman, and was noted for her kindness to others Neither did she forget the Giver in the midst of his numberless gifts

KITE STRINGS

These are very important articles; for what is your kite good for if you have no string? The sticks may be slender and firm, and evenly balanced, the paper strong, and the tail just of the right weight and length, but what can you do with your kite if you have no string? You may throw it up, but it will not stay up. You may go upon the house-top and cast it off, but it will neither go higher nor stay there, but sink speedily to the ground. Not see that ball of nice white twine! Your father saw that you wanted it, and so he brought it home when he came from the store. You fasten it to your kite, go out when a fine breeze is blowing, and now how well behaved your kite is, and how nicely it soars; up up it rises till it is almost out of sight. But suppose there is a little flaw in that string and it breaks, or some rude boy comes along and cuts it near your hand, what now of your kite? How soon it feels the cut way up the string, and begins to dance, and plunge, and reel, crazy it would seem, to enjoy its liberty; but alas to enjoy it only for a moment, for down, down it comes, and is all torn and broken in a tree-top, or soiled and lost in a pool of mud

So it is with the little boy or girl that breaks loose from restraint Sometimes children think it would be a nice thing to get away from a parent's or teacher's government or control; but that is the string by which they rise, if ever, to places of eminence and usefulness in the world. Cut it, and they are like the kite with a broken string, that reels and sinks, and is lost.

M Frickhausen, a well known bookseller of Germany, has, after ten years' careful experiment, succeeded in discovering a method for the printing of old books and manuscripts. The process of the original is, in the course of the process, transferred to stone, from which the copies are multiplied after the manner of lithography. The result is that the [illegible] is destroyed in every impression.

RAUGH'S
MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNED BONES
BY RAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20 S. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.
CASH PRICE $45 PER 2000 POUNDS. (2½ CTS. PER POUND.)
In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtues of the bone is retained, a Fertilizer is procured, furnishing in a pulverized and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil. These are phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of RAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE, are given to the plant in their original strength and purity. They contain, as it were with the soil, furnish all the needful ammonia for the growing crop, giving it ample nutriment, and leave the land permanently benefitted, so that its presence can be traced for years afterwards.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860.
Messrs Raugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and the result satisfactorily. For value as an active and "paying" fertilizer
I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 300 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure. Kept dry and under cover and the result was that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier while the grass was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano with a the same quantity and in regard to both grain and grass the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory Its cost, my experience in its use has been that it pays well for the money laid out.
Yours respectfully, ISAAC T. LEWIS.

Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860
Messrs Raugh & Sons:—Being anxious last season to test some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on a most side by side, in the same field. I purchased Pacific Ocean Guano and Super Phosphate of Lime (most of the most popular to me) together with your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the test resulted easy My in favor of the latter
But whether it is from the seeds and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the material used in your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, I am unable to say, however, I shouldfully need you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c., JAMES DUNWODDY

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 10th 1860
Raugh & Sons Gentlemen,—Having used your Super Phosphate bought of John W Christman, at the Montgomery Co. Agricultural Show, on wheat and corn, I can with pleasure recommend it The effect it produced was so manifest, that it greatly increased my confidence in the value of your Fertilizer Where it was applied on the wheat, there could be decidedly the greatest on the field, yet the yield was fully equal to the balance, which had a heavy coat of barn yard manure Where it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double
Very respectfully, DAVID MARPLE

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS IN
SEWING MACHINES.
EMPIRE
SHUTTLE MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
Salesroom—610 Broadway, New York.
The MACHINE is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements—having been examined by the most profound experts, and pronounced by SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION combined
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—
1.—Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2.—Liability to get out of order
3.—Expense, trouble, and loss of time to repairing.
4.—Incapacity to sew every description of material.
5.—Disagreeable noise while in operation.
THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.
It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which cannot be ripped, nor rotted, and is alike on both sides; performs perfect sewing on every description of material, from Leather to the finest Woven Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number
Having neither CAM nor LONG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is
EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.
It requires fifty per cent. less power to drive it than any other Machine in market A girl of 12 years of age can work it steadily without fatigue or injury to health
Its strength and Wonderful Simplicity of Construction renders it almost impossible to get out of order, and is Guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction
We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this
UNRIVALLED MACHINE.
But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of
MERCHANT TAILORS, COACH MAKERS, HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS, SHIRT & BOSOM MAKERS, DRESS MAKERS, CORSET MAKERS, GAITER BINDERS, SHOE BINDERS, VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS.

SEWING & GIBBS
WILCOX & MACHINES.
Price with Hemmer and Feller,
$35 00.
THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.
Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread
It forms a fast, even, and elastic seam, which is ornamental and ripp'd seam, even if the seam is cut at frequent intervals, and also under all circumstances the seam will stretch.
A lighter hand or more uniform motion than that of the Treadle of the machine being can in the sewing direction, or the balance wheel working badly, does
Another feature which demands particular attention is the Wilcox Patent Needle, which can be put in or taken out without dropping a stitch
These Needles are made of the finest steel, and are so constructed as to receive the eye of the shuttle; and with one thread perform the operation of two (three) needles, and more in the practical results of the two (three) machines, and more in the usual needle, and with the least breakage, and does more than twice as much work without producing
Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the sewing in a given time
It is emphatically the good, low priced Family Sewing Machine that the people have been looking for
It is indeed a wonderful production, and for beauty, simplicity, and what will best suit any purchaser, with it.—Philadelphia Evening Journal.
"A wonderful machine."—Scientific American.
"Among the best and most certain working machines. Light and elegantly finished, and so simple that a child can work it."—Home Journal.
"Has the merit of being very simple, and not liable to get out of order."—Christian Advocate and Journal.
"We have one of these machines in our family, and after having had it in use for many months, we have no hesitation in saying that it is the best machine we have ever seen in operation."—Wilcox & Gibbs Co.
Agents wanted in every town and county in the United States, to whom the most liberal inducements will be offered. Address

AFTER COMMUNION.

FROM THE DYER SONG OF 1776.

Lord, accept our feeble praise
For the banquet given;
Though unworthy, we would raise
Hearts and hands to heaven.

Of the streams of grace divine
We have now been tasting:
On the bread and mystic wine
With rich comfort feasting.

Meat, indeed, thy flesh we find,
Drink, thy blood as precious;
Jesus, Saviour, thou art kind,
Merciful and gracious!

On our guilty souls thy rod
Falls with gentle chidings;
And thou healest, with thy blood,
All our great backslidings.

May we in thy bleeding cross
Soul and body fasten;
All for Jesus count but loss,
To his coming hasten.

None from trials are below
Totally exempted;
All-sufficient grace bestow,
Succour, Lord, the tempted.

To thy name, forevermore,
Be all glory given;
None on earth will we adore,
None but thee in heaven.

THE DEATH-BED.

We watched her breathing through the night,
Her breathing soft and low,
As in her breast the wave of life
Kept heaving to and fro.

So silently we seemed to speak,
So slowly moved about,
As we had lent her half our power
To eke her living out.

Our very hopes belied our fears,
Our fears our hopes belied—
We thought her dying when she slept,
And sleeping when she died.

For when the morn came dim and sad,
And chill with early showers,
Her quiet eye-lids closed—she had
Another morn than ours.

Selections.

FAITH.

BY REV. JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.

"It is no matter what a man believes," says infidelity, "if his conduct be correct." "He that believeth not," says Christianity, "shall be damned." Faith saves. Faith destroys. Belief is the plumed wing on which one may soar to heaven, or the leaden weight which sinks one to hell. Faith is the foundation of all character. It makes the angel. It makes the fiend. It rears the family altar of the Christian, and inspires the oaths which come hot and blistering from the lips of the profane.

"We believe," says the Confederate Congress at Richmond, "that any States have a right to withdraw from the Union, and thus to annihilate the United States government." And up goes the flag of secession, woven by this execrable faith.

"We believe," says the Congress at Washington, "that the United States are a nation, and that its Constitution secures its integrity, not its destruction; and straightway the stars and stripes are proudly unfurled, waving over field and mountain, in the breeze of this national faith."

Then comes war, blood, misery—a million of men in arms—two faiths combating—each fiend and archangel. When two faiths come in conflict, it is like world crushing against world.

"I believe," says one man, "that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." He engages a pew in the church, gives his children a seat by his side, establishes prayer in his family, takes an interest in the Sabbath school, and does everything in his power to lead others to love God.

"I believe," says another, "that religion is fanaticism, and the Bible a cheat." True to his belief, he has no Sabbath, no prayer, no religion, and cares no more for the souls of others than for a cat or a dog. Belief makes the one, belief the other.

Two young men meet Sabbath morning. "Will you take a ride with me to-day?" says one. "Yes," is the reply. "I have no faith in the Sabbath. My mother endeavored to teach me that the Sabbath was a holy day But I have thrown all that belief away long ago." They are soon lashing their fast horses over the road. "Here is a tavern," says the one, "let us go in and take a glass of brandy." "O yes, yes," is the reply. "I have no faith in this temperance fanaticism. A short life and a merry one is my creed." And now the hours of darkness have come, and bacchanalian songs, which should blister the lips are polluting the air. Other boon companions have joined the party. "Here is a pack of cards," says one. "Let us play a game to decide who shall pay for the brandy and segars." "With all my heart," is the reply. "I have no faith in the puritanical notion that it is dangerous to play cards, and wicked to gamble."

Midnight comes. You hear shouting and revelry in the streets. A poor drunken boy, with brandied face, and empty purse, and misery in his heart, intermingling oaths with lewd songs, is dashing along, an utter moral wreck, going down, down, through poverty, infamy, and wretchedness here, to eternal woe hereafter.

Young man, beware of your faith, of your belief. A bad faith is a fiend which will drag you to despair. You can believe just what you please Live a wicked life, and you can, without difficulty, adopt an infamous faith, You can easily reject the Bible, religion, and God. Your faith decides whether you shall be an angel or a demon. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he."

But here is another young man with a different faith. "Will you go to church with me to-day?" some one inquires. "Most gladly," is the reply. "My sainted mother taught me to remember the Sabbath day, and keep it holy." He sits attentive in the church, and listens to those sublime themes which Christianity unfolds, death, resurrection, judgment, immortality, heaven, and hell. "I believe these great truths," he says, "and I will try so to live as to be prepared to meet my God." He unites with the church takes a class in the Sabbath school, and tries to induce other young men to forsake the haunts of sin, and to come to the house of God. It is evening. He is at the prayer-meeting. His voice is heard in prayer, and his heart throbs in the utterance of such songs as angels love to sing. Soon he has a happy home, where the morning and evening incense ascends, from the family altar to God. His children, led by the parental hand to the family pew, followed in their honored father's footsteps.

Thus, while the faith of one leads him to the brandy bottle, the card-table, and the midnight carousings, the faith of another leads him to the church and the prayer-meeting, and to all that is noble in a Christian life. Young man, take care of your faith. You can believe falsehood or truth as you please, just as you can be high-minded and honorable, or fraudulent and ignoble, as you prefer. Tell me what a man's faith is, and I will tell you what his life is. Tell me what his life is, and I will tell you what his faith is.

Congregationalist.

AN UNRIGHTEOUS DIVORCE.

We have just come from a visit to a Christian hospital—an institution founded in the Master's name, and to his honor. We are moved to ask, Why is it not thus always and everywhere? Why has it become a possible thing—as a few centuries ago it was not—to draw a line of demarcation between religion and philanthropy? Why, in a word, has it come to be believed, tacitly at least, that a man may be a good man, and yet not distinctively a Christian one.

We greatly fear that the answer to these questions is to be found in this; that the church of Christ has been too unmindful, in these latter days, of that solemn sentence of her Lord's, "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto the least of these my brethren, ye did it not to me." We want to feel more keenly the deep truth of Christ's illustrative saying, "A tree is known by its fruits." Whether we Christians keep this truth in mind or not, the world of outsiders is sure to do so, and we inevitably, are judged by it. "What is the use," these outsiders cry, "of your church-building, and your church-going, and your church-extension, if, with it all, you do not set humanity one jot forward, nor ease its pains and sicknesses by one straw's weight?"

We Protestants, in this matter, need to learn of Rome. With all her corruptions, Rome has ever taken care that no divorce between religion and philanthropy should bear the sanction of her seal. The Protestant Church has to learn that her salvation, as a visible body, lies in her doing a visible body's work for the Holy Spirit, of which she professes to be the organ. Now a body's work is to furnish eyes and ears, and hands to the intelligence within. But where are the Church's eyes that she does not see the wretchedness and the corruption, the ignorance and the sin, that are this very day threatening the boasted civilization of our great cities with downfall and destruction? Where are the Church's ears that she does not hear the cries of hunger, anguish and despair that are rising all the time, too often in the form of curses, from the hovels that lie behind the palaces? Assuredly those cries do enter into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth. Where are the church's hands, that she does not reach them forth to found mission after mission, to build hospital after hospital, and so change this miserable Basilons of ours into a Christendom indeed?

It is easy to ask these questions and other like ones, but let us do more than ask them—let us answer them, and answer them not so much in the language of words as in the language of deeds.

Let every Protestant Episcopal Church throughout the country, and especially every city church, open her eyes and ears, and reach out her hands to help forward the great "Coming of the Kingdom." Let us write on our banners that beautiful couplet of Ambrose's,

"Perfecta Christi caritas Mundi triumphat principem," and go forth to the conquest of the world. Let us put an end to the unrighteous divorce now existing between philanthropy and religion. When Mercy and Truth kissed each other over the Bethlehem manger, it was meant that the union, thus forever knit, should be perpetual. It was not meant that in latter times, Truth should dwell in the pulpit, and mercy on the platform—that we should have one gospel of faith, and another of works. Faith and works (we think the comparison is Leighton's) are like the heat and light of flame: one, and yet two—blended, and at the same time distinct. Without the heat the flame is useless; without the light we should not know where to find the heat. Let, then, the church arise in her majesty and power, to become, not only a burning, but a shining light.—Church Monthly.

LENDING.

BY LYNDE PALMER

Mr. Crampton sat in gown and slippers, ensconced in a great padded chair, wheeled comfortably in front of the glowing grate. Nor did it at all detract from his satisfaction that, when now and then he paused in reading the evening paper, he heard the winter wind holding fierce revels without, and the stinging sleet driving against the double windows, muffled in their heavy curtains.

"It's a terrible night!" he at last remarked to his wife, as he folded the paper and leaned back in the chair. "May God have mercy on the poor."

After which benevolent ejaculation he felt as he purposed and warm hearted as if he had just distributed a load of coals among shivering paupers, or ordered a barrel of flour to some starving family's door.

Mr. Crampton was a member in good standing in a famous Loudicean church, and he had a habit of family prayers, which was not omitted upon this evening. And as the tempest continued to increase, he again remembered, with quite a glow of feeling, the condition of the poor, and prayed with much fervency that they might be "preserved through this inclement season."

He had risen from his knees, settled himself again in that very easy chair, and was talking comfortably with his wife about his golden prospects for the future, when the door bell gave a little shivering tinkle.

"A boy wishes to see you, sir," announced the servant.

Mr. Crampton rose fretfully. "How annoying! What can a boy want at this late hour?"

As he appeared in the hall, a shadow at the farther end seemed to become animated, and a slight figure dreuched with the storm, advanced, bowing.

"Ah, Jack, it's you, is it?" said Mr. Crampton, with a frown. "Well, what's the matter now? I suppose your father has broken his leg, and all the children are down with the scarlet fever?"

"Please, sir," said the boy, with an effort, "you forget father has gone to the west. But little Susan is very sick indeed, sir. We're afraid she'll die. Mother wouldn't let me beg for anything if she knew it, but I can, 'cause the fire had all gone out, and—"

"There, that will do," said Mr. Crampton, sternly. "I don't believe a word of it. I've seen you with very bad boys, and I believe you're a little vagrant, and want the money yourself. Can you look me in the face, and tell me it is all true?"

An indignant crimson stained the boy's thin cheeks as he lifted his heavy eyes. "Yes, sir, I can, but," he added lower, "I don't like to look in your face."

"What!" cried Mr. Crampton, angrily; but the boy moved slowly to the door.

Mr. Crampton called after him a little uneasily. "Here take this. It shall never be said that I sent the poor empty away," and he dropped sixpence in the little frozen palm, that made an involuntary motion to throw it back, and then convulsively closed it again.

"Well," said Mrs. Crampton, as he returned, "did you give the child anything?"

"Oh yes," said he, shortly, sinking back in his chair.

"I am glad you did," said his wife gently. "It is a blessed thing to give, and 'he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord.'"

The easy chair suddenly became strangely uncomfortable, and a painful crimson suffused Mr. Crampton's plethoric cheek. He was a business man, and sometimes when with painful effort he had untied his purse strings at some benevolent appeal, this same verse had occurred to him in connexion with a vague consoling idea that he was taking stock in some desirable portion of the "golden street," in convenient contiguity to the "tree of life." But to-night the thought smote him that he had made rather a small investment, and wasn't it just possible that the great Master might resent such a niggardly loan? He thought, too, of John Staples, his honest, faithful porter till he went to the wars. Wasn't it just possible that his family were really suffering? and oughtn't he to have inquired, or sent a servant with some nourishing food, and a basket of coals, which he would never have missed? In vain did he say to himself that it was too bad for a man to be disturbed so late at night after his hard day of toil, and besides, hadn't he that very day given a dollar to the Bible Society? In spite of all his efforts another verse kept ringing unpleasantly in his ears—"Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me."

The next morning, as Mr. Crampton sat in his counting-room, busily engaged with a column of figures, a little morsel of frost and rags stood before him.

"Here's your sixpence, sir, we didn't use it."

"Here—stop, boy! what do you mean?" stammered Mr. Crampton. "How's your sister?"

"Dead!" gasped the boy, rushing from the door, and Mr Crampton dropping his head on his hand, thought of an account he had with the Lord, very different from what he intended it should be.

Blind, cold, selfish Laodiceans, who shall anoint your eyes with eye-salve that ye may see? For a little time to us is granted a glorious privilege, and we know it not. The angels and redeemed saints can no longer suffer or make sacrifices to prove their boundless love; but to us is the boon still given, and it is enough to glorify the saddest life. Let us try to realise it while there is yet time. How strange! How wonderful! We—mere motes in the sunlight of God's presence—so poor, so weak, so infinitely inferior, may yet have the glorious honor, the exquisite joy, of lending to the Lord!

"THE NORTHERN MOB."

We cannot comprehend the misconceptions that prevail in South ad, in relation to the condition of the Free States. Some Scottish journals appear to think that society here is almost totally disorganized. It is thought that the Administration at Washington, are bent on a rupture with Great Britain, so that we might have some excuse for yielding to the South, and the destruction of the nation. Should this be prevented, it is confidently expected that the "mob" will hurl from his place, Mr. Seward, whose "Machiavellian policy," it is alleged, "is making him an annoyance to foreign nations, and a scourge to his own." One paper says, in case of war, "We trust that, before we have done with the Northern mob, we shall have made the members thereof wiser and better men."

"The Northern mob!" "Machiavellian policy!" How strange these misconceptions! We cannot understand them. Perhaps, if our Scotch contemporaries would visit our country a few weeks, or listen to other testimony than that of the apostles of slavery, they could discover that our Secretary of State is neither a villain, nor a monster, and that there has seldom been a high officer more popular among our enlightened and peace-loving citizens, and that all, especially the better classes, are fully satisfied with his pacific measures towards England. But our Scotch contemporaries, the Glasgow Herald, for example, twits us sharply for supposing that there are such classes here. We are told, "it has come out very clearly of late, if it was not obvious enough before that the free and enlightened citizens of the North"—by which we must be understood to mean all except the enlightened, who are only free to do what is not distasteful to the mob—have been allowed to intoxicate themselves to such a degree with self-adulation and brag, that their arrogance has reached an offensive and almost insufferable pitch." Can it be that such thoughts prevail generally in Scotland?

American boasting and arrogance are severely condemned. We join all foreigners in this. But after all, are we the only people that think well of their own institutions, and their own exploits? Is brag an Americanism? Is it not a peculiarity which we have inherited from our British ancestry? We are accustomed to dwell fondly on the virtues we inherit, and our cousins across the Atlantic, sometimes take pleasure in this proof of kin. May they not also admit that John Bull has no need to come to the West to learn how to boast and brag?

The truth is, England and America are, in great degree, one people. If it were not for the strange misrepresentations that have been circulated so industriously, we would all feel so at the present time. The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and the United Presbyterian Church of North America, are, in fact, more nearly one than are the latter, and their former ecclesiastical brethren at the South. Our ministers and people had no difficulty in making themselves at home in Canada, while our Canadian brethren easily coalesce with us. In Scotland, in Canada, as everybody knows, there is, with some slight exceptions, as much freedom ecclesiastical or civil, as in the Free States. But there is no such oneness, and has not been for years, between the North and the South. A minister, known to believe that slavery is a sin, and there fore something to be done away with as quickly as possible, has not been safe in the South. He could not speak his views freely, except at the risk of a coat of tar and feathers. A distinguished minister of our Church, a native of the South, known in every part of it as a man of moderation and discretion, found himself, a year or two ago, very uncomfortable in his old walks. While, therefore, we, and Southern Presbyterians, are in many respects closely bound together as citizens of the same country, it cannot be denied, that in the great matter of freedom, we, and Scottish Presbyterians, are more perfectly united in principle and feeling. Northern and British Christians have communion in Constitutional liberty. What fellowship has either party with the wretched despotism of the South? The alienation between North and South, is the legitimate fruit of two opposing principles, that have no more concord than Christ and Belial. Principle is more than geographical boundaries; more than forms of government. The most powerful of the unities, says Count De Gasparin, is moral unity. The alienation of British, and Northern lovers of right and freedom, can only be accomplished by the machinations of bad men, or such utter misunderstandings on the one side and the other as are seen in journals that gravely talk of twenty millions of free, intelligent, and law abiding men, as the "Northern mob."

Rev. SYLVESTER ROSECRANS, brother of General Rosecrans in the Army, was proclaimed, at the papal consistory held in December last, Bishop of Pompeiopolis in partibus infidelium, and auxiliary to the Archbishop of Cincinnati.

INTEMPERANCE AND IMMORALITY.

These two vices go hand in hand. Wherever you find the demon intemperance doing his work there you will be sure to find immorality prevailing, as you find it nowhere else. During the late week of prayer, the Christian world was called upon to unite to earnest prayer for the cessation of these terrible evils. We hope there were many true prayers offered up for this end. Webster defines immorality to be "any act or practice which opposes the divine commands or the social duties." This is a very good definition of the term. If we keep this definition in view, we will find that intemperance is almost invariably followed by a great amount of immorality.

Intemperance is usually understood to refer to the injurious use of intoxicating liquors. This monster evil seems to be prevailing extensively just now in our land. A few years ago, a great effort was made to discourage the use and sale of intoxicating drinks, by legislative enactment. But little, however, seems to have been accomplished. We are not sure but, in the end, it has done harm. No law of the kind will avail much, unless the moral sentiment of the community is prepared for it.

Something has been done by the Washingtonians, and other organizations, towards suppressing the monster evil. But still it rages. Still, in our cities and towns, men will be found who will deal out the deadly poison to their fellow mortals; men, of each one of whom it may be said, "He sitteth in the lurking-places of the villages; in the secret places doth he murder the innocent; his eyes are privily set against the poor. He lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor, he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones." Still, there are many who, in the very face of the terrible consequences, will visit those sinks of iniquity, and drink of the deadly poison they contain. They witness reason dethroned;—wife and children beggared;—the happy home destroyed,—character lost; the terrible death by "delirium tremens," and yet, in view of all this, they go right on, in the same road to ruin—ruin to themselves, and ruin to their families—ruin for time, and ruin for eternity. Strange infatuation! terrible madness!!

Can nothing be done to stay the ravages of this terrible monster? Magnificent preparations are made for meeting the enemies of our country, and it is well. But can nothing more be done to stay the ravages of this more destructive enemy?

Christians of our land, you no doubt offered many prayers for the suppression of these evils. Do you have faith in the efficacy of those prayers? Do you believe they will be answered? I presume many, perhaps most of you, have no definite expectation about it, and consequently you will not follow up your prayers by any very decided effort for their suppression. If you desire those prayers to be heard:—if you believe they will be heard, then you must discountenance everything tending to their encouragement. Then, when you see the merry, laughing, fun-making crowd gathered around him who has been brought under the influence of the intoxicating cup, you must not join in the hearty laugh at his folly. You must not be found, in any way, encouraging the sale or use of intoxicating drinks of any kind. In the language of a Scottish elder we once heard exhorting a fellow-member of the church who had been indulging too freely in the intoxicating bowl, "If ye canna resist the Divil, ye must keep away fra him all thegither."

EASTERN CORRESPONDENCE.

PYRAMIDS OF GHIZEH.

My last visit in or around Cairo was to the pyramids of Ghizeh. The Nile had been unusually high, and was receding very slowly, so that nearly all the canals which conducted water from the river, for the irrigation of the western side of the valley, were yet partly filled; and as there are no bridges but man's shoulders, I concluded to postpone this excursion to the last, so as to receive all possible benefit from the daily improvement of the road. The distance of the pyramids is about twelve miles in a West, South-West direction, and the only mode of conveyance is on donkey-back, and the excursion is considered a good day's work.

We took the usual road to Foostat or Old Cairo, and struck the river at the upper end of this long and narrow town, at a distance of nearly four miles from Cairo. Here we scrambled down the bank, and into a river boat of perhaps forty feet in length, and our donkeys were literally tumbled into our boat after us. After getting through the terrible noise and confusion of this embarking operation, and paying twenty-five cents for the ferriage of self, donkey and driver, I took a survey of my surroundings, and found the boat well filled with men, women, donkeys, and a great variety of domestic necessities, all mixed up in an exceedingly miscellaneous way. In the middle of the river was a small sand island, gradually emerging from the receding waters. Upon the lower end of this, our pilot must needs ground our boat; but help was near at hand. A tall, finely-formed Arab was standing upon the bow of our boat, and as soon as we struck the bar, he slipped off his only garment—the universal blue shirt—and took to the water like a duck. He placed his back against the bow, and we were soon afloat again; and he swung himself into the boat, and took his old position, where he remained the next five minutes, during which he was so intent upon his duties as to forget to resume his garment. Perhaps, he was anticipating the necessity of another plunge; if so, he was disappointed, for without further incident we arrived at the village of Ghizeh. Here, we remounted our donkeys, twisted through the narrow and crooked streets, galloped across a fine grove of magnificent palms, and were out upon the western valley of the Nile, with the pyramids full in view. They were distant about five or six miles; but following the zig zag and narrow embankments, thrown up between the fields for purposes of irrigation as well as partition, the road travelled is, at least, a mile further. By the time we struck the open field, we were surrounded by a whole tribe of Arabs, who hung closely around us, knowing that the services of some of them must be brought into requisition in crossing the canals, and ascending old Cheops, and all of them hoping by service or importunity to get some backsheesh. We found three canals running across our path still filled with water, from one to three feet deep. Across these we were ferried upon the shoulders of two Arabs, and as the mud was deep, and the men staggered terribly, I could not but calculate, during all of the six passages, the chances of being tumbled in by the miring of the carriers. But I found them sure-footed, and all my fears were disappointed. Just at the edge of the valley, we passed through another small mud village, and then commenced a steep ascent, which brought us to a plateau of limestone rock, buried with the sand blown from the great Lybian desert, which stretches like a horizon hundreds and hundreds of miles away to the West. This plateau must be a hundred and fifty feet above the valley of the Nile, and forms a suitable pedestal for the wonderful structures that rest upon it.

These pyramids, seen at a distance, look small, and disappointed me entirely; but when I came to the foot of Cheops and looked up its mountain-side, I began to realize its immense magnitude. This is the nearest and the largest of all the pyramids. The following figures may convey some idea of this structure:—Its base is 746 feet square, or, in other words, it covers an area which lacks but a few rods of thirteen acres, and its perpendicular height is 451 feet, containing 89,038,000 cubic feet of masonry, or 6,848,000 tons weight of good, solid limestone, cut into blocks of from two to five feet square. Just let a farmer go into a thirteen acre field and imagine a pyramid of blocks of cut limestone, with the base covering the entire field, tapering to a point 451 feet high. But this can't be done; Cheops must be seen and ascended before it can be appreciated.

This largest pyramid was built by Shoopho, a Cheop, who occupied the throne of Memphis, not less than 4,300 years ago. It was built by him as his own tomb, for in a large chamber, in the very heart of this immense structure, his stone coffin still remains. And in an adjoining chamber his queen was also sepulchred. It is said that he spent ten years in quarrying the stone, and in building a causeway across the valley, over which the stone could be brought to the place of building, for they were brought from the mountain, twenty miles off. He then employed 100,000 men for twenty years in erecting this enormous structure, taxing the power of Egypt during half of his long reign of 63 years, in building a sepulchral monument. It is to be feared that the throne of Egypt has always been filled by a selfish race of hard task-masters.

The second pyramid, distant about 150 yards, was built by Chephren, the brother and successor of Cheops. It is about the same height, but the base is only 684 feet square. The third was built by Mencheres, the Mycerinus of Herodotus, and son of Chephren. This is only 280 feet square, and 162 feet high. These pyramids of Ghizeh were the last built of all the pyramids of the Nile, and two of them the largest. From Ghizeh up to Dashoor, a distance of about twenty-five miles, and embracing all the immediate vicinity of ancient Memphis, there are some twenty-five pyramids, eighteen of which are large. Throughout the remainder of Egypt, there are a few other pyramids, but none of them are remarkable for size or character of structure. But far south, in Ethiopia, there have been discovered 139 pyramids, built of sandstone, and varying from 30 feet square, to 100 of base.

These Memphitic pyramids are all surrounded with innumerable pits, excavations, subterranean passages, &c., cut in the limestone ledge, from which millions of mummies have already been taken, and probably millions yet remain undisturbed. This was the great Necropolis of Memphis during the 3,000 years it flourished.

Some hundred and fifty yards south of the largest pyramid is the celebrated Sphinx. This immense statue was carved out of the living rock, and is all of one piece. The head, neck and breast are those of a man, while the body is that of a lion. Some years ago, Caviglia had the whole figure excavated, and found the body which rests upon its belly to be 150 feet long. Its paws were extended fifty feet in front of the breast, and between these outstretched paws was placed a small temple, with altar, &c. But the sand has again enveloped the body, so that the head and neck are the only parts visible now; and these are 27 feet high. The face wears a very pleasant expression, although it has suffered some mutilation; the nose is entirely broken off. This statue is supposed to be the work of Thothmes IV., the successor of the Pharaoh of the Exodus, and subsequently more than 500 years subsequent to the building of Cheops.

Some years ago, an Englishman who had ascended Cheops alone, fell when coming down, and was killed, in consequence of which the Pasha issued an order, forbidding any traveller to ascend without assistants. So at the foot of the pyramid I found the Sheik who had it in charge, paid him a dollar and a quarter, the regular tariff, and particularly enjoined that but two of his dirty Arabs should accend with me. But herein I was disappointed. This pyramid is composed of 202 courses or tiers of limestone blocks, varying in thickness from eighteen inches to four feet, every successive course receding on an average two feet or two and a half. Up this enormous flight of stone steps I started, with two Arabs one step ahead pulling me by my hands, and in spite of all my kicking, I had finally to acquiesce with the arrangement of two or three more boosting me up from behind, and several more, as supernumeraries for company sake, and two little girls with stone bottles of water. Including a short rest midway, I reached the top in twenty minutes. Here I spent fully half an hour in viewing the scene that lay around, aided by a powerful glass, and as that scene is bounded only by the horizon, it is easy to realize that earth has but few so eligible stand-points for observation.

Having satisfied my curiosity, I partook with keen appetite of the mid-day meal I had brought with me from Cairo. This lunch consisted mainly of sandwiches, and when through, I handed, according to the custom of giving all the fragments to your attendants, two or three that remained, to my Arabs. The leader of the squad received them, and opening up one, looked at the cold ham and asked, "Is this pork?" I answered in the affirmative, when he shook his head, and assured me that it was not lawful for a Mohammedan to eat pork. But I observed that he did not cast them from him, but quietly and carefully stowed them away in the bosom of his shirt, where Arabs carry everything, and I have no doubt they were greedily eaten.

The most importunate begging to which the traveller is subjected in all Egypt, is that experienced during this excursion to the pyramids. The deck was now clear for action, and the time for the first broadside had now come. "Well, Governor," said the leader, "how much are you going to give us?" "Give you?" said I, "what for?" "For coming up with you," was the prompt reply. I informed him that I had already paid the Sheik five shillings sterling for their services, of which they were all witnesses. He freely admitted this, but good-naturedly added that that went for the benefit of the whole tribe, and that now they wanted something for themselves, paid where the Sheik would not see it, so that they would not be compelled to give it up to the tribe. Two or three joined with the assurance that they were very poor, and that a little backsheesh would do them great good. I readily assented to their poverty, for that was very manifest; but then I was not responsible for it, nor was it my business to remedy all the poverty of the world. One poor fellow who had lost his voice by some bronchial trouble, whispered out hoarsely that he was very sick, and to give him something would be a great charity. After some farther reasoning, I relented, and concluded to give a little. I had prepared myself for all this, and pulled out of my pocket a handful of paras and piasters, amounting to 40 or 50 cents, and told the leader to divide that amongst themselves. But he declined with affected astonishment. I asked him how much he expected. He coolly answered, "a pound." It was now my time to be astonished, and I very decidedly informed him that that was too much. "Too much!" said he, "why, Governor, you come from America to the pyramids but once in your life, and what is a pound once in your life to you?" Thus the argument went on, until we compromised the matter much nearer my figures than his. In all their intercourse they were pleasant and courteous, although this is not always the case, for they distinguish character very readily, and when they think they can, they are very ready to extort money through fear; and, strange to say, they are too often successful, for travellers ought to know that there is not so much as a shadow of ground for fear.

I did not go into the pyramids, for it is a laborious scrambling up and down, through low and narrow passages, with a hot and impure atmosphere, and in the end but little to see. So I descended immediately to the earth, and found the going down decidedly harder work than the going up. But as I had paid my Arabs well, I made them earn their money, by leaning pretty heavily upon their shoulders. After a minute survey of the Sphinx, and some of the tombs and sepulchral pits, I turned for home by the way of my coming, and in two hours and three-quarters, I arrived safely and but little wearied at Shepheard's Hotel, although the last two miles were made by my little donkey upon the gallop.

DR ALEXANDER'S PRAYERS.

Dr. W. W. Hall says of the public prayers of Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander: "If asked what was the most distinguishing thing about him, we would most unhesitatingly say it was his prayers. Of all we have ever heard uttered or read, of the uninspired, Dr. Alexander's were the most devotional, the most heavenly. There was no human condition they did not reach. He seemed to get right at once into the presence of his Maker, and as if wanting to improve the opportunity before he got away, his great broad heart would take all humanity within its folds. He seemed familiar with every phase of human sorrow. In a single prayer, and we made note of it at the time, he petitioned for those who were kept from the house of God by inclement weather, by the sickness of themselves or near relations, by the compulsion of others; for those who were suffering in their good name in person, or in the person of others; for those who were in actual want of food or raiment; for those who were anticipating reverses which would affect their social position; for those who were anticipating the loss of fortune; for those who were writhing under the apprehension of failure to meet maturing pecuniary obligations; for those who were hardened by worldly entanglements; for those whose hearts were wrung by the mental derangement of their friends, or of their own families; for those who were afraid they should themselves go mad; for those who felt they were castaways from God, and believed their perdition sealed. The impression made on our minds was so strong at the time, we felt almost ready to exclaim audibly, 'What a miserable congregation this is!' His prayers were uniformly most impressive. Forgetting himself and his congregation, he would carry away at times in his great warm heart the wants of a world, and lay them right down at the mercy-seat, for God to look at, and pity, and deliver."

MINISTERIAL SUCCESS.

The excellent Richard Baxter once said: I now resolve (1) To take more particular account of the souls committed to my care; (2) To visit the whole congregation, and to learn more particularly the circumstances of the children and servants; (3) Will make an exact a list as I can, of those I have reason to believe are unconverted, unlearned, fit for communion, or already in it; (4) When I hear anything particularly concerning the religious state of my people, I will visit them, and talk with them; (5) I will especially be careful to visit the sick.

BAD ENGLISH PUNCTUATION.

One capital fault which pervades and vitiates many people's compositions is ignorance of the principles of punctuation. Sometimes nothing of this sort is attempted, and sometimes dashes are made to do duty indiscriminately. From this follows, as a necessary consequence, a general looseness of construction in the sentences. They are sure to be more or less deformed and ill-conditioned; with participial clauses running loose, or relatives whose references are uncertain. Short sentences and short words are generally best, inasmuch as they are less likely to be misunderstood, and do not require to be read twice. Sometimes the meaning expressed is entirely different from the one intended, or at all events is susceptible of various interpretations. Some sentences are so clumsily put together, that, if printed as written, they would be almost unintelligible; just because the writers have, through laziness or ignorance, accustomed themselves to scribble on without inserting the proper stops as they go. They "stand not upon points." They forget how they began the sentence, and how it ought to end, and thus it comes out imperfectly articulated.

Leisure Hour.

THE ADVANTAGE OF CONDENSATION.

Give the pitch, the cream, the marrow, the essence, the fire.

Press your thoughts, pack them, bring every thing to a burning, scorching focus. Avoid prefaces, circumlocutions; rush right into your subject at once. Begin before you think of it, and keep dashing on with all your might until you are done. So, also, in preaching, praying, exhorting, testifying, say what you have to say, and stop!

A tremendous thought may be packed into small compass—made as solid as a cannon ball, and, like that projectile, cut down all before it. Short articles are generally more effective, find more readers, and are more widely copied than long ones. Pack your thoughts closely together, and though your article may be brief, it will have more weight, and will be more likely to make an impression.

A GOOD DEAL ALIKE.

A man of short stature and most uninviting countenance, with the peculiar expression now claimed by Mons. du Chaillu as that of the gorilla, purchased a property in a western county of Scotland, from whence he strictly excluded trespassers. Some one sent him a large monkey, which he kept about his place; and a boy having been entrusted with the delivery of a letter, and having found the monkey at the house door, was somewhat alarmed; so he threw down the letter and ran off. On his way down the avenue, the boy met the new laird, who angrily demanded what he was doing there. "I had a letter for you, sir," says the boy. "Well, give it me." "Ah, but I gave it to your son, sir," replied the trembling laddie. "My son, you little rascal; I have no son." "Weel, sir, I canna say for that, but he had an unco look o' yourself."

MISSIONS IN THE SOUTH SEA ISLANDS UNDER THE CARE OF THE ENGLISH MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—Those who have read Captain Charles Wilkes' Exploring Expedition, will remember the account he gives of the Samoan Islands and the natives. In a lapse of twenty years the missionaries have been wonderfully successful on those islands. The London Missionary Chronicle of December last, in a review of the missionary operations in the Samoan Islands, says:

"The light of the gospel first broke on this dark land in 1830, when John Williams planted the first native teachers from the Society Islands. Nor was this the only effort. In 1832 some natives of Rarotonga, one of the Austral Islands, nearly two thousand miles distant, having been driven by contrary winds out of their course, after drifting on the ocean a long time, reached Tanna, the eastern Samoan island, and, being Christians, began to teach the natives what they knew, and gathered around them a few converts. Thus in various quarters, heathenism was attacked, and it broke down rapidly. Congregations were raised up and the necessity for native teachers became evident. A missionary seminary was begun in 1844, where, up to the present time, three hundred natives have been trained, of whom one hundred and thirty-one are laboring in Samoa, or the new missions to the westward."

RUSSIA AND AMERICA.

It would be difficult to mention two countries, which in all their internal relations appear to present a greater contrast to each other than Russia and America. Russia is the home of the most uncompromising despotism; America, that of the most liberal government. In Russia, everything rests with the single individual, to whom Providence, for the time, intrusts the rule of over more than fifty millions of men. In America, every thing is based upon the instinctive will of the people in their collective capacity. In Russia, the military organization pervades the whole social system. Military ranks form the rubric, by which every official dignity throughout the whole empire must be adjudicated. In America, military matters were, up to the most recent date, of such a secondary character, that they never exercised the least influence upon the social state and the political life of the United States. In Russia, the national church is an closely allied to the state, that the empire is at the same time the supreme head of the visible church. In America there is no national church, much less a state church. In Russia, everything rests on the glory and the traditions of a powerful life, extending through a thousand years. America, on the other hand, has just started upon its career, the witnesses of the great struggle for our national existence and independence hardly having left the scene of their activity on earth. In Russia, everything centres in the sacred person of the monarch, the legitimate heir of sovereign power; law and might, life and death, are in his hands. He stands alone in majestic solitude, and nothing intervenes mediating between him and the millions obeying his uncontrolled command. In America, we have a document, our Constitution, for a national centre, directing and limiting legislative and executive power. But the political vitality exists in our great parties, striving for supremacy of short duration, and for control, not of the people, but of the offices.

Of course we might, without end, multiply the proofs of the antagonism between these two countries. But the contrast is so glaring, that it seems a much more difficult task to point out the affinities and analogies existing between them. Still, this is the very thing to which we call the attention of our readers.

We all are aware of a certain sympathy, which has for years, and on various occasions, exhibited itself on the part of the Americans towards the Russians. We need not dwell on the causes of this singular phenomenon. The Russians will have our sympathy, not because we love them much, but simply because we dislike others more. Nations and individuals are, in their feelings of sympathy and antipathy, governed by the same selfish interests. For this very reason our sympathy for the Russians is of a very cheap character. It will come to an end, as soon as the Russians shall be in our way, as others are now. The time for this will come, and it is not very distant. The locality will be the Pacific, and the coasts of Eastern Asia and Western Africa.

But the very time in which we live offers to these two countries a true and strong inducement for mutual sympathy. It is the crisis through which both countries are now going, and which, in spite of all the eminent diversities between them, turns upon one and the same great and difficult question, slavery in America, serfdom in Russia.

It would not be a difficult task to accumulate such points of comparison between these two countries. But we shall now only refer

NOTICE.

At Union Church, on Sabbath, (to-morrow,) the 23d instant, Rev. F. Weaver, by Divine permission, will preach on the subject—"The six things that the Lord hates—yea, the seventh one is an abomination unto Him." Services to commence at 3 o'clock, P. M.

Rev. HENRY DAVIS,
Elder in Charge.

NOTICE.

The funeral sermon of the late Rev. Walter Procter was preached by the Rev. J. P. Campbell, of Trenton, New Jersey, on the 16th inst., from Luke, 23d chapter and 50th verse—"He was a good man, and just."

The church was filled to its utmost capacity. We never saw Bethel Church fuller. The sermon was read by the speaker with much force and ability.

NOTICE—BEWARE.

The public are hereby cautioned not to contribute to the relief of the Dorcas Society of A. M. E. Bethel Church on application by a female impostor, as no such person has been authorized to make collections for said Society.

NOTICE.

Brethren must not send us foolscap paper, unless they put two three-cent stamps upon the envelope. One sheet of foolscap paper weighs over half an ounce. They have been making us pay for some of the articles about long enough. Some of our brethren may think that we are kicking up a great fuss about a small matter—but if they were compelled to pay three cents each, out of their own pockets, on a batch of some fifty letters every month, they would sympathize more readily with our feelings.

THE DEATH-BED OF THE REV. JOHN WESLEY AND FAMILY.

This picture we shall speak of at more length in our next issue, and in the meantime we will only refer our readers to the advertisement of Mr. Wm. Smith in another column.

LECTURES AT THE INSTITUTE OF COLORED YOUTH.

On last Thursday evening (13th instant) Mrs. S. M. Douglass, the wife of Rev. William Douglass, delivered the fifth course of the winter lectures at the Institute of Colored Youth. Subject, "Respiration."

At 8 o'clock she appeared before the audience assembled, who were waiting very patiently but anxiously to hear her descant upon the subject as was previously announced. It was discussed with much ability, reflected great credit on the speaker, and showed that no pains had been spared by Mrs. Douglass to inform herself so as to entertain her hearers properly. She spoke of the respiration in plants—in birds—and in animals, as well as in the human species.

We think that the young ladies who were present learned a good lesson, if they heeded her words, and mothers were profited greatly. It would be well for either sex to take a lesson from Mrs. Douglass' views.

OLD FOLKS' CONCERT.

We would again remind our friends and the public generally that Father Burris and his troupe of musical artists will give a grand Concert on the 26th instant, in Franklin Hall, Sixth Street, below Arch.

As this is the first concert of the kind, we feel quite certain that it will receive strong encouragement by a large audience on the evening specified. As there is every probability of a large crowd being present on the occasion, we would recommend all who wish a good seat to go early. The main object of the entertainment is, the benefit of the Christian Recorder—and this fact alone should of itself crowd the Hall. Half of the proceeds go to our paper.

CHINA, QUEENSWARE, LAMP AND OIL STORE.

We call special attention to the advertisement of Mrs. O'Donnell, which will be found in another column of our paper. We would recommend the citizens of Philadelphia and others to call and examine her new assortment of lamps, China, &c. We are satisfied that they will not leave without purchasing. She is reasonable in all her prices. We love to see our colored people in business, showing that they are capable.

THE HORNS TAKEN DOWN.

☞ Let everybody read this.

At the Exhibition of Bethel Sabbath School, the sum of $70.04 was taken in at the door. Of this amount $15 was presented to us for the benefit of the Christian Recorder by the Superintendent, Mr. Lewis Seymour, and the remainder went to the benefit of the school and the paying of expenses.

Many thanks to the managers and little ones of the school for the substantial aid they have thus afforded to our paper and Book Concern. We are free to say that the Recorder was the means of more money being taken in on this occasion than at any one time during the past twenty four years. Then, in view of this fact, will not those who do not take the Recorder come, or send us their names, and pay us their subscription price—two dollars?

Rev J. B. RITTENY, late pastor of the Mariners' Bethel in this city, and a devoted minister of the Presbyterian Church, in this city, died on Friday, the 7th inst., in the 38th year of his age.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH-DAY OF BISHOP ALLEN BY THE BETHEL SABBATH SCHOOL

On Tuesday evening, the 18th instant, the Bethel Sabbath School met to celebrate the birth-day of the sainted Allen. The church was crowded. The main audience room and the galleries were filled—every pew being occupied; and many had to stand upon the aisles. The exercises commenced with singing by the school assisted by the choir, prayer by Rev. Bishop Nazrey, &c. Rev Stephen Smith was then introduced, who spoke of the Rev Richard Allen with the zeal of a Paul. His remarks were pertinent, and all in place. In relation to the pieces and religious dialogues selected for the occasion by the managers of the school, it would be hard to surpass them. The children deserve much credit for the handsome manner in which they, as a whole, acquitted themselves. There were two young men (Mr. Dingle and Mr. Wiggins) who did themselves great credit. Mr Wiggins' theme was the Christian Recorder. Oh, how we wished that all of our ministers could have been there to hear him. We must acknowledge that he did credit to both himself and the citizens of Philadelphia. Great and continued applause marked the progress of his grand and beautiful oratorical effort.

Mr. Dingle, who is one of the pupils of Prof Bassitt, of the Institute for colored youth, spoke, and his address was elegant and chaste, and clearly exhibited the fact that he had made great improvement since that time one year ago; and we must say here, although we do not wish to be understood as evincing a spirit of braggadocio, that the Bethel Sabbath School stands second to none in the city of Philadelphia, and we would not be afraid to put them against any white school in the city, as we have no doubt they would take the premium.

The hour of half-past ten having arrived, Dr. Armstrong, who has always exhibited and proved himself as a friend of the colored race, was called upon to make some remarks, which he did with great credit to himself, and showed clearly that the first missionary in the West was a colored man by the name of Stewart, and several other interesting statements.

The crowd that assembled to witness this exhibition was a complete knock-down argument that the Recorder, the organ of our Church, has done and is still doing much good. We are confident that it brought persons who would not have come under ordinary circumstances. It does our heart good to think that our humble efforts are so much appreciated in Philadelphia, the city in which we make our home.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money—and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our next Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard in order to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to a dying world.

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly—for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to do, somebody's head may have to come off. We hope that the other Bishops will do the same.

For the Christian Recorder.

FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.

February, 1862

MR. EDITOR—Dear Brother: In the first place, I would say that we like the Recorder very much, indeed, but we would like to hear a little more from the brethren and churches in the East, and also in the West. What are the brethren doing? We should hear through the paper, as it is the organ of the Church. Perhaps you think that we have given nothing. Oh, well, the East is the place of light, and I have been waiting for the proper time to approach the light with my little mite.

We have nothing of much general interest to communicate. Our church here is moving along slowly. Quinn's Chapel, the church that I am in charge of, is doing as well as could be expected under existing circumstances. We have been about nine years in building it. Three years ago it was completed, and at that time the church was nearly three thousand dollars in debt. During the administration of the Rev. John Turner, the church, through the management of himself, a few brethren, and a host of industrious sisters, was enabled to pay over eighteen hundred dollars that year, and let me say that I have found as loyal-hearted A. M. E. Methodists here as I have found anywhere; and they have had hard struggling to support the cause in this place. Yet they have, by the help of God, stood up manfully under their burden.

The church is yet considerably in debt, and we are paying it off as fast as we can, trusting in the Great Head of the Church that we will yet be able to discharge the debt entirely. The spiritual condition seems to be improving. There is a considerable revival in the membership, and the Spirit of the Lord seems to dwell in our midst, for, as often as we meet, the Lord is with us. At any rate, the Lord has done great things for us, whereof we are glad. Some eighteen or twenty years ago, we had no church here until our Rev. Father and Bishop, William Paul Quinn, planted the church, and brought Rev. George Johnson here to labor in the vineyard. Now we have two, and both of them comprise over three hundred members.

The church is well named, (Quinn's Chapel,) and as the "Pioneer of the West" still lives to cheer us with his presence, and guide us with his wisdom, we hope the chapel may long stand as a memento of his Christian worth—and when he shall have gone to rest in the bosom of the Great Shepherd and Bishop of the Church Universal.

Quinn Chapel was planned by Rev. W. R. Revels, and there is not a richer finished one in our connexion west of the mountain.

Well I must stop. It is one o'clock. Good night. Pray for us.

LETTER FROM BALTIMORE.

For the Christian Recorder.

Dreary winter is passing rapidly away, and in a few weeks we shall hail with delight another beautiful spring.

It has not been a very severe winter with us here. There has been a great deal of wet and unpleasant weather during the week, but the Sabbaths have generally been pleasant, and our church-going people have enjoyed it very much.

Dr. Brown, of Burlington, New Jersey, has been lecturing in our city with great success upon several subjects. The one that appeared to attract the most attention was that on the injurious effects of eating meat. He showed that men would be a great deal more healthy if they would eat vegetables only.

Among those converted to his theory are the Rev. Bishop Payne and some few others. It is rather doubtful whether they will hold out to the end or not.

There is quite a religious interest manifested at Bethel Church, in this city, at present. There is every indication of a great revival. On last Sabbath evening Rev. Philip Scott, of Wilmington, Delaware, preached a very able sermon to a large congregation. At the conclusion of his discourse, the prayer-meeting was commenced. A Captain of a military company was present, with several of his men. After the meeting had progressed a little while, the captain handed the following note to the pastor:

BROTHER WAYMAN—I want to pray once, as I leave on Tuesday for the battle-field—perhaps never again to attend such pleasant exercises.

CAPTAIN EVANS.

He was invited to come in front of the altar—and he prayed most fervently for the mourners around him, and then asked the Lord to go with him and his company to the battle-field and give them success. After his prayer was ended, he shook hands with the pastor and some of the other brethren near the altar, and said, "Pray for me and my company. I have not only got these epaulettes on my shoulder, but I have on the whole armor of God."

We have seldom ever witnessed such a scene as was presented on this occasion, and when Captain Evans and his men started to go out, Bro. Henry Braddicks sang—

Fight on, ye old soldiers,
You will soon be discharged,
The war will be ended,
And your treasure enlarged.

There was a general weeping all over the church, and there was many a voice that said, "God bless Captain Evans." W.

BISHOP NAZREY, OR THE TRUE STATE OF THE CASE.

In the 54th number of this paper, we wrote an article upon the subject with which this is headed. We commenced that article by saying, "Within a few months past the peace and quietude of the A. M. E. Church has been not a little disturbed by the discussion of the question, What relationship does Bishop Nazrey sustain to the A. M. E. Church in the United States?" And after having shown that there are three, and only three, possible phases to this question, one only of which can be true, we concluded that article by saying, "Does not this state of things require that the Bishops and members of the A. M. E. Church should come together, in the name of the Lord, and make a friendly settlement of these disputed questions? It can be done, it should be done, and the men who love the cause of God and his church more than they do endless disputations, should come together and settle them." To this simple, plain, and easily to be understood article, Rev. A. W. Wayman, under the assumed name of Presbyter, in the 58th number of the CHRISTIAN RECORDER, replies: "There was so much inconsistency in Rev. J. P. Campbell's communication that it appeared to me that it requires a man that was non compos mentis to understand him." So says Rev. A. W. Wayman.

Now, having read and analyzed the sentence just quoted from that writer, let me ask men who are truly learned, if they think that he will die from the effects of insanity, arising from his mind being overtaxed with a knowledge of the rules of Syntax, and their just application in composition, would you take him to be a good Latin scholar, a sound philosopher, a man of extensive information, real knowledge and correct taste?

These propositions we will leave with you—for the time being—and pass on to another.

Old Gum, from Port Deposit, says: "A great cry in the fog, and clouds, darkness and gloom." A very bad state of things, we should judge this to be, appearing in the moral heavens. But as he is crying in the fog, clouds, darkness and gloom, he has a claim to our sympathies, and we own it to be our bounden duty to do what we can towards clearing away these fogs, clouds, darkness and gloom from the moral atmosphere of his mind, and letting the clear light of truth shine upon his dark and benighted understanding.

Rev. T. Strother, of Terre Haute, thinks he has made "A discovery of inconsistencies." And after telling us what he conceives them to be, he tells us himself that he does not know what the major proposition is about which he is writing; for, he says, "If I knew which one of the Church organizations he [that is Bishop Nazrey,] went with, in the division of the Churches as named above, and if I knew how often he had resigned since, and if I knew what church or churches he has attached himself to since such resignation, I would know then precisely where to go to find him, and in that way I would put a stop to any further wrangling or jangling on the subject."

Now, as Brother Strother says that he lacks knowledge upon the subject about which he writes, and he would put a stop to any farther wrangling or jangling on the subject if he had the required information, we are disposed not to enter into a discussion with him; but we are inclined, if possible, to give him that information which he seems to want.

Rev. J. M. Brown, chief editor of the Repository, volume 4, number 1, page 19, says: "The Episcopal difficulty continues. We are no nearer the end than we were at our last issue." This is the conclusion at which he arrives after all that has been said and written upon the subject in a friendly spirit by several well-informed writers, and himself among the number of them. He concludes the article to which we have alluded with the following written decision: "This and all other decisions looking to Bishop Nazrey's occupying this double Episcopal relation is contrary to the expressed will of our General Conference." As authority for this decision, he refers us to General Conference Minutes, 1860, page 33. Now, with all due respect to that brother, we are bold to take exception to this decision, and say that, we learn no such thing from that page.

In the fear of the Lord, with an eye single to the glory of God, let us endeavor to cast some additional light upon this subject. While engaged in an attempt to do this, we hope to be not guilty of making personal attacks upon men, or impugning their motives. We are at liberty to discuss principles, and not men and their motives. Commencing with page 10, General Conference Minutes for 1856, ye read that the following action took place:

"H. J. Young read a request emanating from the Canada Annual Conference, upon the subject of granting them permission to withdraw, and form a separate A. M. E. Church in Canada." The whole was referred to a select committee, viz.: John Peck, J. P. Campbell, Dr. Bias, H. J. Young, John A. Warren, A. R. Green and A. W. Wayman.

That committee reported favorably to the granting of said request, and after the committee had given their reasons why said request should be granted, page 21, they say: "Your committee, however, would greatly deprecate any thing in the division that would have a tendency to sever the union now existing between the A. M. E. Church of the United States of America, and that of the Province of Canada, while we recommend the adoption of a Book of Discipline in loyalty with government. We, therefore, recommend that in order to the continuation of a reciprocity of feeling and interest, a corresponding delegation should exist between the A. M. E. Church in the States and the A. M. E. Church in the Province of Canada, who shall fully participate in the deliberations of the General and Annual Conferences, but not vote. If any of the ministers or members desire to remove from one connexion to the other, they shall be received by certificate, with all their standing, so that a friendly relation may continue between the two connexions. Although they exist under different governments, we shall be bound together by cords never to be broken. Adopted."

Afternoon session of the same day, we have the following action:

"Resolved, That this General Conference appoint a delegation of three to meet the Convention in Canada, at the organization of the Church there, who shall learn in person what connexion that Church may desire with the A. M. E. Church in the States, and what participation that Church may wish in the Book Concern of our Church."

"Stephen Smith, M. M. Clarke and A. R. Green were chosen said committee, and were requested to report at the next General Conference."

Page 29, William H. Jones offered the following:

"Whereas, The General Conference has set off the Canadian District to become a separate body from the A. M. E. Church in the United States, and

"Whereas, The people, and we, their representatives in this General Conference, have the most implicit confidence in Rev. Willis Nazrey, therefore,

"Resolved, That we hereby most respectfully request and petition this General Conference to allow or grant Rev. Willis Nazrey, if it be his pleasure, to withdraw from this branch of the Church, to superintend the Church in Canada.

"Signed—Wm. H. Jones, H. J. Young, George W. Brodie and Robert Jones."

M. M. Clarke moved the following as an amendment:

"Whereas, This General Conference does not feel authorized to give one of its Bishops to that portion of the connexion unsolicited, therefore,

"Resolved, That when we shall be solicited for one, (if before next General Conference,) all our Bishops shall meet, with three elders selected by them, and decide which of the Bishops shall serve in Canada, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Church. Agreed to."

From the above stated proceedings it will appear that three committees or nine persons were appointed, or authority given for the same, to attend the Convention in Canada. Now, common sense as well as usage would suggest the propriety that the reports of such important committees would have been called for at the General Conference of 1860, that their report should have been read, received, the committees discharged, and their report having become the property of the house, should have been properly disposed of by the General Conference. But nothing like this was done. It is true there was a committee appointed upon Canadian affairs to which was referred all papers and documents relating to the Church in Canada. But this did not make up the deficiency occurring through the neglect relative to the reports of the committees authorized by the previous General Conference, and which did not in the interval.

General Conference Minutes for 1860, page 15, the 3d section of the committee's report on Canadian affairs, requesting Bishop Nazrey to resign forthwith, was taken up. With regard to this matter, we claim that the committee transcended the bounds of their appointment. Who told them to request Bishop Nazrey to resign forthwith whatever relation he sustained to the British M. E. Church? This was not the work assigned them, and in it they transcended the bounds of strict propriety. After the committee introduced this inappropriate and unnecessary matter, the General Conference took it up and acted upon it, feeling that they must make some disposition of it, as it had been smuggled in with other things contained in the report of the committee.

Here let me ask men of reason, judgment, knowledge, wisdom and grace, if this very resolution does not lay at the foundation of all the difficulty in the discussion now passing under review? And was not that inappropriate and unnecessary resolution originally put into the report of that committee as a test question? Can the writer of that report give any other account of it? Let him answer that question to God, and the Church whose peace and quiet have been disturbed by it.

Page 15. C. H. Pearce arose and said that the General Conference having, by vote, decided that Bishop Nazrey was Bishop of the B. M. E. Church, he would, therefore, ask by what authority this General Conference asked him to resign. He asked that the following protest might be placed upon the Minutes:

"Protest of Charles H. Pearce:—To the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church, in behalf of the members of the B. M. E. Church. I protest against the action of this General Conference, requesting Bishop Nazrey to resign, after having decided by vote that he belonged to the B. M. E. Church; and farther, if this Conference wish him, they ought to ask the B. M. E. Church for him." "Signed, Charles H. Pearce."

Now, the questions to be decided are these:

1st. What force, if any, is there in those words, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Church, as found in the Clarke resolution?

2d. How did Bishop Nazrey come to exercise Episcopal jurisdiction over the Ohio District, and also at the same time exercise jurisdiction in the Canadian Church? Was it done by his own or some other authority?

3d. Should the agreement of the A. M. E. General Conference for 1856 with the Canadians through their legally appointed delegates be respected or not?

4th. What effect should the protest of the delegate from the B. M. E. Church, 1860, to the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church have upon the subject in question? or do we assume that it was not entitled to have respect paid to it?

5th. When a law, rule, or covenant is enacted, made or agreed to, and the said covenant is ratified between two or more parties, can the said law, rule or covenant be abrogated, set aside, made null and void by one of the parties, at will, and whenever it will without the consent of the other party or parties?

6th. Is not a minister of Jesus Christ commanded to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, and if, in obedience to that command, the Church sends him into the Province referred to above, can it be truthfully said that he is exercising double jurisdiction, and also double functions, because he may be exercising double jurisdiction by special appointment, by the Church having jurisdiction over him, and power to assign him his appropriate work and field of labor?

7th. Can it be said of a minister of state, sent to a foreign court, that he is exercising double functions when performing those duties assigned him, by his government, to that foreign court?

Toronto, C. W., Sep. 1860.

In General Conference assembled, Bishop Nazrey here arose and read a written resignation, which he said he had promised to present at the close of this Conference, whereupon Wm. H. Jones, from the Committee on Episcopacy, moved to lay the resignation on the table. Carried, and offered the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, We have learned from printed Minutes of the General Conference of A. M. E. Church, held in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., U. S., 1860, and from our delegate to the said Conference that after that body had reviewed all the circumstances of our separation, and had positively declared Willis Nazrey as much the general superintendent of the B. M. E. Church as Wm. P. Quinn and D. A. Payne are of the A. M. E. Church, did positively demand by vote his (Willis Nazrey's) unconditional resignation from the B. M. E. Church, and,

Whereas, the resignation just offered by Willis Nazrey is consequent upon the action of the said Pittsburgh General Conference, &c., therefore,

Resolved, That we cannot, and will not, consent to it under any considerations; but do hereby most solemnly renew our former declaration that Willis Nazrey is, by virtue of a clear understanding and regular agreement, made in good faith, between the A. M. E. Church and the B. M. E. Church, to all intents and purposes General Superintendent of the B. M. E. Church. 3d. The decree of the General Conference, upon the authority of which Bishop Nazrey was appointed, declared that he should be given to the Canadian Church, in accordance with their wishes. Here is no time specified; no term of years mentioned, in which said Bishop should serve in Canada; but in accordance with the wishes of the Canadians. The wishes of the Canadians were fully expressed in our vote, that Willis Nazrey should exercise the Episcopal office in the B. M. E. Church during life. These are the views of the Canadians in relation to the connexion existing between them and Bishop Nazrey, expressed in General Conference, assembled September, 1860.

If the unreasonable ground assumed by those who have asserted and attempted to prove, (but happily for the church have failed to do so,) that Bishop Nazrey is not a member of the A. M. E. Church be admitted, where are we? And what else must be admitted to agree with this state of things? 1st. We must admit that the General Conferences of 1856–60 were both composed of ignorant men, and were also unworthy of the name and position they occupied. 2d. It would follow, from such an admission, that the Ohio District was left from 1856–60 without a Bishop, and hence all that was done there was done illegally. 3d. It follows that our last General Conference was illegal; for out of the twenty-three sessions which we held, Bishop Nazrey presided over thirteen of them. To admit the first and third of these conclusions would be to insult the understanding of every intelligent member of the General Conferences. To admit the second conclusion would be equally as insulting, not only to the understanding of our brethren of the Ohio District, but also to their good sense and better judgment. There is but one alternative left, i. e., we must either admit by saying that Bishop Nazrey is not a member of the A. M. E. Church, all of these preposterous ideas, or admit that he did exercise legal authority during those four years, both in Canada and in the United States at the same time. Having shown that Bishop Nazrey, during the four years referred to, did exercise legal authority in both places, we ask, when did the legal authority of this double service, hitherto performed by him, cease? There are but four methods by which a Bishop, or any other member of the A. M. E. Church can lose their relationship to said church, to wit: by death, resignation, expulsion, or removal by certificate. Has the Bishop lost his relationship to the A. M. E. Church, in either of these respects? We answer, no. There are those who maintain that to admit Bishop Nazrey to be Bishop in the United States would be to admit him double functions, i. e., he is two Bishops in one. This is not true. The idea of performing double service does not imply double functions any more than the idea of one man doing as much labor as two men ought to do; or is assigned to them, implies that he is two men in one. The Clark resolution of 1856, empowered all of our Bishops, with three elders selected by them, to say which of the Bishops should serve in Canada, in accordance with the wishes of that church. This authority was granted without date or limit, as to how long the Bishop should serve. This Clark resolution was not rescinded by the General Conference of 1860. Hence, we conclude that, even now there is no legal prohibition against Bishop Nazrey exercising Episcopal functions in the A. M. E. Church, and performing Episcopal work in Canada.

We are now, as we were in the General Conference for 1860, opposed to the thing in itself; but our opposition does not alter the existence of the thing. It really may exist, and has existed, our opposition to the contrary notwithstanding.

Dear brethren, in view of the state of things, is it not reasonable that our bishops and elders should meet together, in one of the Annual Conferences, and talk the matter over, and settle it, in an humble, meek, and lowly spirit, in the name of our great Master? This may and should be done. May the Lord grant unto all of us the spirit by which it may be accomplished. Amen.

MAN'S ACCOUNTABILITY.

Of him to whom much is given, of him much shall be required.—Bible.

When first the fallen angel did beguile
Our spotless, beauteous, glorious first mother,
He in the serpent's fascinating form with magic wile,
Succeeds his hideous deformity to cover.
In kindly tones, with winning voice, this treacherous foe
Her only good and happiness, pretends to seek and know.
But, cursed 'bove all the beasts of earth,
This well adapted instrument of sin.
The devil set his wits to work. And now, said he,
I'll find
A noble and more Godlike form to enter in.
Through earth and hell he searched with anxious care,
The form, the guise he thought most fitting for to wear.
Lo, now, he stops! he smiles! Ah, bold and sure his subtle plan.
But who's found vile enough his corrupt work to do?
Not man,
For he was formed to love, to honor, and protect
This being pure, though frail and of the weaker sex.
Yet, ah! alas, 'tis so! doth not time's annals prove,
The being, woman's nature 'tis to trust and love.
Strong minded man—creation's boasted lord—is Satan's willing tool.
And through a conquered [illegible], yet is he the greater fool,
For if to him the mind—the will superior, dominion over woman's given,
Why not his influence wield aright, and guide her loyal soil to God and virtue, happiness and heaven.

DR. THOMPSON ON THE REBELLION.

We take pleasure in giving Rev. Dr. Thompson's views (Editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal) upon the great absorbing question of the day. In commenting on Dr Hunter's letter, (which was inserted in the Christian Advocate,) who is inclined to advocate the Constitution by the recognition of human beings as goods and chattels, Dr. Thompson, who may be considered the exponent of the M. E. Church, being at the head of the principal organ, speaks as follows:—

Our readers know that we deny the right of secession; that in time of peace we never advocated any emancipation but the legal, gradual, and compensated; that we advocate no other now for the States which remain loyal; that we do not favor, even in insurgent States, a servile insurrection, which, we believe, a decree of emancipation would prevent by affording hope of deliverance without it. If Dr. Hunter correctly interprets Mr Cochrane, we do not agree with that gentleman; but we have so often been misinterpreted ourselves that we condemn no man without a hearing, and the attempt to render him obnoxious, in order to render us more so by comparison, is a fine rhetorical artifice, but rather too transparent.

But to the illustration. Suppose a conservative clergyman placed in command of our army. Drawing up his line before Manassas, he addresses his soldiers: "We have been called out to put down insurrection, but we have brought the Constitution into camp, as Israel took the ark of God to Ebenezer. That instrument expressly declares that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.' This implies a court, an indictment, a hearing, a finding, a sentence, and an execution. We are in legal form to take our Southern brethren separately and bring them before the proper tribunal." Should it be said they are traitors, the general could reply, "The law condemns no man unheard, and the Constitution says that no person shall be convicted of treason except on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act. Having taken up arms to carry the Constitution over revolted territory, it were outrage to violate the sacred instrument upon the very border of that territory."

Suppose, however, Minie balls perforate the hearts of his officers, and shells from masked batteries bursting along his lines disembowel his soldiers, he would be likely to say, "If we don't kill these rebels they will kill us; forward, fire, charge; show what stuff you're made of; take those batteries."

After battle he might think he had acted according to law; not, however, of peace, but of war; not by process of Constitution, but process of gunpowder. Should the Chief Justice send a habeas corpus after his prisoners, or Beauregard get out a replevin for the captured cannon, he would probably try the officers of the law by drum-head court-martial.

Imagine the enemy about to renew the engagement with overwhelming numbers, and a large body of ragged, but stalwart slaves of rebels offering to stand in the front rank in battle on condition of liberty.

"Awful!" cries the general, "that a war for the Constitution should result in its violation." Should it be said you have already violated the Constitution by depriving men of life, liberty, and property without legal process; and that the Confederacy has renounced the Constitution, secured recognition by the world as a belligerent power, sent commissioners to foreign courts in European ports commissioned privateers to prey upon our commerce, and defied practically a recognition from our own government, which treats with it by commissioners under a flag of truce, and disposes of convicted pirates as prisoners of war, because of its authority, the general might say: "They are rebels, and we may blow them to destruction; but to arm slave against master would be to extinguish the Constitution in a sea of blood." It reminded that war is always tragical; that the responsibility is upon the party that begins it; that the more atrocious it is the shorter, and, therefore, the more humane; that a war of months, with the aid of slaves, is less cruel than a war of years without it, the general might reply: "There is peculiar sacredness about that clause which protects slavery, so that, though we may imprison freemen, we cannot free bondmen, though we may block up ports which nature has opened to the commerce of the world, we may not open the paths which man has closed to the freedom of his fellow; though we may take life without legal process, we may not give liberty as. Slavery, I know, is the sum of all villanies: it steals the children of Africa, degrades labor, destroys human brotherhood; it puts the manhood of man, the chastity of woman, the unity of the family, the sanctity of the Sabbath, and the gates of the temple in the power of the master; it hides the key of knowledge and withholds the word of God and cries at will, 'Going—going—gone,' over human hearts. It hath its revenges on the master too, for it opens the gate to his lust, loosens the reins of his passions, bewilders his intellect, sears his conscience, obscures to his vision the bright forms of liberty and justice, and exhibits the face of God as the patron of its concentrated wrong. It has filled a belt of States with treason and perjury, disgraced the character, invaded the territory, stolen the property, exiled the friends, blockaded the capital of the United States; to turn down our flag within a tract, the greater of which was bought with our money, and stre around it a line of troops, so that our citizens [illegible] not penetrate it without fire and sword: yet we m hold it sacred."

But, general, while the enemy threatens to lay us down, pitch your Constitution into the Potomac, and divide the Union into hostile despotic States, whose contests will read God knows when! ought we to hold the guarantees of slavery in disloyal States above the safeguards of liberty in loyal ones? The general might reply, "If we do not, men will call us Abolitionists, and quote us out of countenance. If they were to quote the Bible, O how I could quote back! If they would quote Davis and Stephens, mercy! how I could quote Washington, and Franklin, and Jefferson, and Patrick Henry, and the Declaration of Independence, and even the preamble of the Constitution; but I fear they will quote the National Intelligencer, which would imply that we are in a storm of passion, or fired by 'hatred,' or ignorant what spirit we are of. Better slavery drive its ploughshare of ruin over the Union, and extinguish the lighthouse of liberty on the stormy sea of the nations."

Determine quickly what to do with these men, for Beauregard will be on us, and if they don't stand in our intrenchments, they will in his. "Well," replies the general, "The Law! the Law! I have always magnified it. When I breathe the sweet breath of morn and cry, with full heart, 'Hail, holy light!' when I sit in my cottage door and see God feeding the leaves with his dew, or folding the wings of his insect children, or leading forth the stars as a shepherd does his flock; when I walk the fields of science, whether I turn the microscope upon the atoms that float in the sunbeam, or the telescope upon the orbs which wheel their eternal courses through the celestial spaces; when by faith I stand in Paradise, and hear God say, 'Therefore, shall a man leave his father and mother, and they twain shall be one flesh,' and listen to the echoes of the voice rolling through the ages from the lips of his Son; when I stand on Sinai, and, while the mountain trembles, and thunders, and flames, read on the tables of stone, "Thou shalt not steal;" when I stand on Judean mountains, and hear the prophet's summary of human duty, 'To do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God;' when I stand on the plains of Bethlehem and listen to the song of angels, and hear it echoed through the centuries in louder and louder numbers; when I sit on hills of Galilee and hear Him who came from heaven to heal the broken-hearted, and set at liberty them that are bruised; when I stand on Calvary and behold the 'Lamb' dying to make men sons of God; when I stand at the judgment seat and hear, 'For I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me; I was in prison, and ye came unto me,' I think of Law, and when I stand in the midst of my dear ones, and think of a destroyer entering my castle, violating my wife, enslaving my children, and selling my body on the auction-block, I find a Mount Sinai in my own breast all earthquake and thunder and flame with divine law. Yet all this I can bear to see, on occasion, violated; but when I come to the rebel Mason's Fugitive Slave Law I feel that the necessity of necessities is upon me, my awe becomes too profound, night falls upon nature, the sun goes down over the prophets, the sword is poised on its way, and my tongue breaks forth in the sublime words of Hooker: 'Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice is the harmony of the world; all things in heaven and earth do her homage.'"

Now we believe that our amiable friend, Dr. Hunter—one of the best of men—would not say so, but would say, "For the ark of the Constitution, for the life of the nation, for the liberty of humanity, let the negroes come. If they are property, let them follow the law of confiscation; if they are men, let them earn their liberty behind our batteries."

Our theory is this: we are in a state of war; while it rages let civil rights yield to military necessities. When the rebel system is dissolved, and the wandering orbs are reophered in the firmament of the Union, then may they feel the guarantees of its fundamental law. Meanwhile, let us plead before the Father in the name of his Son for both the disloyal and loyal States, recognizing in the revolutions of barbarism, no less than in the evolutions of Christianity the working of a higher law, which sweeps through all time and space, and issues from Him before whom we hope forever to bow, crying, "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty! just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints!"

EPISCOPAL.

BISHOP MCILVAINE IN ENGLAND.

One of the most eminent and honored bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country is the Right Rev. Charles Petit McIlvaine, D. D., D. C. L., bishop of Ohio. For some weeks past this venerable prelate has been sojourning in England, where he has long had many friends and admirers for an American clergyman. He has in more than one instance preached by request before her Majesty the Queen. When the Prince of Wales visited the United States, in the autumn of 1860, we believe he paid the Bishop a visit at his residence in Ohio. The influence of the latter in England, we have reason to believe, has been most salutary. His letters from there breathe the spirit of a Christian and a patriot—one who dares to espouse the right in the face of obloquy and blind prejudice. A telegram from Washington relates that soon after the death of Prince Albert, Bishop McIlvaine addressed a letter of condolence to the Prince of Wales, enclosing it to Gen. Bruce, with the request that it might be delivered. The letter was received, and in a few days elicited an answer, thanking the Bishop for his attention. Not long after this, the Bishop was en route for the Isle of Wight, standing upon the deck of the steamer alone, when a royal yacht passed with the Prince of Wales and General Bruce aboard, who, in passing, waved their hats; the recognition, as soon as the Bishop was told who the party were, was mutual. The quiet, but powerful influence of such men in England just now, when disloyal Americans are doing their utmost to fan the jealousy of our English brethren into a flame, is most fortunate, and will, doubtless, accomplish more towards shaping public sentiment abroad, regarding the eternal principles of right involved in our present contest, than a host of rebel envoys. Several known sympathizers with Secession, in England, are said to have their views changed entirely through conversations had with this distinguished clergyman.

If you want to set the dogs on sectarianism and sectarians, search for the most unmitigated sectarian within the range of your acquaintance, and employ him. He will bite them on.

SPEECH OF JOHN S. ROCK, ESQ.

At the annual meeting of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, Thursday Evening, Jan. 23.

We give place this week, to the speech delivered by Brother Rock, of Boston, which we know will be interesting to our readers, and would do well to be hung up in the halls of Congress,—nay, in the house of the President, as an argument in behalf of the black man, that the very same God is the author of both—or all the human family, and that he is no respecter of persons

Language and Gentlemen.—I am here not so much to make a speech as to add a little more color to this occasion. (Laughter.)

I do not hope that it is right that I should speak, at this time, for it is said that we have talked too much already; and it is being continually thundered in our ears that the time for speech-making is ended, and the time for action has arrived. Perhaps this is so. This may be the theory of the people, but we all know that the active idea has found but little sympathy with either of our great military commanders, or the National Executive; for they have told us, again and again, that "patience is a cure for all sores," and that we must wait for the "good time" which, to us, has been long-a-coming. (Applause.)

It is not my desire, neither is it the time for me to criticise the Government, even if I had the disposition so to do. The situation of the black man in this country is far from being an enviable one. To-day, our heads are in the lion's mouth, and we must get them out the best way we can. To contend against the Government is as difficult as it is to sit in Rome and fight with the Pope. (Laughter.) It is probable, that, if we had the malice of the Anglo-Saxon, we would watch our chances and seize the first opportunity to take our revenge. If we attempted this, the odds would be against us, and the first thing we should know would be —nothing! (Laughter.) The most of us are capable of perceiving that the man who spits against the wind, spits in his own face! (Laughter.)

While Mr. Lincoln has been more conservative than I had hoped to find him, I recognize in him an honest man, striving to redeem the country from the degradation and shame into which Mr. Buchanan and his predecessors have plunged it. (Applause.)

This nation is mad. In its devoted attachment to the negro, it has run crazy after him. (laughter,) and now, having caught him, hangs on with a deadly grasp, and says to him, with more earnestness and pathos than Ruth expressed to Naomi, "Where thou goest, I will go; where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God." (Laughter and applause.)

Why this wonderful attachment? My brother (Mr Remond) spoke ably and eloquently to you this afternoon, and told you of the cruel and inhuman prejudices of the white people of this country. He was right. But has he not failed to look on the other side of this question? Has he not observed the deep and abiding affection that they have for the negro, which "neither height, nor depth, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor to come, can separate from this love," which reaches to their very souls? Renewed laughter and applause.)

I do not deny that there is a deep and cruel prejudice lurking in the bosoms of the white people of this country. It is much more abundant in the North than in the South. Here, it is to be found chiefly among the higher and lower classes; and there is no scarcity of it among the poor whites at the South. The cause of this prejudice may be seen at a glance. The educated and wealthy class despise the negro, because they have robbed him of his hard earnings, or, at least, have got rich off the fruits of his labor; and they believe if he gets his freedom, their fountain will be dried up, and they will be obliged to seek business in a new channel. Their "occupation will be gone." The lowest class hate him because he is poor, as they are, and is a competitor with them for the same labor. The poor ignorant white man, who does not understand that the interest of the laboring classes is mutual, argues in this wise: "Here is so much labor to be performed,—that darkey does it. If he was gone, I should have his place." The rich and the poor are both prejudiced from interest, and not because they entertain vague notions of justice and humanity. While uttering my solemn protest against this American vice, which has done more than any other thing to degrade the American people in the eyes of the civilized world, I am happy to state that there are many who have never known this sin, and many others who have been converted to the truth by the "foolishness of anti-slavery preaching," and are deeply interested in the welfare of the race, and never hesitate to use their means and their influence to help break off the yoke that has been so long crushing us. I thank them all, and hope the number may be multiplied, until we shall have a people who will know no man save by his virtues and his merits. (Loud applause.)

Now, it seems to me that a blind man can see that the present war is an effort to nationalize, perpetuate, and extend slavery in this country. In short, slavery is the cause of the war: I might say, is the war itself. Had it not been for slavery we should have had no war! Through two hundred and forty years of indescribable tortures, slavery has wrung out of the blood, bones and muscles of the negro, hundreds of millions of dollars, and by its use in make this nation rich. At the same time, [illegible] which has burst forth, and, in a less number of [illegible] this wicked and self-considered the Government bankrupt! And, strange as it may appear, you still cling to this monstrous iniquity, notwithstanding it is daily sinking the country lower and lower! (Hear, hear.) Some of our ablest and best men have been sacrificed to appease the wrath of this American god. (Hear, hear.) There was Fremont—God bless him (loud applause,)—who, under pretence of fraud in his contracts, to the amount of several thousand dollars, was set aside for a Hunker Kidnapper. If Fremont made a mistake of a few thousand dollars,—which no one claims was intentional, on his part,—what do you think of the terrible delay which has cost, and is costing us two millions a day? Who is responsible for this great sacrifice of treasure? (Hear, hear.) Then, there was Mr. Cameron, the head of whose garments was not soiled with Anti-Slavery, except what he got from his official position, as it was forced upon his convictions. But, standing where he did, he saw the real enemy of the country; and because he favored setting at its vitals, his head was cut off, and that of a Hunker's substituted! There is a storm in that cloud which, to-day, though no larger than a man's hand, is destined to sweep over this country and wake up this guilty nation. Then we shall know where the fault is, and if these dry bones can live! (Loud applause.)

The Government wishes to bring back the country to what it was before. This is possible; but what is to be gained by it? If we are fools enough to retain the cancer that is eating out our vitals, when we can safely extirpate it, who will pity us if we see our mistake when we are past recovery? (Hear, hear.) The Abolitionists see this day of tribulation and reign of terror long ago, and warned you of it; but your sons d not hear! You now say that it is their agitation, which has brought about this terrible civil war! That is to say, your friend sees a slow match set near a keg of gunpowder in your house, and timely warns you of the danger which he sees is inevitable; you despise his warning, and, after the explosion, say, if he had not told you of it, it would not have happened! (Loud applause.)

Now, when some leading men who hold with the policy of the President, and yet pretend to be liberal, argue, that while they are willing to admit that the slave has an undoubted right to his liberty, the master has an equal right to his property; that to liberate the slave would be to injure the master, and a greater good would be accomplished to the country in these times, by the loyal master's retaining his property, than by giving to the slave his liberty,—I do not understand it so. Slavery is treason against God, man and the nation. The master has no right to be a partner in a conspiracy which has shaken the very foundation of the universe. Even to apologize for it, while in open rebellion, is to aid and abet in treason. The master's right to his property in human flesh cannot be equal to the slave's right to his liberty. The former right is acquired, either by kidnapping, or unlawful purchase from kidnappers, or inheritance from kidnappers. The very claim invalidates itself. On the other hand, liberty is the inalienable right of every human being; and liberty can make no compromise with slavery. The guiltiness of slavery to the master can bear no relative comparison to the goodness of liberty to the slave. Liberty and slavery are contraries, and separated from each other as good from evil, light from darkness, heaven from hell. (Applause.) We trace effects to their cause. The evils brought upon the slave and the free colored man are traced to slavery. If slavery is better than freedom, its effects must also be better; for the better effect is from the better cause, and the better result from the better principle; and conversely, of better effects and results, the causes and principles are better. The greater good is that which we would most desire to be the cause to ourselves and our friends, and the greater evil is that which would give us the deeper affliction to have involved upon them or ourselves. Now, there is no one man who would not rather have his liberty, and be stripped of every other earthly comfort, and see his friends in a like situation, than be doomed to slavery with its indescribable category of cruelty and wrongs—

"Sometimes loaded with heavy chains,
And flogged till the keen lash stains."

It may be no easy matter to apologize for slavery; but after applying the great test,—The Golden Rule—of "doing unto others as we would have them do unto us," we must admit that no apology can be made for slavery. And of all the miserable miscreants who have attempted to apologize for, and extol, the happy condition of the slave, I have never seen one of them willing to take the place of one of those so called "happy creatures." (Loud applause.)

To day, when it is a military necessity, and when the safety of the country is dependant upon emancipation, our humane political philosophers are puzzled to know what would become of the slaves if they were emancipated! The idea seems to prevail that the poor things would suffer, if robbed of the glorious privileges they now enjoy! If they could not be flogged, half-starved, and work to support in ease and luxury those who have never waived an opportunity to outrage and wrong them, they would pine away and die! Do you imagine that the negro can live outside of slavery? Of course, now, they can take care of themselves and their masters too; but if you give them their liberty, must they not suffer? (Laughter and applause.) Have you ever been able to see through all this? Have you not observed that the locality of the origin of sympathy in favor of the poor slave is in the pocket of the slaveholder and the man who shares in the profits of slave labor? Of course you have; and I do not [illegible] wealth. You know, if they do not have somebody to work for them, they must leave their gilded saloons, and take off their coats and roll up their sleeves, and take [illegible] you are aware, these respectable gentlemen will not do, for they have been so long accustomed to live by [illegible] and cheating the negro, that they are [illegible] parlor to the influences that have been brought upon us to crush us. This could not have been said of your race when it was oppressed and enslaved! Another reason is, this nation has wronged us, and for this reason many hate us. Hear, hear. The Spanish proverb is, "Donde que ofierre nuesa ben is quier"—Since I have wronged you, I have never liked you. This is true not only of Spaniards and Americans, but of every other class of people. When a man wrongs another, he not only hates him, but tries to make others dislike him. Strange as this may appear, it is nevertheless painfully true. You may help a man during his life time, and you are a capital fellow; but your first refusal brings down his ire, and shows you his ingratitude. When he has got all he can from you, he has no further use for you. When the orange is squeezed we throw it aside. (Laughter.) The black man is a good fellow while he is a slave, and toils for nothing, but the moment he claims his own flesh and blood and bones he is a most obnoxious creature, and there is a proposition to get rid of him! He is happy while he remains a poor, degraded, ignorant slave, without even the right to his own offspring. While in this condition, the master can ride in the same carriage, sleep in the same bed, and nurse from the same bosom. But give this same slave the right to use his own legs, his hands, his body and his mind, and this happy and desirable creature is instantly transformed into a miserable and loathsome wretch. It only be colonized somewhere near the mountains of the moon, or [illegible] and the presence of [illegible] disappears. You must not lose sight of the fact that it is the emancipated slave and the free colored man whom it is [illegible] not those who [illegible] the country and ministers as it were to [illegible] and the grand de[illegible] (Loud applause.)

It is true, to a great [illegible] have been induced to go to Liberia and to Hayti, but be assured, the more intelligent portion of the colored people will remain here; not because we prefer being oppressed here to being freemen in other countries, but we will remain because we believe our future prospects are better here than elsewhere, and because our experience has proved that the greater proportion of those who have left this country during the last thirty years have made the condition worse and would have gladly returned if they could have done so. You may rest assured that we shall remain here always, where we have attained almost everything. Now, when our prospects begin to brighten, we are the more encouraged to stay, pay off the old scores, and have a reconstruction of things. There are those of us who [illegible] that we have [illegible] of [illegible] in the east and moving South west! (Applause.)

[illegible] vernment is only [illegible] that must be cut. Here you perceive it is mistaken. The North is in error. She has suffered the South, like a wayward child, to do as she would and now, when she [illegible] trouble. If you wish to prevent a pending evil, destroy the source at once. If the first sparks were quenched there would be no flame. For how can he kill who dares not be angry? or how can he be refused who fears an oath? All [illegible] struggle of a destroying tendency and oppression are but childish sports let alone until they are ungovernable. The choking of the fountain is the surest way to cut off the [illegible] The Government has not had the courage to do this. Having sown the wind, we are now reaping the whirlwind; but in the end I think it will be conceded by all, that we shall have gathered in a glorious harvest. (Loud applause.)

I do not regard this trying hour as a dark one. The war that has been waged on us for more than two centuries has opened our eyes and caused us to form still nearer to that instead of acting on the defensive, we are now prepared to attack the enemy. This is simply a change of [illegible] I think I see the finger of God in this. Yes, there is the hand writing on the wall: I come not to bring peace, but the sword. Break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free. I have heard the groans of my people, and am come down to deliver them! (Loud and long continued applause.)

At present, it looks as though we were drifting into a foreign war, and if we do have one, slavery must go down with it. It is not the time now for me to discuss the relation of the black man to such a war. Perhaps no one cares what we think, or have we feel on this subject. You think yourselves strong now. The wisest man and the strongest man is generally the most ignorant and the most feeble. Be not deceived. No man is so feeble that he cannot do you an injury! (Hear, hear.) If you should get into a difficulty of this kind, it would be to your interest that we should be your friends. You remember the lion had need of the mouse. (Applause.) You have spurned our offers, and disregarded our feelings, and on this account we have manifested but little interest in, and have been apparently indifferent observers of this contest; but appearances are deceitful—every man who snores is not asleep. (Applause.)

I believe the conduct of both the bond and the free has been exceedingly injudicious. It is times like these that try men. It is storms and tempests that give reputation to pilots. If we have a foreign war, the black man's services will be needed. Seventy-five thousand freemen capable of bearing arms, and three quarters of a million of slaves wild with the enthusiasm caused by the dawn of the glorious opportunity of being able to strike a genuine blow for freedom, will be a power that "white men will be bound to respect." (Applause.) Let the people of the United States do their duty, and treat us as the people of all other nations treat us—as men; if they will do this, our last drop of blood is ready to be sacrificed in defence of the liberty of this country. (Loud applause.) But if you continue to deny us our rights, and spurn our offers except as menials, colored men will be worse than fools to take up arms at all. (Hear hear.) We will stand by you, however, and wish you that success which you will not deserve. (Applause.)

This rebellion for slavery means something! Out of it emancipation must spring. I do not agree with those men who see no hope in this war. (Hear, hear.) There is nothing in it but hope. (Applause.) Our cause is onward. As it is with the sun, the clouds often obstruct his vision, but in the end we find there has been no standing still (Applause.) It is true the Government is but little more anti-slavery now than it was at the commencement of the war; but while fighting for its own existence, it has been obliged to take slavery by the throat, and sooner or later must choke her to death (Loud applause.) Jeff. Davis is to the slaveholders what Pharaoh was to the Egyptians, and Abraham Lincoln and his successor, John C. Fremont, (Applause) will be to us what Moses was to the Israelites. (Continued applause.) I may be mistaken, but I think the sequel will prove that I am correct. I have faith in God and gunpowder and lead, (loud applause,) and believe we ought not to be discouraged. (Applause.) We have withstood the sixth trial, and in the seventh our courage must not falter. I thank God I have lived to see this great day, when the nation is to be weighed in the balances, and I hope not found wanting. (Applause.) This State and the National Government have treated us most shamefully, but as this is not the first time, I suppose we shall live through it. In the hour of danger we have not been found wanting. As the Government has not had the courage to receive the help that has been standing ready and waiting to assist her, we will now stand still and see the salvation of our people. (Applause.)

Fort Donelson Captured!—Fort Donelson surrendered to General Grant yesterday (Saturday.)

Generals Pillow, Johnston, and Buckner, were taken,—together with fifteen thousand other prisoners.

General Floyd made his escape during the night, and the rebels in the fort denounce him as a black-hearted traitor and coward.

The enemy were known to have had thirty thousand troops, fifteen thousand of whom are our prisoners, five thousand escaped, and the rest are reported to be killed or otherwise disabled.

The bloodiest and most important battle of the war has been fought and won by the noble troops under command of General Grant. They have achieved a triumph not less difficult, daring and majestic than the capture of the Redan by the Allied troops at Sebastopol.

DESCRIPTION OF THE NEWS.

The news of the capture of Fort Donelson creates an immense patriotic and jubilatative furore. There has not been so much joy manifested since the days of the old Revolution.

DESCRIPTION OF FORT DONELSON.

Fort Donelson is a fortification made of earth, and was constructed about the same time last summer as Fort Henry. Situated at Dover, on the west bank of the Cumberland, where that river washes an obtuse angle, it is twelve miles south-east of the latter fort, and, as the last reports received, was said to mount about ten 24 and 32-pounders. Some seven or eight post roads intersect at this point, and the Memphis and Clarksville Railroad passes but four miles south of it. The position is important as controlling the river as far up as Clarksville, and, in conjunction with Fort Henry and Tennessee bridge, as breaking off from the rebels some twenty miles of railroad communication.

Savannah Captured—The Navy Department has received despatches stating that the Stars and Stripes wave over Savannah.

Evacuation of Springfield—Feeling in Missouri.—The news from Missouri is important. On the morning of the 13th the Third Division of Gen. Curtis' Union army entered Springfield, where they found six hundred of General Price's sick soldiers, and a large amount of forage and wagons belonging to his army. General Curtis having learned that General Price had only evacuated the place a few hours before our troops entered it, immediately despatched a strong cavalry force in pursuit, which encountered the rear guard of Price's army, and after a short engagement dispersed it, taking a large number of prisoners.

Major General Wool, commanding at Fortress Monroe, has issued stringent orders against gambling among the soldiers, and charged all his subordinate officers to do their utmost to enforce the prohibition. This and practice is the bane of the soldiers.

"Occasional." (of the Press,) one of the most sagacious political writers of our country, says:

"The British Parliament is now probably in session. American affairs will undoubtedly [illegible] of its time, and enter into most of its discussions. The friends of America in the two Houses will start with many advantages. They write here full of ardor and hope about the release of Mason and Slidell. But, while expressing the utmost confidence in their ability to contend against the aristocracy, plead most earnestly for continued prudence, patience, and magnanimity on the part of the Administration of Mr. Lincoln and his supporters. It is not meddling with what necessarily these sympathizers of American institutions in great Britain understand the issues at stake in this war. Nor are these men the mere representatives of a class. Among the last I could name many of the most opulent and influential of the British nobility, many prominent commoners, and, of course, all the genuine philanthropists, rise to realize the magnitude of our struggle, after years of reading and reflection upon our system of government. All these statesmen, all these organs of opinion, concur in the warmest tributes to the moderation, courage and ability which have distinguished the management of our relations with [illegible] were since the commencement of the war. Without exception they recommend that every pretext for interference in this war, on the part of England and France, should be removed. They place considerable stress upon the demonstration of the liberation of Christian harbor, and urge with much ability the necessity of immediate and vigorous action, so that our arms may successfully seize and triumphantly hold all the other great cotton ports of the South. Nothing, in truth, does us so much good in Great Britain as constantly renewed exhibitions of the increasing military power and material resources of the loyal States. There is a sentence in one of the letters of one of the most [illegible] of the British aristocracy, which I commend, with due respect, to the consideration of General McClellan: 'Everything done with [illegible] which shows [illegible] every new point occupied, every move in the direction of freedom to the slave, upon the basis of compensation to the loyal owners, tells here powerfully—makes it less possible for our Government to deal treacherously with you, and to inflict any blow upon you.'"

The Rebels Alarmed About the Prevalence of the Union Sentiment in Tennessee.—The uprising of the Union men in Tennessee and other parts of the Southern Confederacy has caused a great deal of consternation among the rebel leaders. Ever since the battle of Bull Run the rebels have tried, through their papers and orators, to disguise the fact that there were persons in their midst who still retained their love for the old Union. But now they are forced to acknowledge the fact that there is a Union sentiment, and that it has become so strong and resolute that they, the rebels, entertain serious fears that it will break out in open insurrection. The recent successes of the Union troops have given those people additional resolution and courage, and they have become accustomed to that they entertain pronunciations of joy whenever they hear of the triumph of the Federal forces over their perverature

The Richmond Dispatch says: "Our Tennessee exchanges give us gloomy prospects for the future in that part of the Confederacy

"Several leading journals intimate plainly that there is really a threatening state of affairs in East Tennessee, growing out of the [illegible] of many of those people for the old Union. The Memphis Avalanche writes that the condition of the interior counties is not improved by the lapse of time.

Probabilities of a Battle on the Potomac.—The Washington correspondent of the World says:

"It may not be improper to narrate the probabilities of early operations on the Potomac. Those who think that General McClellan will content himself with watching the flank movements of the Northern armies are quite mistaken. In the first place, Gen. McClellan has an honorable ambition of his own, and will not willingly forego adding his name to those of history's "great captains" by winning a conclusive battle in the field. Again, his victory must be larger in its details and results than those of his compeers. Finally, the rebellion will only be scotched, not killed, until the Federal 'army of the Potomac' has whipped the rebel 'army of the Potomac'

In a few weeks more, from every indication, just about the time that the roads and skies offer us their alliance, a proper effort will have been produced on the rebel army by the tidings coming to it, and the drafts made upon it from every other portion of the reduced Confederacy. In a few weeks more you may be sure our army of the Potomac will, at last, advance—and I predict that the rebels will make a last desperate stand; then a fearful battle will end in a Union victory, on plains within ten leagues of the battle-ground at Bull Run, and not twenty from the forts of the Potomac.

Capture of Roanoke Island.—The advance from Hatteras took place on Wednesday morning, the expedition consisting of about sixty vessels. The fleet anchored off Stumpy Point that night, and the next day proceeded to the entrance to Croatan Sound. After a reconnoissance, the attack was commenced on Friday morning, the gunboat Underwriter leading the column.

Although the battle was hotly contested, we are glad to see that the loss of life to our troops is considerably less than first reported by the rebels. Our loss amounts to 40 killed, and about 200 wounded. Among the killed on our side were Col. Russell, of the Tenth Connecticut, and Lieut. Col De Monteil, of the De Epineuil Zouaves. Our forces lost the most on account of their having to storm several masked batteries. General Burnside states that his forces captured six forts, forty guns, two thousand prisoners, and over three thousand stand of arms. Enough Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels, and Majors were also captured to insure the release of all our officers of the same ranks now in the hands of the rebels. The navy acted with its accustomed gallantry, and the victory is, to a great extent, indebted to it. All of the rebel gunboats were sunk or burnt, except two, which escaped up the canal. The Seabird, the flagship of Commodore Lynch, was run down and boarded, the Commodore jumping overboard and swimming to the shore. Elizabeth City and Edenton were both taken possession of by Commodore Goldsborough without opposition.

O. Jennings Wise died of his wounds received at Roanoke.

The Richmond Blues, commanded, by O. Jennings Wise, appear to have cut a very prominent figure in the engagement. They were almost annihilated.

The precipitate retreat of the rebel forces caused them to suffer more seriously than if they had stood their ground, and then surrendered without trying to escape.

Foreign Summary.

An encouraging state of things in favor of Evangelical religion is existing at Florence. The American chapel where Rev. E. E. Hall preaches is well attended. In numerous shops of the city, Bibles are sold; and from Sabbath to Sabbath the gospel is faithfully preached in Italian, French, English and German. Truly, this is a change from what has long been in priest-trodden and debased Italy.

With a very noble spirit, a number of citizens of Taunton, England, have thought of the probably crippled state of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions from the want of funds in this unhappy crisis, and with a most Christian liberality they have forwarded to the Board at Boston the munificent sum of twenty thousand dollars, to help carry on its regular missionary operations. This speaks volumes as to the sympathy of Christians in England for us in the great struggle with rebellion and wickedness.

Mr. Vesuvius has been in a fearful state of eruption for some time. Besides the immense quantities of lava that have been thrown down its sides in torrents, there have also been painful signs of an earthquake in the vicinity. Dust has filled the air, and a British vessel of war lying in the harbor at Naples had its decks covered with a coat of hot ashes, and the men on guard forced to take shelter under the poop. Out of a population of twenty-one thousand, fifteen thousand are fugitives. Between fifty and sixty houses have fallen, three hundred and twenty more are falling, and all are more or less injured. Out of eleven churches, only four are still safe.

A singular work of much interest has just been completed by Mr. Gould, the distinguished Ornithologist. It is a "Monograph of the Trochilidæ or Humming Birds," and is the result of (twelve years' labor. When it was commenced, there were only a little over one hundred species of this bird known—but now, under his devoted and arduous investigations, Mr. Gould describes at length in this work four hundred and twenty distinct species, and gives beautiful illustrations of three hundred and sixty species. The work is in five volumes, folio.

The outrageous religious intolerance of Spain has just had its full exhibition. Some time since, Messrs. Matamoras, Albuna & Trigo were arrested under a charge of political offences, and the circulating of the Bible. On the former charge they were tried and acquitted: but word has just reached us that for the latter offence they have been tried and condemned, and sentenced—the two former to seven years each in the galleys, and the latter four years in the same place. Surely, these are high proceedings in this nineteenth century.

An instance of singular success as a recipient of Royal favor is found in the case of Lord Elgin, of England. Twice was he sent as the Representative of Her Majesty's Government to China, and successful in making most valuable and desirable treaties with that peculiar people. Then he became the very secret table and useful Governor General of Canada and now is about to depart under Royal appointment to have charge of the Government of India. He largely enjoys the confidence of his own countrymen, and has had his services contribute much to the good of the world at large.

The population of Ireland has undergone a great decrease within a few years. In 1841 it was 8,175,124; in 1851 it was 6,552,385, and the census for 1861, shows that the whole population then was 5,754,542. The decrease is observable in almost every town.

THE APPLES OF NEW ENGLAND.

[illegible]
Like apples of New England
How hang their [illegible] sunlight
Under the grey stone fences,
In reach of the dappled cow
Or [illegible] the [illegible]
Rich, watery sunlight, and
Of some old man [illegible] age
Where the farmer is king

Yes, king of the [illegible]
Whose grain takes a thousand hues
In the mellow fading sunshine
Yes, king in his cobbled shoes;
King of the sturdy ploughshare
King of the [illegible]
King over the [illegible]
Building in white and green

The Russets of New England
What royalty have they worn
Where the crack of the ashy walnut,
And the [illegible]
Where the herbs hang high in the chimney,
And the cat purrs on the hearth
And the rollicking boys guess riddles,
With many a shout of mirth

O! the Greenings of New England!
Of the old Rhode Island stem—
Brought from the English gardens
To grace the [illegible]
As fair as Britain's daughters,
As hardy as her men
But fairer [illegible] and lasses
Have plucked their fruit since then.

O! the Pearmain of New England!
With its blended milk and rose,
There's a smell of Albion's orchards
Wherever the good tree grows
A stout old English pilgrim
And to cradle its seed he broke
The sacred soil of Hartford,
By the roots of the Charter Oak!

O! the Pippins of New England!
What lover's eagles they saw,
When their ripening cheeks were seen
Through the [illegible]
Tell tales at the apple bee,
What rosy cheeks at the [illegible]
What kisses in hushing time!
That soon lead off to the parson,
Or end in a wedding chime

O! the apples of New England!
They are famous in every land;
And they sleep in silver baskets,
By black in a jewelled hand;
They swell in delicious dreaming,
On a beautiful crimson lip,
And taste of the nectared blisses
No lover has dared to sip

They go to the southern Islands,
They go to the western wild,
And they tell of their glorious birth-place,
To every frolicking child;
Of the home where men are noble,
And the women as good as fair;
O! the apples of New England
They are welcome every where

THE MITTEN THAT WAS NOT KNIT FOR A SOLDIER.

So, Mr. Homeguard, home you go:
You've got your hat and cane.
Excuse me, pray. But really, sir,
You must not call again.
I'm working for our soldiers, that
To freedom's summons hasten.
I once could entertain you, but
I've now no time to waste.

Of course you know I'd be with them
Were I like you a man;
As 'tis, I'll make what sacrifice
A feeble woman can.
I've given up my canary-bird,
My cat and poodle too;
I've given up all my foolish pets,
And I must give up—you.

I know you'll ask, if you can't help,
And come and hold the yarn
For me to wind? But, no, you can't.
I've got to knit and darn—
Crochet, make slippers—true, you know
Some girlish things to do.
But you can't come, for grandmother
Will do as well as you.

So, now, good by! Sometimes a walk
For exercise I'll take,
And if we meet, perhaps I'll speak,
For old acquaintance sake.
——He's gone! O me, I quake to think
Had not this war been waged,
By this time, Ugh! that snark and I,
We might have been engaged.

Family Circle.

MADGE'S BANK.

BY COUSIN MARY.

In a pretty cottage on the hill-side lived a little girl named Madge. There were several other small people who had as good a right there as herself, but as I am not going to speak particularly of them, I shall not stop to mention their names here. Perhaps you may find out some of them in the course of my story.

A more charming place for children than that same hill-side cottage, I think you never saw. It was called Dove's Nest, from its being so hidden away among the trees, and in that respect the name was very suitable; though, to my mind, the incessant chattering of young voices to be heard on near approach would sooner suggest that of "Blackbird's Nest."

But let me tell you the way in which visitors came upon the Nest. From the public highway they turned through a great gate into a road running through the middle of an old apple orchard, and if it happened to be in the time of blossom, they always stopped short as soon as they were inside the gate, and cried, "Oh, lovely!" For the apple-trees, large and gnarled and moss-grown, were of the good old kind, planted in the good old times, which had such a stock of life in them that their venerable heads were still crowned, year after year, with a glorious abundance of those delicate rose-tinted, fresh flowers, which seem to belong rightfully to the very prime of youth.

Madge had a grandmother whose hair was silver-gray, and her brow marked deep with wrinkles, but her blue eye was just as bright as at sixteen, and on her withered cheek a pure rose-tint still came and went as she laughed and chatted with the young around her. She, too, was of the good old kind, planted in the good old times. I fear we have not many of the sort, either apple-trees or grandmothers, growing in these days.

And now the road crosses a green meadow, beyond which swells a softly rounded hill, clothed thick with beeches, and from the very midst of these earls a blue wreath of smoke, by which, as did the poet in the vale of Avoca,

"We know that a cottage is nigh."

Along the wooded side of the hill, half-way up the ascent, we go; and right there in the heart of the grove opens a bit of a picture, so sweet in sylvan beauty and seclusion that you can hardly believe it real. Yes, this is the Nest. No other name could describe it. On a little natural plateau, all verdure and bloom, nestles a brown cottage, overran from base to chimney with ivy and bright flowering vines, looking for all the world as if it had grown there as naturally as the trees. On every side but the front, reaching down from the hill above, and reaching up from the slope below, close the friendly beeches, and they are so densely set, and so filled in with the wild undergrowth, as to form rather a bit of tangled forest than a grove. This is the great charm of the place for children. The eye cannot pierce through in any direction; and there, down among the trees, are patches of blackberry and raspberry for the young ones to scramble through, and little dark, leafy nooks where a fairy tale can be conned from beginning to end without the least fear of discovery; and natural arbors where, with a little help from young hands, wild vines have been trained into the branches overhead, and the bushes cleared below for doll's picnics and invitation tea-drinkings. Behind the house the ground falls off in a gentle slope, and there a fine play-space has been trampled smooth by the continual running of busy feet, and there the children have a great swing hung between two trees, wherein grandma herself sometimes takes a cautious ride, and declares it to be as good as a couch-and-four. There, too, is a [illegible] on a tall pole and cuckoos wander round among the bushes and roost on the trees. There are abundance of little wild creatures, too, as tame as the doves and chickens. The squirrels are often seen by twos and threes around the back door, or playing near the children. But the birds! Ah, little city friends, if you could once have spent a night at Dove's Nest in early summer, and been waked at the first streak of dawn by their wild carols! Such a mad burst of sweetness as gushed from those encircling trees! You may go with mammas to concerts in gilded halls, and hear wonderful performances, no doubt; but you never heard strains that could make the heart ring and dance like that. Our Madge, of whom I am going to tell you more presently, had a pretty thought about this feathered choir when she was about four years old. "Mamma, are the birdies angels?" she asked: "I heard them say 'Glory to God,' this morning."

But where are the inmates at Dove's Nest? Here we stand right before the house, and the doors and windows are all open, and yet not a soul to be seen. Hark! don't you hear a laugh of mingled voices from the further side of the grove? Papa and all of them are down there I warrant you, for that is his base tone and he often takes his breakfast by the swing on the warm morning.

But there was a chattering near at hand as we came up the terrace steps. Ah, see! that low bench, close against the house, drops strange fruit: first a little shower of books, and then one, two, three, four light-haired and dark-haired boys and girls, who scamper laughing into the thicket. And see again! from under the porch peeps out a head which might have caught its hues from the warm skies of Spain. It is quickly withdrawn, then re-appears, and now creeps forth a little maiden of six or seven years, holding something enclosed in her small brown hands. Ah, Madge! By the chestnut curls, the sunny brown eyes, the richly growing olive skin, ay, and by the torn frock and the one bare foot and the other ungartered leg, it is no other than my bright, loving, naive, untidy little favorite. What prize can she have found that she holds so carefully? With shy confidence she ventures toward us, opens the brown hands a very little, and lets us peep in upon a small crimson lizard, spotted with drops of gold. Madge has not the least idea that lizards are horrid, disgusting creatures. Neither does she know that the little green and striped snakes which glide round among the bushes in the grove are so, and the only thing she has against them is that they will not stay still long enough to make her acquaintance.

But now I must tell you my little story. Madge was not what would be called a smart, acute child, by any means. She was a dreaming little body, who lived in a world of small fancies of her own, and made many comical mistakes about common things, which, however, seemed to please those who heard them more than wit. Once, when she was a very little girl, her father found her chubby hands full of blossoms of a beautiful tea-rose, on which he had bestowed great care. "My dear," said he, "didn't I tell you not to pick one of these flowers without leave?" "But, papa," said Madge, innocently, "all these had leaves." But you will see more of her simplicity when you hear the story.

One morning, at breakfast, Madge heard her father saying to her older brother, a boy of fourteen:

"Now, Will, why don't you, instead of spending every quarter as fast as you get it, put your money into a bank and let it grow?" And then he told Will that if Adam had so invested a penny, and never taken it out, it would by that time have increased, I can't venture to say how much, but certainly enough to cover the world over.

This conversation sank deep into the mind of our little Madge. Just then money had acquired a new value in her eyes, for her mother's birthday was to come in about a month, and all the children wanted to make her some beautiful present worthy of the day. On this subject Madge was in a despondent state of mind; Ellen and Jane, two and four years older, were handy little girls, though they did live in the woods, and one of them was embroidering in great secrecy a pair of slippers, and the other was making a lovely basket of fir cones, both of which had been taken in hand so seasonably that they were sure to be ready against the day. But poor Madge knew nothing either of fancy work or plain work, and if she had, never a sixpence had she wherewith to buy the needed materials. People often used to give her a penny, but it was always spent or lost or given away before the day was over; and it seemed to her that times had sadly changed since she began to feel the need of money. Nobody remembered to give her a penny in these days. But now, in the very height of her extremity, a brilliant prospect had dawned, and she no longer feared coming empty-handed to her mother's birthday, if she could but secure one penny.

Directly after breakfast, she instituted a search among her small possessions, and to her delight discovered, in the pocket of an old rag doll, the desired penny. Long before it had been bestowed on the young lady, on occasion of her marriage with Mr. Spindleshanks, a gentleman manufactured from a shingle by the jack-knife of brother Will. Madge made no conscience of recalling this munificent dowry, for temporary use, under the promise of soon repaying Mrs. Spindleshanks by a largely increased sum.

And now, with a beating heart she steals down a hill side into a retired nook, and having dug in the bank a hole large enough for the purpose, she deposits therein her penny, and carefully covers it up with the sod and leaves it to grow! Why should it not? Had she not planted peas and beans, as dry and hard as could be, in her own little flower-bed, and seen them grow up into beautiful vines and flowers? The little beech-nuts fall every year on these same banks, and grew into trees, for how many times had she found the cunning little sprout with the nut still hanging to it! And her father—her father, who knew everything and always spoke the truth—had said that if money was put into a bank, it also would grow. You see, my dear, that Madge's education had been sadly neglected. Had she been sent to the infant-school in the village at a proper age she would have known the difference between the mineral and vegetable kingdoms; but being such an ignorant little puss, she had nothing for it but to "live and learn."

From this time Madge's brain was filled with thoughts quite different from those which had heretofore occupied it. Large conjectures as to the probable increase of her treasure and plans how to spend it, held her in a constant waking dream, and she became so forgetful and absent-minded, that her mother grew quite worried about her. Strangest of all, she seemed to have lost all interest about the birthday. If her sisters reproached her with this, she only shook her little head wisely and laughed. Every day she visited her bank, hoping to see the first little sprout of her money-seed. When two weeks had passed, and there was no sign of its appearance, she thought it very strange, and was sorely tempted to look into the matter, as she often had done in the case of her flower seeds. At last she ventured to seek a little light from her father. He was busy reading. "Papa," said she, timidly, "you told Willy that if he put money in a bank it would grow; won't it grow if you take it out and put it back again?" "Better not," he replied, without looking up. "Why, papa?" "Because it only grows while it is in the bank; but what put that into your head, Madgey?" asked he, pausing now and looking into his little girl's face. "Ah, that's a secret, papa!" said Madge, running away with a merry laugh.

A new idea had now taken possession of her. Her money will not grow up into a bush, with pennies for leaves, and gold and silver coins for blossoms. Her turfy bank is a cavern, in which are going on strange and beautiful things. Fairy tales which she had always devoutly believed are coming true in her own experience. Gold sequins are multiplying there under the sod, she makes no doubt. Who could tell but that she should also find pearls and diamonds, and flashing red and blue and yellow stones, such as Aladdin found in the chambers of the Genii? But no matter how many or how rich were her treasures, she resolved to pour them all into her dear mother's lap on the coming birthday.

At length the eventful morning has arrived. The children were astir with the birds; for though their presents had been all neatly folded in tissue paper, tied with bright ribbons, the night before, yet fresh flowers were to be gathered for the breakfast-table, and a wreath to be woven for the dear mother's hair. Of all the little troop, Madge alone was absent, and when the cheerful household gathered round the table still she was not there. Mamma cast her smiling eyes round on her blooming flock, then asked: "But where's my little Madge?" "Oh, I never missed the little gipsy," cried Jane, laughing. "I dare say she's sound asleep." But no; she was not in bed; she was not in the house; she could not be found at the swing; nor could any one remember having seen the child that morning. "She'll be in directly," said papa; "she has only wandered off a little after wild flowers, and forgotten times and seasons, as usual." But papa himself was not quite as easy as he seemed; and after a minute or two, he said he would just take one look more—perhaps she had fallen asleep somewhere? This was the signal for all to scatter in various directions over the hill,—while Bridget thoughtfully transferred the breakfast to the kitchen fire.

Papa was the first to come upon the clue. As he stood quite still by the swing, peering into the thicket, his ear caught the sound of a child weeping. Cautiously stealing through the bushes, he soon came upon his little wanderer, sitting at the foot of a beech, her face buried in her apron, evidently in the extremity of grief.

"Why, my little darling," said he, "what is the matter?"

At the sound of his voice, Madge's woe seemed to redouble; and it was not till he had set down, taken her in his arms, and soothed her for some time, that she could be persuaded to give any explanation of her trouble. At length she raised her head, and stammered out, through tears and sobs, "Papa, you said money would grow if it was put into a bank, and I put a penny in there," pointing to the freshly disturbed earth beside her, "ever so long ago, for mamma's birthday, and—and—it never grew one bit!" The spot bore evidence of her frantic efforts to dig into the bowels of the earth with a small fire-shovel which lay near.

"I said so, Madge?"

"Yes; you told Willy so, and me, too. I heard you say it."

"Ah, yes, now I remember!" said papa, reflectively, with a queer smile on his face. "I did tell you so, Madgey, and I told you the truth."

"It didn't grow one bit," repeated Madge.

"But, my dear, money will grow in a bank, but not in such a bank as this. Plants will grow here, but not money. And I'll tell you another thing, Madgey. Little girls who don't know arithmetic, can't understand about money-banks."

Madge blushed and hung her head, for the remark came near home. A moment after, she looked up very sadly, saying with a quivering lip:

"But what shall I give mamma?"

Then papa took out his pocket-book, and having searched it through, presently produced a bran new little gold dollar, fresh from the mint. He put it into his little daughter's hand, and told her that, by-and-by, they would go to the village, and buy with it some beautiful gift, which would please mamma just as well as a basketful of gold. Then he led her to a little clear spring close by, and washed her tear-stained face, and smoothed out her curls with his pocket-comb; and then he set her on his shoulder, and danced up the hill with her, cutting so many antics on his way, and saying such funny things, that when they reached the house Madge was in a gale of laughter. Biddy caught the table-bell, and rang such a merry tinkle from it all around the cottage, that the scattered flock soon gathered again, and you may be sure there was a pretty din of questions as to the why and the how of Miss Madge's adventure. But papa only touched his forefinger wisely to his nose, shook his head mysteriously and said nothing.

Then the coffee and toast, and broiled chicken were brought back, and it seemed as if every one had been out to buy a fresh appetite and a new stock of fun. Papa was certainly never so droll before; and as Madge sat next him, he whispered such funny nonsense in her ear, which nobody else was to hear, that she quite forgot her ill luck in raising money. And, after a while, the two walked together down to the village book-store, and the little gold dollar was spent on a small New Testament, with gilt edges, and purple morocco covers, and a bright crimson satin mark, hanging out between the leaves. Mamma was as much astonished and pleased at the beautiful gift from her little girl as could be desired, and when she said that she would rather have had it than anything else in the world, Madge was thoroughly comforted. And so the day was a happy day after all.

When Madge was kissing her father "good night," she put her arms round his neck and whispered:

"Please, papa, don't tell"

"Only mamma," he whispered back

The next day, almost without her knowing it, he contrived to draw out her little story more fully; and he and mamma agreed that the dreaming little brain must be well ballasted with facts, or it would be in danger of shipwreck. So a gentle course of spelling, and arithmetic, and geography was commenced immediately, and was taken to so kindly that in a year or two Madge became a very studious and industrious little girl. Meanwhile, nobody but papa and mamma knew of her experiment in banking money; nor did even they know, till she had grown up a tall young lady, what wild visions had been conjured up by a chance word in her childish brain, or how keen had been the pain of waking.

A LESSON IN OBEDIENCE.

"Jack! Jack! here, sir! his on!" cried Charlie, flinging his stick far into the pond. Jack didn't want to go; it wasn't pleasant swimming in among the great lily leaves that would flap against his nose and eyes, and get in the way of his feet. So he looked at the stick and then at his master, and sat down, wagging his tail, as much as to say, "You're a very nice little boy; but the water is too cold for exercise now; throw the stick into the water, and I don't think I'll oblige you by going after it."

But Charlie was determined. He found another switch, and, by scolding and whipping, forced Jack into the water, and made him fetch the stick. He dropped it on the bank, however, instead of bringing it to his master; so he had to go over the performance again and again, until he had learned that when Charlie told him to go for the stick he was to obey at once. Charlie was satisfied at length, and, with Jack at his heels, went home to tell his mother about the afternoon's work. He seemed quite proud of it. "It was pretty hard work, mother," he said. "Jack wouldn't mind at all until I made him; but now he knows that he has to do it, and there will be no more trouble with him, you'll see."

"What right have you to expect him to mind you?" asked his mother, quietly

"Right, mother? Why, he is my dog! Uncle John gave him to me, and I do everything for him. Didn't I make his kennel my own self, and put clean hay in it? And don't I feed him three times every day? And I'm always kind to him. I call him 'nice old Jack,' and pat him, and let him lay his head on my knee. Indeed, I think I've the best right in the world to have him mind me."

His mother was cutting out a jacket. She did not look up when Charlie had finished; but going on steadily with her work, she said slowly, "I have a little boy. He is my own. He was given to me by my Heavenly Father. I do everything for him. I make his clothes, and prepare the food he eats. I teach him his lessons, and nurse him tenderly when he is sick. Many a night have I sat up to watch by his side when fever was burning him, and daily I pray to God for every blessing upon him. I love him. I call him my dear little son. He sits on my lap, and goes to sleep with his head on my arm. I think I have the 'best right in the world' to expect this little boy to obey me; and yet he does not, unless I make him, as I would make a dog."

"Oh, mother!" cried Charlie, tears starting to his eyes. "I knew it was wrong to disobey you; but I never thought before how much it was. Indeed I do love you, and I'll try—I really will try—to mind you as well as Jack minds me."

"Dear Charlie," said his mother, "there is a great difference between you and Jack. You have a soul. You know what is right, because you have been taught from the Word of God, and you know, too, that the devil and your wicked heart will always be persuading you to do wrong. That is a trouble which Jack cannot have; but neither has he the comfort you have; for you can pray to our dear Saviour for help, and he will teach you to turn away from Satan, and to love and obey him alone. When you learn to do this, you will not find it difficult to be obedient to me; for it will be just the same as obeying God, who has said: 'Honor thy father and thy mother;' and where we truly love, it is easy to obey."—*S. BAUGH'S
MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNT BONES
BY BAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20 S. Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.
CASH PRICE $45 PER 2000 POUNDS (2½ CTS. PER POUND.)
In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtues of the bone is retained, a Fertilizer is procured, furnishing in a concentrated and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil, viz: phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE, are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity. They combine at once with the soil, furnish all the needful nutriment for the growing crop, giving it ample nourishment, and into the land permanently benefited, so that its presence can be traced for years afterwards.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860.
Messrs Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on a hard and sour farm for several seasons, and am well satisfied of its value as an active and "paying" fertilizer.
I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 200 pounds per acre, alongside of a heavy coat of barn-yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier, while the grass was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and grass, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory. In corn, my experience is its use has been the best. It pays well for the money laid out.
Yours respectfully, ISAAC LEWIS.

Newtown Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860.
Messrs Baugh & Sons — Being anxious last season to feed some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of three different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side, in the same field. I purchased Peruvian Guano and your Super Phosphate of Lime (one of the most popular in use) together with your New Bone Super Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the last received my ☞ in favor of the latter.
But whether it is from the mode and care in preparing, or in the superior quality of the materials used in your Raw Bone Super-Phosphate, I am unable to say, however, I shall fully await you the result of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c., JAMES DUNWOODY

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 10th, 1860.
Baugh & Sons—Gentlemen—Having used your Super Phosphate, bought of John W. Christman, at the Montgomery Agricultural Fair, on wheat and corn, I can with pleasure recommend it. The effect it produced was so manifest that it greatly to exceed my reliance in the value of your fertilizer. Were it was applied on the wheat, the crop was decided by the best in the field, while the corn was in equal to the balance, which had been coated. I have used many manures, but it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double.
Very respectfully, DAVID MARKLE.

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS IN
SEWING MACHINES.
EMPIRE
SHUTTLE MACHINE.
PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.
Salesroom—510 Broadway, New York.
This MACHINE is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism possessing many rare and valuable improvements which have been examined by the most scientific experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION combined.
The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:
1—Complex fatigue to the operator,
2—Liability to get out of order,
3—Expense, both in the cost and time in repairing,
4—Incapacity to use every description of material,
5—Disagreeable noise while in operation.
THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.
It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither rip nor ravel, and is alike on both sides; will sew from a spool of any size, and is unequalled in fine or coarse work, on any description of material, from the coarsest to the finest number. Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and
EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.
It requires fifty per cent. less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of 12 years of age can work it steadily without fatigue or injury to health.
In strength and durability of Construction, we render it almost impossible to get out of order, and is guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction.
We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this
UNRIVALLED MACHINE.
Put in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of
MERCHANT TAILORS, COACH MAKERS, HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS, SHIRT & BOSOM MAKERS, DRESS MAKERS, CORSET MAKERS, GAITER FITTERS, SHOE-BINDERS, VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS.

510 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

SEWING & GIBBS
WILCOX & MACHINES.
Price with Hemmer and Feller,
$35 00.
THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.
Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread.
It forms a flat, even, and elastic seam, which is wear-proof and to rip is easy, as it is the same in the seam to cut or break one thread only, and also under all circumstances—as it never can be worn out.
A Patented device of great utility in fastening prevents the possibility of the machine being run in the wrong direction, or the loss of one thread causing a lady's delay.
Another feature which deserves particular attention is the Tucker Guide, Patent Adjusting Screw, &c.
Ten thousand stitches per minute of even, unbroken thread, can be done in one minute without dropping a stitch.
These Machines are simple and accurate in their complex action, perfect in the use of the shuttle, and with new thread per it is the practical results of the two thread machines; and more so than by two-thread ones. Also, the Machine makes no noise, and is perfectly noiseless in motion.
Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the sewing in a given time.
It is emphatically the good, low priced Family Sewing Machine that the public have been waiting for.—Boston Transcript.
"It is indeed a wonderful production and for family use especially no other will bear any comparison with it."—Philadelphia Sunday Mercury.
"A marked advance."—Scientific American.
"Among the best and most satisfactory sewing machines. Light and elegantly finished, and so simple in its construction that it seems almost impossible for it to get out of repair."—Pittsburg Christian.
"Has continued with its own peculiar merits all the really valuable improvements of the higher priced machines."—Pennsylvanian.
"This machine, in the opinion of the committee, fills more nearly the requirements of a perfect family machine than any one exhibited."—Franklin Institute Committee Report.
"Taking into consideration simplicity, compass, durability, and doing all work, the committee have great unanimity in favor of the Wilcox & Gibbs as a single thread machine."—Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society's Report.
"We must, in justice, express our confidence in the merits of the Wilcox & Gibbs sewing Machine. We consider that a pr. of double seams has been supplied to P., in sewing beyond doubt that two threads are not as well adapted necessary to a good instrument."—Boston Advocate and Journal June 27, 1860.
"We have one of these machines in use and think more highly of it than of any of the number we have tried."—Richmond Whig.
The undersigned Manufacturers, having been engaged for more than twelve different kinds of sewing machines, and after each machine had been thoroughly tested in practical use, have planned one of their own, as the best adapted to the wants of his family, and as the least liable to require repair. OLIVER CHASE.
Boston, June 5, 1860.
The undersigned during eighteen months, has had in almost constant use, in his family, a Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine on a white [illegible]
to [illegible]—including the stitching required by his several boys, and he has done the same [illegible] and [illegible] The machine now in use in his family has required no repair, and is, in all respects, well adapted for [illegible] and durable.

JESUS WEEPING OVER JERUSALEM.

A POEM BY JOEL SWARTZ.

"And when he was come near, he beheld the City, and wept over it." Luke 19: 41.

When, Saviour, on Mount Olives' brow,
Adoring thousands lowly bow,
And hail thee Zion's King;
And branches from the palm trees hew,
And garments in thy pathway strew,
And loud Hosannas sing:

And when the rocks and hills around,
Catch up, and thunder back the sound,
As if to join the song;
And Kedron's answering vales below
Fling back the echoes as they flow
The distant hills along:

How strange, 'mid this triumphal throng,
Who pour thy praise the hills along,
And shouting rend the skies:
How strange, that 'mid these joyful tones,
Thy heart should heave with heavy groans,
And tears bedim thine eyes.

A gorgeous scene before thee lay,
Of mountains stretching far away,
Of vales, and fields, and wood;
But brightest 'mid this varied scene,
Of vine-clad hills and olives green,
The sacred city stood.

On Mount Moriah's peak below,
The temple like a hill of snow,
Sublimely rose to view;
Its roof of gold, its turrets bright,
Its flashing gems, its pillars white,
The sunlight backward threw.

O'er these bright scenes, to human eyes,
No threat'ning clouds impending rise,
No muttering thunders scene;
No arms flash on the sleeping hills,
No shout of war with terror fills
The peasant's peaceful home.

But o'er the smiling landscape round,
Rich harvests, fruits, and vines abound,
And rows of rustling corn;
O'er many a hill with olives green,
Through clustering trees, the snow-white sheen
Of cottage home appears.

The shepherd, 'mid his grazing herds,
And tinkling folds and singing birds,
His drowsy vigil keeps:
The plough-boy on the furrowed hills,
With rustic airs the woodland fills,
Whilst hope the harvest reaps.

'Twas not because the varied hue
Of smiling landscapes spread to view
No beauty had for thee;
Thine eye could in the lily trace,
A sweeter charm, a fairer grace,
Than kingly splendors be.

'Twas not because the peasant's home,
And flocks that o'er the meadows roam,
And trellis-creeping vine,
Could not a single thought suggest,
To calm thy heavy heaving breast,
And soothe thy soul divine.

But, O my Saviour, to thine eye,
Far back behind the smiling sky,
A thunder cloud was seen;
On thy Omniscient vision rose,
Black clouds surcharged with coming woes,
Which shaded all between.

O'er all that fair and lovely scene,
Thine eye beheld the serried sheen
Of flashing armor bright;
The prancing steed, the measured tread
Of coming legions shake with dread
Judea's hills in fright.

Around the city's walls below,
Thou saw'st the strong armed Romans throw
Embankments strong and high;
Whilst o'er the hideous ramparts stream
The eagled banner spreading gleams
Against the reddened sky.

Whilst through the millions pent'd within,
With haggard eyes and visage grim,
The demon Famine walked;
And rampant Faction, streaming red
With gory hands, and flaming tread,
'Mid murdering kindred stalked.

Did not thy human bosom sigh
To see the starving mother's eye
Glare fiercely on her child?
Did not thy tender spirit weep,
To see thy kindred, heap on heap,
Fall in the carnage wild?

Thou saw'st the high and mighty wall
Beneath the battering engine fall
In thunder to the ground;
And then like floods, the ruins o'er,
The maddened legions furious pour,
To spread destruction round.

The tow'ring temple's flashing dome,
A hill of roaring flames become,
And crashing thunders through;
And every fair and goodly stone,
'Mid blackened ruins tumbled down,
Lay open to thy view.

Thou saw'st the rumbling wheels of Mars
Rush onward like revengful stars,
The falling ruins o'er;
The Torch, the Sword, his flaming steeds,
Fly forward where destruction leads,
And plash through streams of gore.

No barriers check the furious ire
Of pagan rage, and whirling fire,
As on they rushing go,
Till final ruin fiercely sweeps
Her ploughshare o'er the silent heaps,
And shuts the scene of woe.

Thou saw'st the Captive bound in chains,
And driven from his smoking plains,
To marts beyond the sea;
Where, like a beast, for sordid gold,
Thy kindred in the flesh were sold,
And doomed to slavery;

And through long ages wandering roam
Without a priest, without a home,
Abused, oppressed, uncured;
Till every breeze from every sky,
Should waft a groan, or heave a sigh,
From captive Jews dispersed.

These scenes, these dreadful scenes, of woe,
O'ershadowed all that lay below—
Thy heart they shaded too;
And while Hosannas rung afar,
Thou heard'st the horrid shout of war
The mountains breaking through.

Thy hallowed feet this moment stood
Not far from where great drops of blood
Poured o'er thy anguished face,
And Calvary with its horrors too,
Lay fully spread before thy view—
The scene of thy disgrace.

But not the garden with its woes,
Nor Calvary with its bloody cross,
Drew forth thy heavy sigh,
Nor yet the knowledge that the crowd,
Who hailed thee with Hosannas loud,
Would clamour "crucify."

No, not for thee, but for thy kin,
All crimsoned with unpardoned sin—
Sin of the deepest dye;
For them, all stained with guiltless blood,
Abhorred of man, accursed of God,
Thy heavy heart did sigh.

For these abandoned, blinded Jews,
Who would the Son of God refuse,
Thy tears did gushing flow;
Thy blood filled up their cup of guilt,
In which thy prophets' blood was spilt,
From Abel until now.

Beneath thy kind protecting wing,
Thou would'st have gathered, mighty King,
Thy children to thy side;
But they thy faithful prophets stoned,
Thy people and thy word disowned,
And last, thee crucified.

O, had they known their day of grace,
Accepted Heaven's proffered peace,
And their Messiah owned!
But now, forever from their eyes,
Is hid the grace their hearts despise,
And they to wrath are doomed.

REFLECTIONS.

From these dread judgments, I desire,
To see engraved with pens of fire,
The fearful guilt of sin;
Help me, O Lord, to "kiss the Son,"
Whilst yet his favor may be won,
And ere his wrath begin.

I learn from all these scenes of woe,
Which Judah's pride have laid so low,
That o'er a Saviour's tears,
Cannot the sword of vengeance stay,
Or turn the cup of doom away,
When God in wrath appears.

That they who Jesus Christ refuse,
As did the unbelieving Jews,
Must in their errors die;
And, as with them, there is a line,
Which passed, no more the voice divine,
Can woo them to the sky.

From thee, O Saviour, may I learn,
With tears o'er guilty souls to yearn,
And pity those that sleep;
And, with thee, mid'st the world's applause
Feel only for the sinner's cause,
And for the sinner weep.

COUNT DE GASPARIN.

We presume we will be performing a task gratifying to many of our readers if we give some account of Count de Gasparin, the author of the celebrated work, the "Uprising of a Great People." He is one of those enlightened foreigners whom American Christians should delight to honor. His pen may do for us almost as much as the sword of Lafayette in a former struggle. We are not of those who would require the people of this country to move only at the nod of Europeans. We must learn a little independence and act like men. Yet it would be the sheerest affectation to say that we, are or should be, entirely indifferent to public opinion abroad. And when we see a public man of high Christian character who has long and patiently studied our history and who shows himself to be very familiar with the gist of our controversies, come forward and pronounce in our favor, we feel under obligations to him. Count de Gasparin, so far as we can see, has no interest in our present national struggles other than what every lover of mankind has. He feels that the principles at stake are important to all nations "Never," says he, "was a more obstinate and more colossal strife commenced on earth." His book, if widely circulated in England and France, would perhaps do more for us, than fifty thousand soldiers on the Potomac or the Tennessee.

Count de Gasparin, a French publicist, born in Orange, July 4th, 1810, is of Corsican origin and a Protestant family. Receiving a liberal education he devoted himself to literature till 1842, when he was elected by the people of the island of Corsica to represent them in the Chamber of Deputies. At this time religious liberty was in danger of perishing in France. De Gasparin at once became distinguished as its champion, advocating unlimited freedom for evangelical preaching and colportage. He has ever since been known as the consistent advocate of religious liberty for Protestants and Romanists alike. He was so warmly opposed to the Protestant intolerance in Sweden as Catholic in France. He also zealously labored for the immediate emancipation of the slaves in the French colonies, and published some important essays on the subject. In France he devoted himself to the cause of Protestantism, and founded the Society for the Protection of Protestant interests and the Free Protestant Church. Under the ministry of his father he held an important position, and was in the ministry of Public Instruction under M Guizot. On the downfall of Louis Philippe he retired to Switzerland, where he has since resided In government, he is a constitutional monarchist. He prefers the form of government in England to that of the United States; yet he has no sympathy with those who can see nothing great or praiseworthy in America. Judging from his work, he is clear-headed, moderate, able to make allowances for the peculiar surroundings of individuals or parties, an ardent lover of Protestantism and constitutional freedom. He is consequently very anxious that England and France should not be betrayed into the inconsistency and wickedness of supporting a great slave confederacy. He aims "to sap at the base those deplorable sophisms, more fully credited than is imagined, which may, in due time, under the pressure of certain industrial needs or of certain political combinations, urge France and England into a course which is not their own." "We alone," says he, "I am ashamed to admit it, we alone run the risk of rendering doubtful the final triumph of a good cause: we have not ceased to be, in spite of ourselves, the only chance and the only hope of the champions of slavery."

We quote a few passages from the book on the American crisis, reminding the reader that the following paragraphs were written in March, 1861.

"But lately, indeed, the United States were advancing to their ruin; but lately there was reason to mourn in thinking of them; the steps might have been counted which it remained for them to complete the union of their destiny with that of an accursed and perishable institution—an institution which corrupts and destroys every thing with which it comes in contact. To-day, new prospects are opening to them; they will have to combat, to labor, to suffer; the crime of a century is not repaired in a day; the right path when long forsaken is not found again without effort; guilty treatises and old complicities are not broken through without sacrifices. It is none the less true, notwithstanding, that the hour of effort and of sacrifice, grievous as it may be, is the very hour of deliverance. The election of Mr. Lincoln will be one of the great dates of American history; it closes the past, but it opens the future. With it is about to commence, if the same spirit be maintained, and if excessive concessions do not succeed in undoing all that has been done, a new era, at once purer and greater than that which has just ended.

"Let others accuse me of optimism; I willingly agree to it. I believe that optimism is often right here below. We need hope; we need sometimes to receive good news; we need to see sometimes the bright side of things. The bright side is often the true side; if Love is blindfolded, I see a triple bandage on the eyes of Hate. Kindliness has its privileges; and I do not think myself in a worse position than another to judge the United States because they inspire me with an earnest sympathy; because, after having mourned their faults and troubled at their perils, I have joyfully saluted the noble and manly policy of which the election of Mr. Lincoln is the symptom. Is it not true, that at the first news we all seemed to breathe a whiff of pure and free air from the other side of the ocean?

"It is a pleasure, in times like ours, to feel that certain principles still live; that they will be obeyed, cost what it may; that questions of conscience can yet sometimes weigh down questions of profit. The abolition of slavery will be, I have always thought, the principal conquest of the nineteenth century. This will be its recommendation in the eyes of posterity, and the chief compensation for many of its weaknesses. As for us old soldiers of emancipation, who have not ceased to combat for it for twenty years and more, at the tribunal and elsewhere, we shall be excused without doubt for seeing in the triumph of our American friends something else than a subject of lamentation."

"An institution which permits evil, creates it in a great measure: in saying that men are things, it necessarily engenders more crimes, more acts of violence, more cowardly deeds, than the imagination of romancers will ever invent."

"It must be affirmed, besides, that slavery is peculiarly odious on that soil where the equality of mankind has been inscribed with so much éclat at the head of a celebrated constitution. Liberty imposes obligations; there is at the bottom of the human conscience something which will always cause slavery to be more scandalous at Washington than at Havana. What happens in the United States will be denounced more violently, more loudly, than what happens in Brazil; and this is right."

"All this under the tyrannical and pitiless influence of a minority constantly transformed into a majority! Picture to yourself a man on a vessel standing by the gun-room with a lighted match in his hand; he is alone, but the rest obey him, for at the first disobedience he will blow up himself with all the crew. This is precisely what has been going on in America since she went adrift. The working of the ship was commanded by the man who held the match. "At the first disobedience, we will quit you." Such has always been the language of the Southern States. They were known to be capable of keeping their word; therefore, there ceased to be but one argument in America: secession. "Revoke the compromise, or else secession; modify the legislation of the free States, or else secession; risk adventures, and undertake conquests with us for slavery, or else secession; lastly and above all, never suffer yourselves to elect a president who is not our candidate, or else secession."

"Thus spoke the South, and the North submitted. Let us not be unduly surprised at it, there was patriotism in this weakness; many citizens, inimical to slavery, forbore to combat its progress, in order to avoid what appeared to them a greater evil. Doctrines like these are descended quickly, and the deplorable presidency of Mr. Buchanan stands to testify to this."

The Count is not alarmed at a little agitation He says: "If you wish to be just to the United States, compare them with other countries in which slavery exists. In the United States there is a struggle; the question is a living one; men do not turn aside from it with lax indifference. I love the noise of free nations; I find in the very violence of their debates a proof of the earnestness of convictions. Men must become excited about great social problems; if abuses exist, they must, at least, be pointed out, attacked and stigmatized; the prescription of silence must never be accorded them; devoted voices must exclaim against them, unceasingly, in the name of justice and of humanity. Such a spectacle does good to the soul; it soleces the sorrows of the present, it carries within itself guarantees for the future.

"The sad, profoundly sad, spectacle, is that of nations where crimes make no noise. Look at Brazil. Like the United States, it has slavery, but it is an honorable, discreet slavery, of which nothing is said. Whatever may happen there, no one inquires about it; there are no discussions, either through the press or in the courts. No party would dare insert such a question into its platform. One thing, very properly, has been found to disturb it, and the public sale of slaves has just been forbidden.

"Look, above all, at Spain and its island of Cuba. There, too, is perfect silence. Nothing, in truth, opposes the belief that Cuba is the abode of felicity, and that the atrocities of slavery are the monopoly of the United States. But inquisitive people, who like to search to the bottom of things, discover that if the masters are very gentle at Havana, the overseers are scarcely so on their sequant on the plantations; I have already given the proof of it. Out of ten slavers that are seized on the high seas, nine are always destined to Cuba Spain has forbidden the slave trade; she has even been compensated for it by the English; but this does not prevent her from suffering it to be carried on before her eyes with almost absolute impunity. Her high sounding phrases change nothing; the smallest fact is of more value. At Cuba, the landing of slaves is continual, and the places of disembarkation are known. Now, the American flag protects no one at the time of embarking. Why is no opposition made to this? Why has the importation of negroes tripled in Cuba? Why does no slaver, American or any other, steer towards Brazil, since Brazil has desired to put an end to the slave trade? The answer to these questions will be given us on the day when Spain shall desire, in turn, to suppress it. In the mean time she prefers to keep silence, unless when a word from London strikes out a concert of protestations more patriotic than convincing; save in this case, the government is silent, public opinion is silent, no colonial sheet is found ready to hazard an objection, nor even a metropolitan journal that is willing to disturb so touching an equanimity. The court of Madrid, in which many questions are agitated, prudently stands aloof in the matter of slavery and the slave trade; among the numerous parties disputing for power, not one dares venture on a ground where it would meet nothing but unpopularity. Ah! after this death-like silence, how the soul is refreshed by the fiery contests of the United States, the great word-combats carried on in every village of the Union, the appeals addressed to the conscience, the battle in broad daylight! How refreshing to see by the side of these nations, who sleep so tranquilly, while regarding the inroads of slavery, a people whom it disquiets, whom it irritates, who refuse to take part in it and who, rather than conform to the evil, agitate, become divided, and rend themselves perchance with their own hands!"

"EXCESS OF MINISTERS."—The question is sometimes asked, What need is there for educating other ministers when so many are unemployed? The question is considered in the following extract from the Methodist Protestant. After remarking that if there are ministers without congregations, there are also congregations without ministers, the writer proceeds —

With some men the ministry is a "profession"—a trade to get a living; with others it is a "high calling of God in Christ Jesus." In the former class there may be conscientious men, but their consciences are satisfied if they meet what may be styled the reasonable expectations of their parishioners, in accordance with the terms of settlement. They feel the weight of no "woe is me, if I preach not the gospel." They feel it their duty to preach when the way is open —that is to say when they receive a call to preside over a congregation of respectable people, in a pleasant location, said call being strengthened by the assurance of a satisfactory stipend. But they have no convictions of duty which compel them to endure the privations which many a self-denying minister submits to, year after year, for the Master's sake. The latter class is never in excess. They are in demand at this day, and will be to the end. They are not sensation preachers. They are not political wranglers. They are not loungers, beaux, mopes, whiners, schemers, sycophants, bores or buffoons. They are men—living men—men of heart and brain—men with sound stomachs and some muscle—men that work and wait—men that love God and their fellow-men, and have learned the meaning of those words, "The disciple is not above his Master." Men of this description, we are inclined to think, do not crowd upon each other to the number of forty or fifty when a vacant church is to be supplied. Some of them may be in circumstances that make a pleasant charge desirable, and the desire lawful. Some of them may be temporarily without charges—some, nay, all of them, may be poorly requited on earth for their services; but there is not the slightest danger that the ministerial ranks will be "over-crowded" with them to the extent that many will be under the necessity of seeking employment in other vocations. Young men, if you are willing to "endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ," come on—there is room for you. It is most likely that you will find immediately the place that you think will suit you; but if you are diligent you will find ultimately the place for which you are suited. And is it not better that you should be "the right man in the right place," than that you should expose your incompetency in places for which you have no adaptation?

How does it happen that often ministers of the gospel do not derive as much spiritual nourishment from reading and meditating on the Scriptures as many of their people? I have lately seen this question considered at length; but the pith of the answer may be given in a single sentence. The minister casts his eye on a consoling promise, and begins to feed upon it; but immediately the thought strikes him that it would be an excellent text to preach on, so at it he goes to frame a sermon, to supply the spiritual wants of his people rather than his own. Often, often, this is true, every word of it.

THE LESSONS OF MEN'S LIVES.

George Brummell entered the fashionable world at the age of twenty-one, with a princely fortune at command. He gave himself wholly and entirely to the cultivation of the highest tastes of fashionable life. He spent £500 a year on dress alone; and so refined was he in his manners and grace, that he came to be admitted to the highest circles of the nobility, and the "Prince Regent," says his biographer, "would occasionally attend his dressing-room for an hour in the morning, to watch the mysterious grace with which he discharged the duties of his toilet." Years passed away, and this man's fortune was spent. His friends then deserted him—he fled to the Continent—begged for his bread in the streets of Paris, and died in a lunatic asylum. He had sown the wind—he reaped the whirlwind; and with him the fashions of life were found to be "vanity of vanities and vexation of spirit."

The great Duke of Marlborough accumulated a million of money, and died in wretchedness of mind, while his property went to enrich a family who were looked upon by him in his lifetime as his greatest enemies. A Scottish nobleman took a friend to the summit of a hill on his property, and told him that all he could look on was his own. "Surely your lordship must be a happy man," said this friend; to whom he replied, "I do not believe that there is in all this vast circuit a more unhappy man than myself." The wealthy Colonel Charteris, when dying, said he would give £30,000 to any one who could prove to his satisfaction that there was no such place as hell. Elwes, the miser, when dying, was found weeping with anxiety and grief because he had mislaid a five pound note.

But of all men who have sought for enjoyment in riches, perhaps the case of the late William Beckford, of Fonthill Abbey, in England, is the most remarkable. Inheriting a large fortune, he at first resided in Portugal, where he lived in a monastery, "the ceiling of which was gilded and painted: the floor spread with Persian carpets of the finest texture; the tables decked with superb ewers and basins of chased silver." "A stream of water flowed through his kitchen, from which were formed reservoirs containing every kind of river fish. On one side were heaped up loads of game and venison; on the other side were vegetables and fruit in endless variety. Beyond a long line of stores extended a row of ovens, and close to them, hillocks of the finest wheaten flour, rocks of sugar, jars of the purest oil, and pastry in various abundance." The magnificent saloon in which he dined was covered with pictures, and lighted up with a profusion of wax tapers in services of silver, and the banquet usually consisted of rarities and delicacies of every season from distant countries. When in England, he pulled down a splendid mansion, erected by his father at a cost of nearly a quarter of a million of money, to build an Abbey, whose towers, like the tower of Babel, might reach to heaven. A wall nearly twenty miles in circumference enclosed his mansion and grounds, and so costly were the furnishings of the place that its glories transcended those of oriental splendor. One who saw the Abbey and ground says; "Gold and silver vases and cups are so numerous here that they dazzle the eye, and when one looks around at the cabinets, candelabra, and ornaments which decorate the rooms, we may almost imagine that we stand in the treasury of some oriental prince, whose riches consist entirely in vessels of gold and silver, enriched with precious stones of every sort, from the ruby to the diamond." Such was Beckford of Fonthill Abbey, with his princely mansion and an income of £100,000 a year. But was he happy? No, he was wretched, and a reverse of fortune having unexpectedly come upon him, he was driven from his mansion, spent the last of his days in misery, and died, another painful example of the folly of setting the heart on earthly enjoyments, and proving again the truth of the wise man's words, "Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; all is vanity and vexation of spirit."

William Pitt, son of the great Earl of Chatham, was endowed with the rarest gifts of nature, and, at the early age of twenty-four, was prime minister of England. "The mightiest intellects," says one who knew him well, "bent before him, and the highest offices were in his patronage. Each morning when he rose he was entitled to assert that, in all the vast empire of England, the sun shone on none who was in reality, however he might be in name, more powerful than himself. And yet this great man, during his public career, was always wretched, miserable, unhappy." "He died," says a biographer, "in his forty seventh year, on the anniversary of the very day on which he had entered Parliament. Oh, what a difference there was between the buoyant youth of twenty and the care-worn statesman of forty-seven! Before the eyes of the one sparkled a long vista of political enjoyments and honors; before the eyes of the other were the anxieties and cares which had attended them when grasped. He had followed as his object in life unsanctified ambition, and he found it vanity and vexation of spirit," "and died," says Wilberforce, "of a broken heart."

Robert Clive was a mercantile clerk in India. He had a passion for the life of a soldier, and obtained an ensigncy in the army of the East. Here he rose until he became the conqueror of India, and had the treasures of the East poured at his feet. "The whole kingdom," wrote his father to him, "is in transports at the glory and success you have gained: come away, and let us rejoice together." He returned, was impeached by the House of Commons, and was so chagrined and disappointed that he took his own life

Among those who have sought for happiness in the honors and excitements of public life Richard Brinsley Sheridan, the orator, is a melancholy instance of the folly of such a course. In the House of Commons, so powerful was the impression produced by his speeches, that members could not trust themselves to vote on any question on which he spoke, until the excitement had subsided Yet this man died in wretchedness and want. His last words were, "I am absolutely undone."

Turn we now to the field of literature. There we have in the foremost rank Sir Walter Scott "Never, perhaps, in any period of the world's history," says a contemporary of Scott, "did literary talent receive a homage so universal as that of Scott. His reputation was coextensive not only with the English language, but with the boundaries of civilization. In one year, too, his literary productions yielded him £15,000. The king conferred on him a baronetcy, and wherever he appeared, at home or abroad, he was the lion of the day. All the good things of life were his. His mansion at Abbotsford realised the highest conceptions of a poet's imagination, and 'seemed like a poem in stone.' His company was of the most honorable of the land, and his domestic enjoyments all that his heart could desire. Yet he was not happy. Ambitious to found a family, he got into debt, and in old age he was a ruined man. When about to leave Abbotsford for the last time, he said: 'When I think on what this place now is, with what it was not long ago, I feel as if my heart would break. Lonely, aged, deprived of all my family, I am an impoverished and embarrassed man.' At another time he writes—'Death has closed the dark avenue of love and friendship. I look at them as through the grated door of a burial place filled with monuments of those who once were dear to me, and with no other wish than that it may open for me at no distant period.' And again: 'Some new object of complaint comes every moment. Sickness come thicker and thicker; friends are fewer and fewer. The recollection of youth, health, and powers of activity, neither improved nor enjoyed, is a poor ground of comfort. The best is, the long halt will arrive at length and close all.' And the long halt did arrive. Not long before he died, Sir Walter requested his daughter to wheel him to his desk. She then put a pen into his hand, but his fingers refused to do their office. Silent tears rolled down his cheeks 'Take me back to my own room,' he said; 'there is no rest for Sir Walter but in his grave.' A few days after this he died realising, in reference to all his fame, honor, and renown, the truth of Solomon, 'Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, all is vanity and vexation of spirit.'"

Campbell, the author of the "Pleasures of Hope," in his old age wrote: "I am alone in the world. My wife and the child of my hopes are dead: my surviving child is consigned to a living tomb (a lunatic asylum;) my old friends, brothers, sisters, are dead, all but one, and she too is dying; my last hopes are blighted As for fame, it is a bubble that must soon burst Earned for others, shared with others, it was sweet; but at my age, to my own solitary experience, it is bitter. Lost in my chamber alone by myself, is it wonderful my philosophy at times takes flight; that I rush into company; resort to that which blunts, but heals no pang; and then sick of the world and dissatisfied with myself, shrink back into solitude?" And in this state of mind he died

Charles the Fifth resigned his crown in despair of getting happiness on the throne. Catherine of Russia, an empress of the most ambitious character, sought for happiness in earthly glory, yet would not get rest in sleep from the torments of a guilty conscience. And many other cases might be adduced to show how true it is, as the poet says—

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown"

These are examples of the vanity of pursuing the mirage of life The objects of pursuit, had they been sanctified and good, would have yielded happiness if rightly realized; for Divine Providence has so constituted man that, even as a mundane being, he may possess much real enjoyment

Be it ours, then, to "set the affections on things above, and not on things below, that perish in the using; "to lay up treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break not through nor steal;" so to run that we may obtain, and so to struggle for the crown, that, like Paul, we may be enabled to say "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing."—Rev. J. H. Wilson.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF PREACHING.

There is the dry kind. It may thus be characterised, as to the manner or the matter. The dry manner is where the preacher enters not heart and soul into his subject. He delivers the sermon as though it were a task or mere official duty; in which case it will be a task and not a pleasure to listen to it. When the congregation breaks up, you will overhear the whisper from one to another—"Insufferably dull." A cold, task-like delivery, with eyes fastened on the manuscript, and voice drawling out its monotonous cadences, must spoil even a good sermon. But the matter may be dry. This is sometimes unavoidable. Grave and weighty subjects are to be discussed, in which a certain class may not be interested. We venture to say that some of Paul's hearers, listening to such reason as occurs in the first eight chapters of Romans, might have wished that the eloquent apostle had given them something more lively and attractive. The foundations, however, must be laid, as well as the graceful superstructure reared

The dry kind of preaching includes the metaphysical. New England ministers are addicted to this. They take it from their great theologians, such as Emmons and others. Every sermon is cast into a fixed logical mould, with its first, second, and third, and all the legitimate inferences. Ezekiel's dry bones were not dryer or more lifeless than are some of these metaphysical discourses. They have been the bane of the pulpit. Say what they will, it has tended to depopulate their sanctuaries. A few old strong-headed men may be pleased, but the masses understand about as much as if it were a discourse in Greek or Hebrew.

There is the pictorial kind. Some call it "word painting." It is the opposite, in general, of the dry Most people are attracted by it—interested in it. It is panoramic; and as the preacher passes the consecutive pictures before his audience, they are affected, according as these moral sketches are bright or dark, attractive or repulsive. One moment perhaps they smile, and the next they weep When this pictorial kind is well managed, and is accompanied by a manner appropriate, and a voice of variable intonations, it has great effect. The impression is not always of a religious nature The sensibilities may be strongly moved, whilst the will is as obdurate as ever. Usually this kind of preaching interests young minds, whose fancy predominates over the judgment, and who would rather have their feelings touched than their consciences convicted. We will not pronounce against this kind of preaching. He who has the gift is bound to exercise it. But let him use it, not abuse it. His pictures should be in good taste, drawn from Scripture and from nature. Let them be set in the frame-work of a good judgment, and always be so exhibited that the picture, not the painter, shall be the impressive object. The gift is rare. Some try their hand at word painting, and their pictures are miserable daubs. Others, who possess the gift, use it to draw hearers to promote their own popularity, to make the hearers admire or stare. This is shocking. To such, we say: Seek some other place than the pulpit to exhibit your paintings.

As this kind of preaching depends on a vivid imagination, together with a glowing manner of speaking and writing, it would be well for those who lack these requisites not to attempt it By another style they may be less popular, but not less useful. As this pictorial kind seems to be coming into vogue, we are anxious to give it a right direction. There is danger of its running into excess; and the result will be many stony ground hearers. Sensible people, too, will be apt to be disgusted. There should be mingled with it the exegetical, didactic, and homiletic kind. Audiences don't want to be always in a picture gallery.

Another kind is the expository. This is primitive. It was the kind practised by the Jews—then by the apostles—then the fathers, and now, in this country, almost by—nobody. The Scotch divines still keep to it, and some of the ministers of England also. Years ago it was in use here. The great Dr. Mason always occupied a part of Sunday in exposition This was his most interesting and instructive service. But the practice seems to have died out. Would that some popular, learned, and pious minister would give it a resurrection in our pulpits! The writer of this expounded the Scriptures for five consecutive years, every Sunday afternoon; and if ever he was useful as a minister, it was by these exercises. Having removed from the country to a large city parish, he was given to understand that expository preaching would not be as acceptable as the mere didactic sermon. It is his firm belief, however, that the pulpit will not exert its legitimate power until this mode of preaching is re-installed. They who feel it must expound God's Word, and not rest solely on the sermon. The people must come back to it. They must encourage their minister to it. By this they will put honor on the Word of God, and find themselves more rapidly educated for the kingdom of heaven. Ministers, too, will not then be so chained down to their manuscript. They will learn to preach as well as read

"WASHINGTON: HIS LIFE, CHARACTER AND OPINIONS, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO OUR TIMES.

LECTURE BY REV. C. P. KRAUTH

He commenced with a reference to the interview between his hero and Chateaubriand, a French author and statesman. The young traveller, soon after his arrival in this country, had dined with Washington, who, in the course of conversation, made allusion to the obstacles his guest was exposed to next in his intended expedition, (for the purpose of discovering a north-west passage.) "But, sir," said the traveller, "it is less difficult to discover the polar passage than to create a nation" The allusion to this interview suggested the question, "Was Washington the creator of this nation?" That Washington was indeed the founder of this country as a nation, could readily be shown. As without Luther the Reformation might not have been, so without Cromwell the Commonwealth would never have risen, as without Wesley Methodism would never have organized itself, so without Washington our land might never have been the home of an independent, free, and united nation. No one in the great struggle of the Revolution could have taken his place. Assisted, he had been. Hamilton was, he said, the Melancthon of the Revolution, but, compared with Washington, the glory of the noblest of our Revolutionary heroes grew pale. God had meant us to be free, and therefore had created a Washington. God gave but one man to a system—but one Washington to a nation. No other qualities than those possessed by Washington could have averted or the juncture in which he appeared upon the world's stage. There was something even in the name of Washington that ought not to be overlooked. The world's heroes had, in fact, ever had names to fit the world's mouth. Great men, if we observed, never had sounding first names, and little last names. The man whose first name was Thomas, and whose last name was Jefferson, had been a statesman; but Jefferson, whether it be the first name of a Davis or a Professor Brick, tells of no statesmanship. Leonidas, the Grecian, had fought well in a tight place; Leonidas Polk might soon find himself in a tighter one by his undertaking to fight in a bad cause; but if he should, our Leonidas was not likely to be the hero of a second Thermopylæ [Laughter and applause.]

Introducing his subject proper, he said, that but for this war our nation would probably never have understood Washington thoroughly. It was his object to view Washington mainly in his relations to the history of our country, and to the great governmental question which now agitates our land.

The four different forms of rule under which the people of this land had lived were next briefly referred to—the Colonial, the Revolutionary, the Confederate, and the Constitutional, which commenced at the formation of the Constitution, and in support of which our nation was now in arms. He then drew a parallel between the present war and the Revolution. The war in which Washington unsheathed his sword was, he said, as really a civil conflict as our present war. It had been fought against the Government under which the people lived, against people of the same race, and of the same nationalities. It had, in short, been a war to obtain the nationality which this war was waged to defend. The inharmonious elements pervading the colonies were next referred to. In every state there had been a party favorable to the British Government, and the ratio of Tories, then, he held had been quite as great as the proportion of Secessionists in our country to-day. Washington's views respecting the course to be pursued towards the Tories were also given in this connection.

The fundamental principle upon which our country rested was that of unity. As detached colonies they would have remained colonies forever. The spirit of American liberty was of necessity a spirit of American unity. Union, therefore, was not the child of American Independence, but its mother. The first great step towards the recognition of this American unity had been taken by Virginia in 1749. Much was here introduced by the lecturer to show that not States' rights, but American liberty, had been the sole object of the war of the Revolution. With this understanding, Washington had accepted his commission as Commander-in-Chief of the American army at the hands of Congress, on the 15th of June, 1775. It had been his zealous object, uniformly, to discourage mere local attainments, and to enforce the American idea. These sentiments had continued to be cherished by Washington until his death. "Every citizen should take pride in the thought that we are now a distinct nation," had been Washington's own words; and in that matchless document, his Farewell Address, he had said, "The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than appellatives derived from local discriminations." In a letter to Patrick Henry, in 1795, he had said, "I want an American Character." To some extent what followed here was a synoptical history of the country during the Revolutionary period.

The philosophy and mode of effective union, although early recognised, had yet to be solved Washington, as already shown, had been profoundly impressed, by bitter experience, with the defects of the old Confederation; especially with the defects of the Union it formed, which wanted power to enforce its own acts and to control the disobedient. His part taken in the formation of the present Constitution was next referred to. He had taken the oath of office to sustain that Constitution, and in his Farewell Address was a grand appeal to his nation to observe its requirements inviolate forever.

The central political idea of Washington had manifestly been that of the necessity of the strongest government compatible with freedom. A Union which should be indissoluble, with a central power that should be supreme. This the lecturer proceeded to demonstrate by documentary evidence on the subject.

The views of Washington and those of Secession were next finely contrasted. The one stood by the "people;" the other gave to each state at will the right of trampling upon the Constitution as a whole. The Constitution which Washington signed had given us the name which we yet bore—the United States. The theories and tendencies which had destroyed our national peace had been as well known to Washington as they were to us. But for him, these theories would have prevented our country from coming into being. In the Revolution the British and the Tories combined, had not given him as much trouble as this narrow jealousy between the States. This same disintegrating spirit in the Revolution had sunk millions of money, cost many precious lives, prolonged the struggle, and heightened all its miseries. At the end of the war it had arisen with a strength which appalled Washington, and inspired him with doubts whether it would not have been better for him never to have drawn his sword. The experiment of the Confederation, short as it was, had almost destroyed the land. Its fruits had prepared the people for the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in which Washington bore so conspicuous a part, and which in reality had been the first great triumph of the spirit of nationality over the false doctrine of State Rights, just as its glorious maintenance in our present war was destined to prove a second and final one. We were fighting in the last half of a day on the morning of which Washington was triumphant; the enemy had rallied, and we had but to follow in his steps to finish the work

The great burden upon the heart of Washington had been the fear of Local and State political jealousies and prejudices; which he foresaw would only weaken and destroy, if allowed to obtain the mastery. A number of extracts were here given to show Washington's convictions of the ruinous tendency of this confederate laxity, and how deeply he felt the need of vital and efficacious union. He had foreseen the dangers of the Republic, as to course as he had seen its advantages. Of the four things designated by Washington as essential to the well-being, and even to the existence of, the United States as an independent power, the first was an indissoluble Union of the States under one Federal head.

That this theory was correct the lecturer proceeded to demonstrate from history, and the philosophy illustrated by the examples of the present hour. This attempt at dissolution, he admitted, had been as logical as any such attempt could be; and if the oligarchs had but had power to enforce their logic, their object would most certainly have been attained. This Secession, bad as it is, was unquestionably the most plausible one that could be got up. Washington had clearly seen that the failure of this Union would lead to anarchy, and that anarchy would lead to a final and hopeless overthrow of our liberty.

Reasons were given to show that we must either be the freest nation on earth, or the most servile; that we must either have the largest liberty, or none

OLD FOLKS' CONCERT.

On Wednesday night, Franklin Hall was much crowded—more so than we ever saw it on any previous occasion. The attraction consisted of Father Burris' Old Folks' Concert. The curtain rose about five minutes before 8 o'clock, and we then beheld Father Burris and troupe seated, all being dressed in the ancient style, and looking very grave; some with spectacles on and canes in their hands, and others with caps on their heads. It was well conducted, as the pupils were all perfect in the parts assigned them. Mr. Burris deserves much credit for his zeal and industry. The proceeds of the concert will be given in our next.

REVIVALS.

Elder Woodlin, of Bethel Church, closed his protracted meeting on Friday night, the 21st, with a general class meeting. He had quite a good meeting, and several joined the church.

Rev. A. Stanford, of Little Wesley Church, is holding a protracted meeting in his church, and is assisted by Revs. John Morgan and William Fuller, who seem to be his main stand by.

NOTICE.

The young Quaker lady who was to lecture at St. Thomas' Church did not get there, as she received a call elsewhere. There was a strong debate between Mr. J. C. Weir and Mr. Alfred Green.

NOTICE.

Several pieces appear this week which came too late for last week; among which was Bishop Nazrey's reply to the other Bishops.

EPISCOPAL VISITS.

I will be on the Westchester Circuit on the 29th of March. The Elder may make arrangements up to the 5th of April. I will then leave for Oxford on the Penningtonville Circuit, and remain to the 12th, on which day I will leave for Lancaster Circuit, where I will remain a week. The Elders or Preachers will make their arrangements and inform me of them. W. NAZREY.

THE DEATH-BED OF THE REV. JOHN WESLEY.

We were presented with this beautiful picture by the Publisher, Mr. William Smith, No. 702 South Third St., Philadelphia. It is a steel plate engraving of the finest order, and was executed by Mr. J. Sartain, who is well known throughout the country as an excellent artist. Mr. Smith has been very fortunate in purchasing the plate at a cost of several hundred dollars, and it has just been re-engraved. He is in want of good efficient agents in all parts of the country; his terms are liberal. The death-bed scene of the Rev. John Wesley and of Rev. Richard Allen ought to be in every religious family, but more especially Methodist. We hope to live to see the Rev. Richard Allen's death-bed scene gotten up in the same style as the one we are now recommending. We hope to see our friends rushing to our Book Store to purchase the death-bed scene of Rev. John Wesley; we will have them here for sale. Mr. Smith, a gentleman who is well known to the community, and is said to be worthy in every respect, has other valuable pictures engraved.

MR. EDITOR:—I see that Bishop Quinn has given notice of his Annual Conferences, and also invited Bishop Payne and myself to be present at them. I would gladly meet the Ohio Conference if it was in my power so to do; but I fear that I cannot do it. I will be glad to attend the other conferences, if no preventing Providence. I did expect from my last interview with Bishop Nazrey last summer, that we should have a meeting in Philadelphia this winter, or otherwise I should have invited him and Bishop Payne to attend this district Annual Conference, and will now be happy if they will meet with us on the 10th of May next, in Trenton, N. J., at the opening of the Conference, or during its session; and if they cannot be present at that time, if Bishops Quinn and Payne will arrange the time and place between themselves, and inform me, I will meet with them, as we have not had a meeting since the rise of the last General Conference.

W. NAZREY.

EDITUS.

MR. EDITOR:—Rev. J. P. Campbell appears unwilling to give up the contest. The battle was going on between Mr. Observer and myself. I have succeeded in silencing ex-editor Stanford and Mr. Observer, and now Rev. J. P. C. thinks it is not glory enough to silence two of my great competitors, but wishes me to open upon him, which I would readily do, anticipating complete victory, but as I am not an ambitious man, and particularly fond of triumphing over vanquished competitors, I shall let my colleague, Rev. J. M. Brown, attend to my friend, Rev. J. P. C., since he (Campbell) has referred to Rev. J. M. B. in last communication. PRESBYTER.

CHILDREN, remember that your best Friend is in heaven. The Friend that upon earth took little children up in his arms and blessed them; that said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." He loves you more than any other friend does, and desires you to love him, in this world, that you may live with him in the next. Will you refuse to love him?—Jesus, the Friend that died for you?

SEARCH FOR TRUTH

BY REV. CHARLES BROWN, D. D.

"Is conscience a correct guide in our conduct?"

MR. EDITOR:—In your issue of February 1st, 1862 I find an article in your editorial columns thus headed, and, giving you credit for that editorial magnanimity and Christian charity which would allow the expression of an honest difference of opinion to find place in your columns, I take the liberty of dissenting from the views taken in said article, hoping that I am prompted by no other motive than a love of truth

The article starts with a definition of what conscience is, to wit: "Conscience is the secret testimony of the soul, whereby intelligent beings are enabled to judge right from wrong." Now it needs no acute observer to see that even this definition needs defining. I care not from what lexicographer it may have come. The word "intelligent" is a unit of two constructions; first, it may be used when speaking of human beings in contradistinction with the brute creation; second, it may be used to signify an understanding clear and sound—a mental eye that sees things as they are. Now, if the writer of the article in question construes his own definition to mean, by intelligent beings, all mankind, then his definition sustains the affirmative of the question, "Is conscience a correct guide in our conduct?" which side he takes: but if he takes the other definition or use of the word intelligent, then his own definition is a complete refutation of any arguments which can be produced to prove the affirmative of the question; for it is axiomatical that if we mean, by intelligent, those of clear understanding and sound minds, and then say that to these (inferring, unmistakably, the exclusion of all others) conscience furnishes a "secret testimony by which they can judge right from wrong" Certainly, it does not furnish all a safe rule for conduct, because all are not intelligent, all have not sound minds or a clear understanding. The sentences which follow the writer's definition in this paragraph fail to exhibit any logical connexion, explanation, or qualification, and, therefore, are irrelevant to the point with which I have just dealt. Yet I cannot allow them to pass without analysis. If they contain what is true, analysis will only give them more force; if what is fallacious, then will they suffer from exposure.

Says the writer, "It is impossible, however, to draw the lines of distinction between the moral judgment and the moral sentiment." We sympathize with the writer in his misfortune not to appreciate the difference between more sentiment, the offspring of feeling, of passion, and the great monarch of man judgment, which is the exponent of all that constitutes man. Why, the exercise of all man's intellectual, moral, and remotely physical faculties, combining, make up his judgment When it is difficult to distinguish between the relation of parent to child, schoolmaster to scholar, or mind to matter, then, and not till then, will it be difficult "to draw lines of distinction between the moral judgment and moral sentiment." (See For definition of "sentiment," see Webster's Dictionary.) A man's feelings may control, destroy his judgment; so may children control, influence, and even rule their parents—but who is at a loss, for all this, "to draw the line of distinction between" parent and child? But, as if to fortify the philosophical deduction to which I take exception, the writer says, "They are inseparably connected,"—as if things might not be connected, and yet admit of distinction. The President and Vice-President are connected, and yet we can "draw lines of distinction between them,"—i. e., their exercise of power.

Again, he says, "We feel and judge at the same time or moment." This is not necessarily so. We cannot judge without something to judge with, and a child knows that this something is the mind; very well. When David walked back and forth, and cast first the anxious, then the lustful, gaze at Bathsheba, did he feel and judge at the same time—or did he judge afterwards, when in sackcloth he wept, and in ashes sat him down, crying, "Create in me, O God, a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me?" Another passage follows, on which rests an almost impenetrable mist. "In regard to the moral action, it is enough to know that our moral judgment is like our intellectual intuition—immediate and certain." We leave that for the reader's experience to affirm or contradict.

Aware that the limits of the RECORDER's columns will not allow me to deal farther with this article in detail, I now proceed to give it a general criticism. The writer seems to hold to the doctrine of the infallibility of conscience—for he says plainly, "For all intelligent men and women, in possession of reasoning faculties, we claim for conscience a sufficient guide for them." So did Hume, Voltaire, Chesterfield, and hosts of others, who, like blazing comets in the sky, dazzled by their brilliancy. If it be sufficient, then we want nothing more, as the doctrines of the Cross, of repentance, of faith, and the Holy Ghost—superfluities that the Deity has thrust upon us. Not so! Conscience, of itself, gives no infallible guide for our conduct. I declare conscience to be the great check-rein upon man, and it will work, it will guide, just as some power guides it. This check-rein, conscience, is either held by the Spirit of God, of the world, or the devil. No man can get away from this truth. The conscience of the Indian will cause him to hunt his enemy o'er hill and vale, through marsh and fen, to shed his blood, because he believes it is right; he is thus trained. The conscience of the Roman Catholic sends him to early mass, and extorts the homage paid to priestly power. The conscience of the Mohammedan causes him to repair to the Mosque—make his pilgrimage to Mecca to bathe with his tears the green turf that covers the bones of Mohammed. The conscience of the Buddhist women causes them to burn themselves on the funeral pile, on account of the death of their husbands. See the mother throwing to the crocodile an infant that she tears from her bosom as its soft fingers cling to the paps that give it suck. To what shall we attribute the conscientious wrongs of these people but to the power that controls conscience? In all ages there have been martyrs to error. Conscience, wrongly educated, wrongly controlled, has been the impetus which has given force to persecution and the most wanton cruelty. Where do we find consciences enswalling for good, and to an extent that makes the man an existence, working according to the principles of right? Nowhere but in the person of the true man of God. Sometimes a man's conscience will make him rigidly honest and just in some things, and he will not be so in others. I know a stockholder whose conscience would not allow him to cheat you out of a dime, and yet he will keep forty human beings in bondage. Conscience reproves him for the one, but not for the other; because, from his infancy, he has been accustomed to the institution.

Feeling that I am trespassing too much on your space, I beg leave to conclude in your next.

Rev. JAMES LYNCH.

WHAT DOES HE MEAN?

DOES HE QUESTION THE RIGHT AND DENY THE MERIT?

Brother James Lynch, of Georgetown, D. C., has written five sides of foolscap paper in relation to an editorial which appeared in the 50th number of the Christian Recorder on "Conscience." We confess that we don't see the force of such an article, but we will give it for what it is worth.

1. Does Brother Lynch mean to say that we are not the Editor of the Christian Recorder? And if so, does he mean to say, further, that the article is not ours, and that we should not have the merit of it? If these are the brother's meanings, we will only say in answer, that he is like poor Bartimeus, blind, and wants his eyes opened; hence we will open them. It is our article, and we are Editor of the Recorder. We are sorry to see you so far lost in the fog, my young brother.

2. You undertake to comment upon our remarks on Conscience. Do you assume to say that conscience is not the secret testimony of the soul? Most assuredly you do. Do you mean, by the course you have pursued, to prove that the word intelligent is used in its highest degree or in a comparative degree? If not so, then your argument goes to justify the brute kind in being in possession of distinct intelligence. Therefore, you have said in this connexion what we neither uttered nor meant.

3. In relation to the quotation and the words, "irrelevant to the point," we cannot see the force of the remark; but in relation to the view or inference he leaves in reference to brutes, it is quite irrelevant

4. The brother quotes a part of the sentence in our article where we stated that it was impossible to draw the lines of distinction between the moral judgment and the moral sentiment, and then says: "We sympathize with the writer in his misfortune," &c. Will the brother read our article over again, and the connexion, and he will see that he has made a very grave blunder? He reminds us of a man who had a tree felled to make rails to build up his fence He employed a man to split it up into rails, so that was the object in felling it, and then be divided it; one-half of it he made into a fine lot of rails, and the other was cut into short pieces for fire-wood. At this the owner was indignant, notwithstanding the one-half which was cut for fire-wood did not destroy the owner's intention. Now we will quote what we said in that article to show the fallacy pursued by our good brother, and will go farther than that. Hear it! "It is impossible to draw the line of distinction between the moral judgment and the moral sentiment." They are inseperably connected. We feel and judge at one and the same moment in regard to moral action. (Mark!) With the nature of that standard, according to which we judge, we, of course, have no concern. It is enough to know that our moral judgment is like our intellectual intuitions—immediate and certain; so that we cannot deny them without denying the very existence of our moral constitution. But, in alleging the certainty of the judgment of conscience, we must bear constantly in mind that our moral nature is spoken of in its fundamental principles alone. It is this which constitutes man a responsible being. Now we maintain, for the benefit of our young brother, that this view laid down is a standard view in point of theology, notwithstanding the quotations of Webster. We will give Christians the definition of feel: to feel—("Christ has a feeling of our infirmities; having endured the like, he tenderly sympathizes with us in our troubles." Heb. iv. 15.) "Feelings are sensations or emotions of the mind produced by the views we have of religion. For instance, religion consists in emotions, repentance, and devotion, and the feeling sorry for our sins. We are verily guilty. How finely are the office and influence of conscience exemplified in these words of Joseph's brethren! It was about twenty-two years since they had sold their brother, and more than likely their conscience had been lulled to sleep to the present hour God combines and brings about those favorable circumstances which produce attention and reflection, and give weight to the expostulations of conscience.

Dr. Clark calls the conscience the soul, and says: "How necessary to hear its voice in time! for here it may be the instrument of salvation; but, if not heard in this world, it must be heard in the next; and there, in association with the unquenchable fire, it will be the never-dying worm." Now what think you of this, my brother? Hast thou not fallen from Christian theology and partaken of fabletheology? Be careful, my son, in the Gospel. Again, Dr. Clark says: "All men have what is commonly termed conscience, and conscience plainly supposes the influence of the Divine Spirit in it, convincing of sin, righteousness, and judgment. 2. The Spirit of God is given to enlighten, convince, strengthen, and bring men back to God, and fit them for glory by purifying their hearts. 3. Therefore, all men may be saved who attend to, and coincide with, the convictions and light communicated." If the statement of Dr. Clark is to be credited, we would recommend our young brother and schoolmaster, who sympathizes so much for us, to study Methodist theology for his misfortune.

In conclusion, we will say further, for the satisfaction of Brother Lynch, that if he will read Watson's Theological Dictionary, the standard of the M. E. C., he will find the following definition: "Conscience is that principal power or faculty within us which decides on the merit or demerit of our own actions, feelings, or affections, with reference to the rule of God's law." It is called the moral sense by Lord Shaftesbury and Dr. Hutcheson. Dr. Reid takes the same view; and, in supporting it, says: "The testimony of our moral faculty, like that of the external senses, is the testimony of nature." We have the same reason to rely upon it, and therefore consider conscience as an original faculty of our nature, which decides clearly, authoritatively, and instantaneously, on every object that falls within its province.

We are not disposed to hold controversy with any of our correspondents, and will not do so, unless they tread on our toes.—ED.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 10th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly—for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to, somebody's head may have to come off. We hope that the other Bishops will do the same

For the Christian Recorder.

LETTER FROM BROTHER BROWN

MR. EDITOR:—Rev. J. P. Campbell's labored article will find a reply in the document which we send you about "The True State of the Case" If he says that the judgment of the General Conference is not found upon page 32d, then he must be growing blind, can't read, or some other mishap has befallen him, which I should sincerely regret. I wonder if he will not put on his spectacles and look again at page 32 of General Conference minutes. The more I examine this subject, the more thoroughly am I convinced that Elder Campbell and all who advocate this double dealing are the enemies of Bishop Nazrey and the African M. E. Church. The true policy is this: To follow, and no longer attempt to abuse, the General Conference. We tell Elder Campbell, we have resolved, and never intend to cease this warfare until he and others submit to the decrees and mandates of the General Conference. If discord is produced, we will meet it like men, and battle that discord with truth until every man shall submit to the highest court in the A. M. E. Church. I wrote the Report of the Committee on Canadian Affairs, and know the intention of every man. They then, as now, were opposed to Bishop Nazrey holding any relation to Canada, unless he gave up his relation to the A. M. E. Church.

Much has been said about slavery, compulsion, and other inappropriate words, indicating that General Conference compelled Bishop Nazrey to resign his relation to the B. M. E. Church, when the contrary is true. No compulsory measures were used. Bishop Nazrey had six days to decide whether he would remain with us or go to Canada. At the end of six days, he voluntarily offered his resignation to the B. M. E. Church. He then, in September following, offered it to the General Conference of that Church; and, by a vote of that Conference, they refused to receive it. What then was the duty of the Bishop? Clearly to resign from the A. M. E. Church Nothing is more preposterous than the attempt, my dear friend and Brother Campbell, to place him over us as one of our Bishops while he holds his Episcopal relations to the B. M. E. Church. I am ashamed of him! that a man of his fine and well cultivated talents should be engaged in presenting to the world such miserable logic! I love my brother too well to believe him sincere. May the Father of all goodness save us all from such sophistry. Yours, as ever,

LETTER FROM BROTHER TURNER.

MR. EDITOR:—Some occurrences of Baltimore events may not be out of place, notwithstanding nothing extraordinary has transpired in our city more than what you are kept posted on either through your own means of information or other artificial expedients.

The recent victories achieved by the superior strategy and bravery of the Federal forces, I find, are making more Union proselytes among those who have hitherto been favored with secessionism than all the logicians and rhetoricians in the country could have made.

Disloyalty, traitorism, tyranny, and oppression are all the fruits of one corrupt tree, and the God of heaven has commissioned his holy imperial watchers to hew it down. And we might as well talk of darkening the sun by an accidental expectoration, or extinguishing the luminaries of heaven by the blackening sweep of an unchained passion, as to think of rebutting the proud march of Federal strength interblended with a determinable ambition for the establishment of justice, equity, and right, nam in hoc vincit qui jus est.

Rev J M. Brown has just closed a very successful protracted meeting, which resulted in adding several to his church. Brother Brown is making quite an intellectual and moral reform in his Federal Hill charge. He has also commenced preparing for the erection of a new church, as the present church does not begin to accommodate the people who convene there to hear the word of life. Should Brother Brown be returned to the same station another year, we may look out not only for a magnificent church, but one that shall vie very strongly with Big Bethel.

Rev. A. W. Wayman has also commenced a protracted effort in his charge, which has not been in continuance long enough yet to say how the current will run. We can only say the prospect is good

Rev. Bishop Payne, D. D., is still with us. He has quite recovered from the ill attack which had him prostrated for several weeks upon his bed. I think he looks better now than I have seen him for a long time. I am not able to say whether the Bishop will remain out till our Conference is over or not. I am happy to state, however, that his remaining with us is giving character to our literary standard with the whites, and a beneficial impetus to our people.

Rev. W. H. Waters has been complaining for some time. He has contracted a severe cold, which has reduced him considerably.

We had a very fine week's meeting at my church, (Union Bethel,) which is just over. The Lord was with us. Considering there is no epidemic in our city, the people are dying very fast. My church, in a week's time, lost two of her most prominent members—Sister Polke and Brother John Waters, exhorter. But glory be to God they both died in the faith. Two happier deaths are seldom witnessed.

Ever since the Rev. S. L. Hammond wrote to you that letter which you published of his, stating, as he thought, that the Repository detracted from the Recorder, and the Recorder from the Repository, a great many persons have looked upon these two organs as being derogatory to each other's interests, as well as the editors being somewhat prejudiced against each other.

Now I don't think that Rev. Hammond ever intended to convey so radical an idea as what has gained prevalence among the people, and hence I think the people have both extremed his idea, and misapprehended the design of the editors, also the bulk and literary wants of our people.

Now, sir, you know it never was the intention either for the Recorder or Repository to antagonize each other, for yourself has been the prime editor of both. And did you give up the executive editorial department of the Repository, after having so honorably served it, to wage hostility against it by resurrecting the Recorder? Was not your purpose or intention in the latter confidential to your design in the former? Must all things be converged into one thing before our meddles can perceive they are not inimicably executed? Must we forever lag for the want of the inestimable power of joint operations? No! God forbid; it is time for the people to see that there is need for every grade of literary application among us. And this leads me to say, that we need both the Recorder and Repository We should have an organ for both current and solid matter. The literary reputation of our ministry, the extensiveness of our connexion, the wants of our people in general, the numberless pupils in our Sabbath Schools, all argue not only the necessity of a Recorder and Repository, but of a regular printing house. This is no time to be fanning literary opposition. But let us support both. Let both organs battle together, and let the subscribers for one subscribe to the other also, and down with this false idea that they are hostile to each; down with the idea that we do not need them

OUR BALTIMORE CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. EDITOR:—Yesterday was a day enjoyed by church-going people here. Rev. James N Gloucester, of Brooklyn, N. Y., is in our city He preached on Sunday, in Bethel Church, an able sermon, which was much admired. Mr. Gloucester is a son of Rev. John Gloucester, of Philadelphia, the first colored Presbyterian minister in the United States. Mr. G. is much pleased with the appearance of our city. He will leave in a few days for Washington, D. C.

The members of the M. E. Church, in our city, are making ready for the reception of their Annual Conference, which will meet in our city next week. It will be a time of some interest, as two Annual Conferences of the same church will be in session at the same time—the Baltimore Conference and the East Baltimore Conference. One will meet in the old Light Street Church, (the oldest Methodist Church in Baltimore,) and the other in Monument Street Church.

There are five colored churches in this city connected with the M. E. Church. They have three white pastors, which are sustained admirably well.

Rev. Dennis Davis, of our Conference, has been sick for several months. It is feared that consumption has marked him as its victim It is our prayer that his life may be spared a few years longer, for he bids fair to be an able minister.

Rev. W. H. Waters has been indisposed for some few weeks; so much so that he has not been able to preach for several weeks. He is attended by one of the most eminent doctors in our city, who thinks, that with a little care, he may be raised again.

Rev Bishop Payne is still in our city. His health is improving. W.

REV. E. WEAVER:—We thought it might not be out of the way to say something in reference to spiritual matters in our midst. The fact of the embarrassed state of affairs, occasioned by the present debt of our church, has the tendency of retarding our spiritual progress, though we have labored much that we might have an outpouring of God's grace. Having a great deal of snow, rain and ice, our streets are very unpleasant for footmen; hence our evening meetings were sometimes thinly attended, Sabbath evenings excepted. We have had considerable coldness among us, and many seemed to despair. Our Quarterly Meeting for New Haven Station commenced on Friday evening, Jan. 31st, with a general Class Meeting, but owing to the inclement weather, there were not many in attendance. The meeting was opened by Rev. Joseph P. Shreeves, of Bridgeport Station. During the continuance of the meeting, we were blessed with an unusual degree of God's grace: believers seemed to be built up in their most holy faith—seemed to feel stronger in the Lord and in the power of His might, and professed to become more perfect in love. Present with us were some two who were anxiously inquiring for Jesus, the friend of sinners. The weight of their sins seeming too intolerable for them to bear, we concluded to change our Class into a prayer-meeting; and before we left, the Lord spake peace to the soul of one of the seekers, (our near relative.) You may be assured it was a time of refreshing from the presence of the Lord. The meeting of that evening will not be forgotten by some who were present, neither in time nor in eternity.

On Sabbath morning, Feb. 2d, at half-past ten o'clock, we listened to an excellent sermon delivered by brother John Saunders, (an Englishman) a member and local preacher of our Church in New Haven, from the words—"But go thy way till the end be; for thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the day;" Dan. xii. 13. During the delivery of the discourse, we were again visited, and that powerfully, by the great Head of the Church; for while the praises of God were heard to resound through the sanctuary, sinners were constrained to cry aloud because of the weight of their sins. I was reminded of David's exclamation in the 77th psalm—"Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary;"—truly the way of comfort, conviction and deliverance. At 1½ P. M., we tried to say something touching the keeping in remembrance the sufferings, death, resurrection and exaltation of our blessed Saviour, and was assisted by Deacon Shreeves. We had a pleasant time during the Communion of the Lord's Supper. At ½ o'clock, P. M., Rev. J. P. Shreeves preached for us from the text—"And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness;" Mal iii. 3. On the occasion, we were blessed with the Divine presence while the Rev. brother portrayed to us the refining process so necessary to fit and prepare us for that celestial habitation, which we all expect to enjoy when we have accomplished our work, run the race, and fought the good fight

On Monday evening, Feb. 3d, we closed our Quarterly interview with a Love Feast.

On Sunday, Feb. 16th, we attended Rev. J. P. Shreeves' Quarterly Meeting in Bridgeport. We enjoyed the Love Feast after reading the Rules of the United Society. It was a good feast, because the Lord was present, and because we could see the prodigals returning home to their Father's house. There was a good time all day. It was to be regretted, on account of affliction, that a goodly number were hindered from getting there to participate with us. On Monday afternoon we parted, feeling to have been been spiritually benefited E. T. W.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS., Feb 24th, 1862

REV. AND DEAR BROTHER:—I have been reading, for some time back, long communications from the brethren about Bishop Nazrey and the relation he sustains to the B. M. E. Church. Sir, he did present his resignation to the B. M. E. Church at their General Conference; if they refused to receive it, is that the Bishop's fault? He has not officially acted as their Bishop since the meeting of their General Conference. Therefore, if they claim him to be their Bishop, that is no fault of his. Do they want to try him? If so, the Christian Recorder is not the Court for that, neither is the Editor the Judge. In my opinion, if the brethren would let this subject rest, and not fill the columns of our valuable paper with that which belongs somewhere else, the Philadelphia and New England Conferences will attend to their duty at the proper time and place; and if we cannot settle the matter, we will bring it to you at the General Conference.

My charge is now in a very flourishing condition. Five souls were converted to God last week, and the altar is always crowded with mourners. Pray for us. Rev. Jacob Mitchell is better, and hopes soon to return to his charge. Increase my number of papers to 20 copies. I enclose $2.00 for papers sold, and $1 00 for H. J. Johnson as a subscription. W. W. GRIMES.

LETTER FROM GEO. A. RUE.

Providence, R. I., Feb. 10th, 1862

DEAR RECORDER:—It is with great pleasure, and I hope it will be of some satisfaction to the numerous readers to hear from our Sabbath-school exhibition, on Friday night, the 14th inst. The children, from 2 to 12 years old, sang a beautiful hymn to the memory of Bishop Allen, after which prayer was made. Mr. John S. Waugh, who is a steward of the church, then made some touching remarks on the life and character of Bishop Allen, whose likeness was hanging in front of the platform. Brother Waugh gave a short history of the rise and progress of our connexion, touching the cause for separation from the M. E. Church. "Our object was to inform the children who Bishop Allen was, and what he had done for us." He did this in such glowing colours and used such eloquent language that I cannot describe it. The children were dressed beautifully, and behaved very well

Mr. Charles Dorrell, the youngest son of Rev. Deaton Dorrell, was the first speaker. Young Dorrell showed us the good results of untiring resistance against oppression and perseverance for liberty. The other [illegible] were equally as good on other subjects. The little girls felt the importance of their liberty, and they convinced us of one fact, that they (some of them, at least,) will be, if they live, mothers in the Church of the living God. God grant they may! The children did well, and the old folks were glad. The price of admission was ten cents.

On this occasion, we realized some nine dollars, ($9.00.)- We shall do something for the Book Concern as soon as we can draw our breath. Mr. Editor, don't despair; your heart will be made glad by and by.

GEO. A. RUE.

LETTER TO BISHOP NAZREY.

Baltimore, Md., Jan. 25th, 1862,

RT REV. WILLIS NAZREY:

DEAR BROTHER—In the RECORDER of January 11th, 1862, you call upon the Members of the General Conference of 1860 to give "some plea," concerning your Bishopric, "by which a question fraught with so much mischief may be set at rest."

In accordance with this request, we offer you our plan, and that is simply to comply with the decrees and provisions of the General Conference of 1860. They are in these words:

1. Resolved, That the General Conference fully believes this apparent double exercise of the Episcopal office in two distinct denominations is contrary to the genius and spirit of our Church Government.

2 Resolved, That the General Conference most respectfully request Bishop Nazrey to resign whatever relation he sustains to the British M. E. Church.

3. Resolved, That this resolution take effect immediately upon the passage of these resolutions

The 3d Resolution was modified by the following amendment, moved by Rev. S. Smith, to wit: "That he shall have sufficient time to meet the Annual and General Conferences."

Six days after the passage of these decrees, during which you had ample time to consider their intention, and their consequences, you presented to the General Conference the following pledge:

"To all whom it may concern: This is to certify that I do hereby resign my official relation as General Superintendent of the British M E. Church in Canada West." The above resignation is to take effect on and after the rise of the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church, which will sit in Toronto, Canada West, on the first Monday in September, 1860.

WILLIS NAZREY.

Nearly eighteen months have elapsed since you were to have fulfilled your own deliberate pledge and bounden obligation to these decrees of the General Conference. Your failure to do so, is evidently the cause of the troubles both in Canada and the States. We therefore advise and urge you to consider the letter, spirit and intention of these decrees, especially the first, for this is the particular law governing the case. We also advise you to consider your own written pledge to fulfil these decrees, and then immediately make your resignation good, sincerely, fully, absolutely, without reservation, without dissimulation, without equivocation without subterfuge; so will our peace be restored, the co-operation of your colleagues secured, and the unity of the A. M. E. Church preserved; while the B. M. E. Church, with her chosen Bishop at their head, may under God progress in every good word and work

But, and if you feel that your obligations to the British M E. Church are paramount to those which you owe to the A. M E. Church, and that the claims of the Canadian brethren to your services are more pressing than the claims of your brethren in the States, then the only alternative left you is to retire at once to Canada and exercise your Episcopal functions there.

We give you this plan, because we believe that if you continue to exercise a double episcopate in the States personally, and in Canada by proxy, you will certainly increase the difficulties already existing on both sides of the Lakes. (Signed,) DANIEL A. PAYNE,

One of the Bishops of the A. M. E. Church.

ON THE IMPORTANCE OF EDUCATION.

"'Tis education forms the youthful mind;
Just as the twig is bent the tree 's inclined."

The time has arrived, thank God, when we, the African race, feel interested in literature and the natural sciences. I have oftentimes thought how it was that our people were so easily satisfied on this one particular and important point. Why, a few years ago (for my knowledge of things does not extend farther back) our people would not attempt to consider the importance of intellectual improvement, nor take any pains to have their children acquire a good education, when it was in their power; they seemed not to realize the advantages that would have resulted from so doing. But how often, when this subject is presented to the minds of our race, do we meet with the response that this and that is good enough for us—what do negroes want with learning? And again, they would say, let us learn to cook, wash and iron, saw wood and drive dray, and that is sufficient for us to know; and our own people, during my time, have gone so far to say that education would make us crazy. But, thank God, the scales of ignorance are fast falling from our eyes, and we begin to see as one man, by which sight we see; we triumph, we sing praise; and we hope the day is not far distant when we will see not only as one man, but will see and act altogether, and avail ourselves of the opportunities for the cultivation of our faculties. I wish not to be understood as saying that no attention should be paid to domestic employments; but do not let the exercise of our faculties be confined exclusively to the right performance of those duties, which are indeed very important in themselves. It is all foolishness to say that it is of no use for us to try and better our condition as a class; let no such faith dwell in our hearts. I do not think that any class of people on the earth have better conceptions, greater ideas, deeper impressions, or stronger perseverance, than our own. And for this reason we should not stay behind, nor believe that education was designed for white people only. We should endeavor to disabuse our minds of such erroneous views. Knowledge is as good to us as it is to them. Let us improve it; may it keep a continual motion in our hearts; may we consider ourselves more than goods and chattels, and not inferior to other races of human beings. Let us have God for our foremost object, and He will assist us; and though our skin be stained, we will accomplish all we desire.

EULOGY ON SOPHIA RICE.

Philadelphia, Feb 4th, 1862.

A eulogy on the life, character and death of Sophia Rice, late consort of George Rice, was delivered in the A. M. E. Bethel Church, by Rev. Henry Davis and Rev. Joshua Woodlin, from Luke x. 41, 42. The theme of the discourse was, "One thing is needful." For our farther instruction from this pleasing and most interesting passage, it may be proper to observe the three following truths:

1st. The care of the soul is the one thing needful.

2d. The cares of the world greatly obstruct this religious care.

3d. Truly religious persons possess a portion which they shall never lose.

We are first to observe that the care of the soul is the one thing needful. It is the religious care of the soul that our Lord here intends, as appears from his opposing Mary's care to Martha's cares. Martha cared for many things, Mary for one thing, and she manifested this care by a studious attention to every word that dropped from his lips; but this short sentence comprehends a great deal

The care of the soul implies a consideration of its infinite value and importance, as immortal. According to our Saviour's words in another place, "What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" or, "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" The care for the soul includes the diligent use of all the means which God has appointed for its salvation, the first of which is a due regard to the word of God. Thus, Mary proved her care, and so must we. It is true we have not now the bodily presence of this great Teacher; yet we have his word. We have that gospel which he ordered to be preached to all nations, and which he promised to sanction with his spiritual presence to the end of the world.

Prayer also is a necessary branch of this religious care. This is a daily business of every one who has a due concern for his or her soul; for says inspiration the one thing needful; but the Master of the feast protested, "None of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper." But we must proceed in the last place to show that,

3 Truly religious persons possess a portion which they shall never lose. Mary—and our Lord—hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken from her. The part which she chose was to sit at the feet of Jesus and receive in faith his divine instructions. This was a good part, the advantages of which she never lost. In like manner, a truly religious person—one who is renewed by the Spirit of God—is an humble learner at the feet of Christ, for he says, "Learn of me, and become wise to Salvation by my sacred gospel, for ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." This, then, is the 'good part, eminently good, and what renders it incomparably good is its duration. It shall not be taken away. In this discourse religion is brought to a point. Here is a weighty sentence uttered by the lips of Eternal Wisdom—one thing is needful—one thing, observe, and that one thing is religion, or the care of the soul. Now, in conclusion, let the inquiry be, Have I chosen that good part which shall not be taken away? Is all safe with me for eternity? Is Jesus mine and am I his indeed? If so, O Christian, happy art thou. Envy not the richest and the gayest of the world. Be content with thy better portion, rejoice, be thankful, live to and for God the remnant of your days on earth, and you shall live with him in heaven.

J. Woodlin remarked that sister Sophia Rice was born on the 23d day of May, 1793, in Baltimore, State of Maryland. She embraced religion at the age of 14 years, and became a member of the Methodist Episcopal church in Baltimore. She married at an early age. She was the mother of twelve children, six of whom are now living, and five are here present on this mournful occasion. As a mother, she has had many occasions of deep sorrow for her children's welfare, and it was a theme of continued prayer to God for their conversion, and she has often expressed a firm belief that her children would all be saved in answer to her prayers.

In the year of 1830, she left Baltimore and came to Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, and became a member of the A. M. E. Bethel Church. She became a prominent member of the bands, and she succeeded mother Dunkins as mother of the bands.

Religion grew up with her growth, and strengthened with her strength, until it became a practical, every-day business with her, and on all occasions displayed a degree of Christian humility and self-denial worthy of the principles she professed. Her faith in the promises was firmly maintained all the days of her life, without wavering or doubting, and she was not deterred from Christian duties by any untoward circumstances except sickness. Though she is dead she speaks to us to-day in the silent remembrance of departed worth, and saying in gentle whispers, "You have fully known me and my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience, and I am now resting from my labors. During her last illness she was absent from the Band Love Feast, on Sabbath morning, January 26th, in consequence of sickness, and on Thursday, the 30th, she was sitting up sewing as usual. In the evening the family retired to bed, not thinking that death would call so sudden, and about 4 o'clock on Friday morning she was taken very ill, and before Brother Rice could get over to her daughter Jane and back, the spirit had fled to the spirit world. Her last words were to her children. Her daughter Sarah had her arms around her neck. She said, "Children, I am going home! Sweet Jesus!" and fell asleep in the arms of Jesus, in the 69th year of her age, and 55 years in the service of her Lord and Master.

Died in the city of Richmond, Ind., Feb. 15th, Ruth Ann Ladd, the daughter of Elijah and Milton Ladd, aged 17 years. I will say to all young ladies who are putting off their preparations for death and judgment till the last moment in life, that you are in greater danger. Ruth A. Ladd was raised by religious parents, who was like a canker worm around their hearts, who almost drained the fountain of their joys. She was stubborn, but very amiable; otherwise, obedient to her mother and father. This winter during our protracted meeting, her eldest brother embraced religion, and after that he was desirous to have her converted to God; for she said often that she was as wicked as she could be. She was converted in our protracted meeting, but we did not know it until she was brought down to a sick bed. Many of her friends talked to her, but she would put them off by saying, It was time enough, and—but, O, the sad thought and scene of one who waits too late! I was called for about midnight, and when I reached there, behold she prayed! She was calling aloud for the Lord to have mercy upon her. She said that in the time of the protracted meeting that she had fasted and prayed, and tried to obtain religion in a sly way, but the Lord says, If we will confess our sins, He is gracious enough to forgive; be means openly; for he that is ashamed of me before men, him will I be ashamed of before my Father and his angels.

We conversed with her upon the all-important subject of religion. She still prayed. We read and sang the hymns, and Am I born to die? &c., and I prayed with her; and while reading and singing the following, Oh, that I knew the secret place where I might find my God, &c., the Lord pardoned her of all her sins. She rejoiced in his love until Sabbath morning, and died.

Also died in the city of Richmond, Ind., February 17th, Calvin Carter, son of Frances and William Carter, aged about 18 months. So, died little Calvin. Of such is the kingdom of heaven. Wm. C. Turner

The people of Great Britain have no good cause to be satisfied with the high price they have had to pay for their interest in the so-called Southern Commissioners, and their threatened interference with our affairs. The London Times (very good authority in such a matter) says that the release of Slidell and Mason, and their two Secretaries, Eustis and McFarland, has cost the British Government £1,000,000 sterling, or, in all, from about $20,000,000 to $25,000,000. Rather expensive work.

An Imperial Ukase of great interest to the Jews has just been published at St. Petersburgh, Russia. It permits this people to enter into any branch of the State service, and Jewish merchants to reside in any place they may choose. It makes numerous other concessions, also, and evidently indicates a great change in the future position and condition of this people.

"THEM WHICH SLEEP IN JESUS"

The death of Christians is declared in this tasteful expression of the Apostle to be a sleep. It is a gentle word, and awakens no fears. We are not terrified by the approach of sleep. We do not dread to resign our bodies to its influence. We quietly lie down upon our pillows, gently close our eyelids, and invite the approach of sleep with no painful forebodings of evil. We do not tremble to see our loved ones sleep. When the mother hushes her babe upon her bosom, or rocks it in its cradle, smoothing its pillow, and drawing the curtains, and humming a soothing melody, she does not start with terror when she sees its eyelids becoming heavy, the arm motionless, the breathing scarcely perceived, and the body quiet and still. It only sleeps. Sleep is not an enemy, but a friend. Sleep will not harm it. It will awake again, and be more lively, joyous, and happy than it was before.

So said Jesus concerning one that had died. "She is not dead, but sleepeth." Her life is not destroyed by death. She lives notwithstanding she is dead. Whether the body immediately awakes or not, she lives still. Whether, as in the case of the daughter of Jairus, Jesus shall awaken the bodies of our sleeping dead, after a few hours' sleep, or as in the case of the resurrection at the last day, after a long time of sleep, it alters not, they live still. Paul distinctly asserts, "Whether we wake or sleep, we shall live together with him." We live when we are awake, and we shall live with him when we sleep as well. Whether we wake or sleep, we still live with him. Jesus said, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." He shall live though dead. Paul said, "Dying, and behold we live." There is a sense in which our dying does not affect our living. We may be dead, and yet live.

It is the believer that experiences such a blessed dying—it is he that goes to sleep in Jesus, that enjoys this happy sleeping. "Them which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." "Them which sleep in Jesus!" Blessed words! In the arms of Jesus, and with their heads resting on his bosom, they go to sleep. With the faith of Jesus, and trusting in his grace and mercy for forgiveness and eternal life, they go to sleep. With love for Jesus, and a spirit mild, gentle, pure, and holy as was his, they go to sleep. In communion with Jesus, and with prayer in their hearts, and his name on their lips, they go to sleep. In the service of Jesus, and amid a life of humble piety, incessant holiness, and active usefulness, they go to sleep. They sleep in Jesus. They were awake in Jesus, and now they sleep in him. They die in the Lord because they lived in the Lord. If their waking had been different from what it was, their sleeping would be different from what it is. The character of the life constitutes the nature of the death. To have Jesus in death, we must have him in life. To be in the bosom of Jesus when we sleep, we must have been at the side of Jesus when awake. To have Jesus in the end, we must have him in the way to it. If we would die well, we must live well.

Asleep in Jesus, O for me,
May such a blissful refuge be!
For 'tis indeed a blessed sleep,
From which none ever wake to weep.

The English Clergy and the War.—Says a late London letter in the New York Evening Post:—

"Mr. Spurgeon makes most effective and touching prayers, remembering, at least once on a Sabbath, the United States. 'Grant, O God,' he said recently, 'that the right may conquer, and that if the fearful canker of slavery must be cut out by the sword, it be wholly eradicated from the body politic of which it is the curse.' He is seldom, however, as pointed as this, and, like the other clergymen of England, simply prays for the return of peace. Indeed, it must be acknowledged that if the English press and government have done what they could to continue this war, the dissenting clergy of England have nobly shown their good will and hearty sympathy with the Americans, and their sincere desire for the settlement of our difficulties. 'If praying would do you Americans any good,' said an irreverent acquaintance last Sabbath, 'you will be gratified to learn that a force of a thousand-clergyman-power is constantly at work for you over here.'"

Syria.—In a letter from Beirut, dated Nov. 12, Mr. Jessup, an American missionary, writes: "The past fortnight has been a period of unprecedented sickness in Beirut. An epidemic fever prevails, and tens of thousands have been prostrated by it. Deaths are few, but the disease is very debilitating. Dr. and Mrs. Van Dyck, Dr. Thompson and two of his daughters, Miss Temple and my little daughter Anna, have all taken their turns, and not a family in the city has escaped entirely. The weather is hot and trying, the sky is like brass, with not a cloud to be seen, and thus it has been, almost without change, for more than thirty days. Last Sabbath the English service was suspended for want of both preachers and hearers. Is that ancient and interesting custom of sending reinforcements to missionaries, abandoned? We must have help, or there will soon be need of founding a new mission in Syria.

Quite an outbreak occurred in Northern Lebanon, near Tripoli, ten days since. It was between Maronites and Greeks, and is supposed to have been instigated by the Turks or the French. Lebanon is full of intrigue, and the new government for the mountains is a mere mockery.

Persia.—Letters from Rev. Mr. Cochran of the Nestorian Mission, Persia, give an account of the robbing of himself and family when six hours out from Oroomiah, on the open plain, by a band of Koordish horsemen. They had been to Beitlis with Mrs. Thompson, widow of Amherst L. Thompson, on her return to her native land. The horsemen pursued the party, and first attacked Mr. Cochran, made him dismount and took from him all his money. In regard to the other members of the family, the letter says:—

"The servants and family were next attacked, and here a more fearful scene ensued. Before my wife and children could be disentangled from saddles and panniers, many blows were given and some wounds inflicted. Fearing the worst, Mrs. Cochran tremblingly seized the arm of one of the fiercest of the ruffians, and begged him to spare the children; and our oldest daughter thirteen years of age, frantically rushed before half a dozen spears, to protect our servant with his tender charge; swinging her riding hat and crying, 'Yok! Yok!' the only Turkish she could command. But such entreaties availed us." They were more potent than guns and threats.

"Daughter, stand aside; you shan't be hurt," was the response. And we were let off very easily, only the money and loose articles being taken. Our saddle horses were driven off, but were sent back; our chests, containing valuable clothing, were not touched.

Upon my return, I found the son of the chief of the robbers in custody in the city, and the Governor sent word that the value of the property would be forthcoming.

American Bible Society.—The stated meeting of the Managers was held at the Society House, Astor Place, on Thursday, the 6th inst., at half past three o'clock, P. M., the Hon. Luther Bradish presiding. The 90th Psalm was read, and prayer offered by Secretary Hoddich. The Recording Secretary, Eugene Kinkle, Esq., one of the Vice Presidents of the Society was announced, and appropriate resolutions were adopted. One new auxiliary was recognized, which is in the State of New York. Interesting communications were received from Agents in regard to their work, especially the supply of soldiers; from Rev. H. L. Wayland at Tyler, Va., returning thanks for books for the Seventh Connecticut Regiment; from Rev. Henry Hopkins, Alexandria, Va., returning thanks for Bibles for the U. S. Hospital, with an account of their distribution; from Rev. Richard Ebbitt, Camp Preston King, near Baltimore, for Bibles for the Seventh Regiment N. Y. Volunteers; from Mr. Stephen L. Brown, acting pay master U. S. ship Warren, in Pensacola Bay, with thanks for books granted to the ship's company, and to the Chief Engineer's division; from Miss D. L. Dix, with thanks for books for hospitals at Washington; from Rev. David Trumbull, Valparaiso, S. A., returning aid to Bible work in that region; from Rev. R. S. Maclay, Fuh Chau, China, sending financial account, with encouraging statements as to the prospects of the Bible distribution in that country; from Col. Tronchin, chairman of the Swiss-Italian Committee, returning thanks for funds lately received from this Society, and in regard to the work in Italy; from Rev. S. H. Bergne, Secretary British and Foreign Bible Society, London, in relation to the translation of the Portuguese Bible; from Rev. M. Coquerel, of the Protestant Bible Society in Paris, requesting copies of publications by the American Bible Society; from Rev. Mr. Holden, Para, S. A., in regard to Bible distribution there and in Brazil; from Rev. J. G. Bliss, Constantinople, in regard to the work in Turkey, and the prospect of opening in Russia and also in regard to Arabic Scriptures and the distribution of them; from Rev. P. Van Pelt, Secretary Missionary Society of Reformed Dutch Church, asking funds to carry on the Bible work in their foreign Missions.

Grants were made to the Methodist Book Concern at Cincinnati; for Colored Sunday-school on Staten Island; eight volumes in raised letters for the blind; books in German to the Tract Society of the German Evangelical Church in Cleveland, O.; books in Spanish to a late chaplain in the Mexican army for distribution; books for distribution to vessels sailing to foreign ports; with upwards of 11,000 volumes to supply soldiers. These last-named have been granted mostly to Agents and Auxiliaries and chaplains in Missouri, Kentucky, Virginia, at Port Royal, Tybee, etc., etc. $147 00 were appropriated to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, to be paid in for the next society year.

State of the Secession Cause.—"Occasional" gives the following vivid picture:

The conspirators at Richmond are no doubt greeting the news from all quarters with a gloomy despair. They can read their own doom without the aid of an interpreter. The language of victory that fills every honest heart with joy comes to them as the fiat of an avenging God. Like the prisoner in his iron cell, which daily contracted, they see the army and navy of the Republic they have insulted, and the Constitution they have violated, closing around them with inexorable and appeasing certainty. The thunder of our destructive cannon tells them that there is no escape. As if to add to their remorse, they behold the people they have plundered and impoverished, the nations they have betrayed and brutalised, hailing the onward march of the Government, and taking these soldiers to their arms as so many deliverers from a despotism as grievous as any that has disgraced human annals. Presently the example which became so contagious in Tennessee will manifest itself in Richmond. That city has always been a conservative city. The Union spirit, stifled by a few tyrants, will break out like a Vesuvian eruption, and the traitors will be compelled to fly to save their worthless lives. There is, in fact, no avenue by which these wretched men can escape from the terrible calamities they have brought upon themselves. Europe, upon which they depended for succor, turns from them with contempt, and when she realizes that they are so weak as they are wicked, she will not hesitate to regard them as a banditti, that have been justly punished for attempting to destroy an indulgent and generous Government. Riot reigns in their midst—red-handed murder stalks throughout their streets—bankruptcy broods like a horrid pestilence in their marts, and their ragged army is instinct with fear of the vengeance about to be precipitated upon the conspiracy, and with secret hatred of those who have led them to their fate. Their navy, partly stolen and partly improvised, is being crushed into fragments, and martial law is declared in order that the heads of the rebellion may be protected from their own people. What a fearful sequel to a reckless career. Our most experienced captains and statesmen predict that in sixty days the head of the serpent will be annihilated.

The Twenty second.—A day of general and spontaneous rejoicing, a night of illumination and carnival, passed away with Saturday. There may have been more splendid occasions: there have been none characterised with more earnestness and intenseness. And few days have left behind them recollections so pleasant or so permanent, and feelings so ardent, patriotic, or liberal. There were, for the time, no local differences; for the reminiscences of the anniversary and its victorious precursors engrossed all individual and party ambition.

The great features of the day in Philadelphia was the grand and magnificent turn-out of the military, ordered by Governor Curtin, in obedience to a resolution of the legislature, calling for inspections, with a view to ascertain the number of available men under arms, the character of the equipments, and the effective weapons at the disposal of the military authorities.

The whole number of soldiers in the parade was estimated at ten thousand, and the display was one of the finest ever witnessed in Philadelphia.

The Day in Washington.

The sad event at the President's mansion exercised a manifest influence upon the celebration of the day, which was temperate, though joyful. A general desire, in the midst of the festivities, prevailed to evince a respectful deference to the feelings of the afflicted family.

The day was ushered in by the pealing of bells and continual roar of countless cannon at the navy yard, arsenals, and fortifications built by the army.

A grand review of cavalry, artillery, and infantry then took place opposite the Capitol, at which General McClellan, on making his appearance, was loudly cheered.

All the flags were thrown to the breeze, and the different camps were gayly decorated by the soldiers. The Sturgis Rifles, of Chicago, McClellan's bodyguard, had an effigy, labelled "Jeff Davis," suspended from a tree in front of their building on the corner of Tenth and Louisiana avenue.

The statue of Freedom, for the dome of the Capitol, received its finishing touches on Saturday, at the studio of Clark Mills.

The large national flag presented a short time since to the Washington Monument Association was raised on the staff on the summit of the obelisk today at noon.

In the old House of Representatives the rebel standards captured at our recent victories were displayed to a curious and patriotic crowd. Some of these flags represented the Confederate Government, and bearing the insignia of the well-known "stars and bars." Others were merely the flags of a State, with divers legends and inscriptions. Some were beautifully worked in heavy silk, fringed with gold—one from Louisiana, particularly, being a fine piece of rebel embroidery.

The Press says:

"Saturday was the glad last day of all the glad new year. Henceforth the volume of American history will have an illuminated title-page. A year ago, prosperity and Union, the heritage of Washington, shed countless blessings on the land. Before another year has passed, may we not hope to see that heritage reclaimed? And how shall we redeem it but by a grand illumination? Not otherwise. Our hearts must be illuminated with faith, and hope, and gratitude—faith in our constituted rulers to guide the good ship Union to the haven of security, hope for the ending of the conflict that Washington first saw in fear, that all the tact of diplomacy, and all the humiliations of compromise, were powerless to avert, and gratitude for the triumph of our arms from old Atlantic's stormy coast to the vale of the Mississippi. That is the grand illumination posterity demands; for at its bright effulgence the mists of halting doubt shall be torn as a veil from the face of the sky, and all the clouds of dark despondency be rolled away.

As to the grand parade of Saturday, its greatest grandeur was its typical significance. Passing in review before Governor Curtin and staff, it scarcely could have failed suggesting to him and the other grand parade that has stood in the old Capitol and filled with wonderment at its numbers—the parade of six hundred thousand soldiers, arrayed across the continent to battle for the land of Washington! How blessed the reflection that the cause which stamped upon his brow the seal of immortality, is ours to-day to battle for and save. Its prayer was a heart-note concentrated to summon them Washington's, and never was a cause more consecrated to a leader.

Humanity of the War.—The Philadelphia Ledger, in reply to the charge of the English Press, that our Government has been guilty of inhumanity in blockading Charleston Harbor, says:

"It has been a war which has assumed all its magnificent proportions in spite of the sighing treated with contempt in Kentucky and Cairo at first. The most economical of the officers of the army had been sufficiently constrained, their new forms had to be used, and all economy cast again, in order to suit our friends from Paris. Nor was it until the firing on Sumter broke the North that a single step was taken to raise an army. Harper's Ferry was destroyed and Norfolk seized and our troops murdered in Baltimore before we could and did commence to prepare for a real war. Even then the plot was continued through the rebel States, and for months after that express emissaries were allowed to carry letters and papers to and fro, at a time when all communications were stopped between the North.

"It has been an attempt to carry through these rebellious with the greatest mildness that was ever the case of a proper charge against the North. But it is said that we have changed, and from one extreme are rapidly rushing to the other. But look at the facts. We have had our vessels burned at sea by pirates like those on the Nashville and Sumter, sailing under a flag of no nation, recognised as such by any power on earth. We have caught hundreds of these men, and not one of them has been hung. Would England have been as forbearing? We have captured thousands of prisoners of war, and hundreds of spies in every disguise, and not the first one of these has been tried for their crimes, though many of them would have been regularly executed by all laws of ordinary warfare. Many of the Union men of Tennessee have been executed for burning bridges. The rebels have come within our lines and done the same things, but, we believe, in no case yet been executed.

Summary of Results.—Price has abandoned Missouri; Marshall and Zollicoffer have been badly whipped in Southern Kentucky; Bowling Green has been evacuated; Fort Henry has been captured; Fort Donelson, after a terrible struggle has fallen into our possession; Clarksville has been surrendered, and Commodore Foote is preparing to advance still nearer to Nashville. In Northern Virginia, General Jackson has been compelled to fall back before General Lander. The Burnside expedition survived the storm of the elements to carry by storm the rebel defences on the seaboard of North Carolina. General Sherman has not only not been attacked at Hilton Head, but has assumed the offensive, and has at different times extended his lines to the immediate vicinity of Charleston and Savannah. Colonel Brown has burnt down the most valuable buildings which were heretofore in the possession of the rebels at Pensacola. The whole Southern seacoast is so effectively blockaded that it is an extremely rare occurrence for any ship in the Secession interest to elude the vigilance of our cruisers. The armies of the Republic are daily increasing in strength, vigor and discipline, while the traitorous cohorts are dwindling away by the expiration of terms of enlistment, disease, desertion, and a succession of demoralising defeats. The roads to Tennessee are opened to us—the enemy are being outflanked by sea and by land—each day records some new triumph of our arms, undimmed by a single reverse. There is scarcely a section of the Union that we cannot now at pleasure penetrate with our mighty army.

A prominent member of the rebel Congress recently said that "If they [the rebels] had become discouraged; if their soldiers, tired of one brief campaign, refused to re-enlist for the war, they might as well abandon their attempt to gain their independence, lay down their arms, return to the arts of peace, acknowledge themselves fairly vanquished, and submit to whatever terms the North saw fit to dictate to them."

Thus treason is baffled at every point. The Republic looms up as triumphant and powerful as it is free, beneficent, and indulgent to its citizens. The existing generation shows, on many a hard-fought field, and by the endurance of many hardships and sufferings, that the blood of the Revolution courses freely through its veins.

To crown the general happiness, a large body of the prisoners captured in the earlier and more unfortunate struggles of the war, have just been released from the rebel prisons. In the midst of the universal exultation over great national triumphs, there will be a gush of profound and heartfelt joy caused at many hearthstones by the safe return of long-absent fathers, brothers, lovers, sons, and friends.

The Latest News.—Commodore Foote, in an official despatch to Secretary Welles, says that he has taken possession of Clarksville, and hoisted the national flag over the deserted rebel intrenchments. A Union sentiment manifested itself on our troops taking possession of the place. The commodore also states that he will take a fleet of gunboats farther up the Cumberland, perhaps to Nashville, fifty miles distant from Clarksville.

The news from Europe, by the arrival of the Niagara, at Halifax, to the 9th instant, is full of interest. The declaration of Earl Russell to the Southern commissioners, that England could not acknowledge the rebel States until their position in the family of nations was more clearly defined, was laid before Parliament. We are likewise informed that no less than six sets of Parliamentary papers concerning the civil war in America had been presented to the body; and that not less than forty-five official communications had passed between the Cabinet and various government officials relative to the menacing position occupied by the U. S. gunboat Tuscarora, and the pirate Nashville.

The Sumter was detayed at Gibraltar, some difficulty having occurred in obtaining coal for her.

The Assistant Secretary of War has received a letter from a friend in New York, contradicting (upon reliable authority) the recent statement of a Richmond paper that the steamer Victoria had succeeded in breaking the blockade, and had carried 15,000 stand of arms into New Orleans. It is scarcely necessary to contradict what Richmond papers say.

The last six months have witnessed a great increase in the naval force in the Gulf. From two small steamers, purchased, fitted up in haste for the service, and sent on to the blockade off the Mississippi, the squadron has increased to two steam and two sailing frigates, two steam and four sailing sloops-of-war, fifteen steam gun-boats, five ships and six schooners, besides several captured steamers, which have been fitted up as gunboats, making a total of thirty-five vessels, mounting three hundred and seventy-five guns, and manned by five thousand five hundred seamen. These vessels are at present blockading fourteen ports—four on the coast of Florida, one in Alabama, two in Mississippi, six in Louisiana, and three in Texas—besides cruising along the coast between Key West and Mexico.

We again have a rumor from Norfolk to the effect that Savannah had been abandoned by the rebels and occupied by the federal forces. The rumor is generally believed in Norfolk, although the rebel authorities refuse to make any revelations.

Despatches from Louisville state that our forces have taken possession of Cumberland Gap and Russellville. The former place is one of the most important points in the South, in consequence of the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad running a few miles south of it, and also because it is in the region of Tennessee where the Union sentiment is most prevalent. The despatches leave us in the dark as to the number of our troops and the commanders engaged.

The Charleston Courier, of the 17th inst., has the following:—"With deep regret we learn that General Beauregard is sick, in Nashville, of typhoid fever or sore throat. We understand that prayers were offered up in our several churches, yesterday, commending him to the Divine protection."

A telegraphic despatch from Washington informs us that the rebel pickets have been withdrawn from Occoquan, on the lower Potomac. The cause for this sudden movement is unknown.

Gen. C. F. Smith, a Pennsylvanian, and second in command at Fort Donelson, is to be made a major-general of volunteers, for the bravery and soldierly qualities he displayed at the battle. A correspondent says that the most brilliant charge in the entire siege of Fort Donelson was that of the Second and Fourth Iowa, and the Eleventh and Twenty-fifth Indiana, under the command of Gen. C. F. Smith, who led them in person, amid a storm of balls and bullets, and cheered them through all the terrible strife. He even rode his horse upon the breastworks, and for fifteen minutes exposed himself as a target to every one of the passing messengers of death. That he was not killed or wounded is something marvellous, for the brave soldiers were falling all around him. This was the decisive action of the battle.

The Chicago Times, speaking of Fort Donelson, says, that no further details come to hand, the more conspicuous is the bravery of the Union troops. But few of them had been under fire before, probably none of them had been in pitched battle, and all had learned but little of the military discipline which is supposed to make the regular a better soldier than the volunteer. All were volunteers; none were regulars. With these facts in the account, some of the fighting surpassed any of that at Waterloo or upon the fields of the Crimea. The people of Illinois and of the Northwest will feel no proud of their State and their section hereafter than they ever have before.

General Mitchell, with 50,000 troops, was, at last accounts, thirty miles south of Bowling Green, and within thirty miles of Nashville, with a good turnpike road between him.

Nashville, the capital of Tennessee, and one of the boasted strongholds of rebellion, has been occupied by our troops.

There would seem to be some truth in the rumored rebel intention of evacuating Manassas, which came to us from credible sources a few days since. Mr. George W. Walker, of Waynesburg, Pennsylvania, one of the released Union prisoners, states that he has learned upon good authority that an order had been issued for the Withdrawal of all but thirty thousand troops from Manassas. The railroads leading to Kentucky, North Carolina, and Tennessee were thronged with troops, and the number leaving Manassas had been about five regiments per day for some time past. Troops were also being sent to North Carolina to resist the advance of Burnside—mostly the North Carolina regiments from Manassas.

Severe Censure of the Rebel Government.—The Richmond Whig of Friday has a letter article on Davis' Administration. It says: "Judging by the results so far, it is the most lamentable failure in history, and suggests to the reflecting mind that the most signal service which that government can now render to the country is the surrender of the helm to abler and better hands.

"In view of the past, the present, and probable future, the pageant of to-morrow is a bitter mockery and a miserable compensation for the ruin of a free people. A child with a bauble, an old man with a young wife, are partial illustrations of the deplorable folly."

GERMANY A QUARTER OF A CENTURY AGO

At home on the mountain, my heart as I greet
We peep at the wide world, we see the out
Of the great Global, and feel out the crowd

Munster being a cathedral city, was the residence of his princely grace (seiner furstlichen Gnaden) the lord bishop of the district. The certain shade of this dignitary was an imposing edifice called the palace of the prince-bishop; but his spiritual domain extended far and wide over many leagues of space, and embraced many thousands of devoted adherents to the church of Rome. Within the limits of this domain his rule was supreme and unquestioned; for the light-hearted, unthinking populace, firmly believed that his grace was a legitimate representative of St. Peter, who had a right, if need be, to call upon them even to shed their blood in defence of their spiritual mother. At least such a declaration was frequently made, as it could be made with perfect safety, in a region where Protestant neighbors were so few and far between, that even in Munster there could be found only one little scattered flock of adherents to the Augsburg Confession. Such was, indeed, the fact; but it was not the result of violence; it was not brought about by an exercise of despotic power using its iron heel to crush the truth. On the contrary, not only since the time of "the thirty years' war," but throughout a period reaching beyond the Reformation itself, the church of Rome had so effectually spread her wing over this large district of country, as almost to prevent the introduction of anything like a Protestant element.

How far this state of things might have had any influence upon the public morals, or upon the spiritual condition of those who dwelt in Munster, I was about to learn from the unquestionable evidence of eyes and ears. It was evidence derived from Sabbath day scenes and incidents, of which I was compelled to have personal knowledge, because the second day of my sojourn in this stronghold of Romanism proved to be the last Sabbath in Advent. Thus the season bordered, as it were, upon the blessed festival of the Saviour's incarnation, when there was some reason, at least, to anticipate such an expression of popular feeling as might indicate the religious character of the community. How far this anticipation was realized, in a form and a degree cheering to a Christian heart, others may infer, as well as they can, from the tenor of this narrative.

At an early hour in the morning of that last Sabbath in Advent—it may have been two hours before the break of day in that northern latitude—the bells of every church in the city rang their peals to summon the people to early mass. This was pleasant enough; for there was rich music in the tone of the bells—music whose effect was greatly deepened by the solemnity of the hour, and by the death-like quiet of the city. Then came the clatter of wooden shoes, and the pattering of busy feet upon the rough pavement, as obedient worshippers hastened to perform their devotions. Onward they went; and it was no violation of gospel charity to wish them God-speed, as they went upon their sacred errand to the sanctuary, where they had been taught to worship the God of their fathers.

So far, I repeat, the impression was pleasant enough, even upon the mind of one whose hours of repose had been interrupted. But it was soon spoiled, if not dissipated, by other circumstances and incidents, which developed themselves in rapid succession. My opposite neighbor was a gun-maker, no doubt fond of his employment, and zealous in his calling. He, like others, had been roused from his slumbers by the early morning-bells; but when he rose, he rose to work, and not to pray. Sabbath or no Sabbath, it made no difference to him; for, by the light of his dim lamp, he began to ply his rattling hammer, and continued to do so for not less than one live-long hour. The noise of the hammer was then exchanged for the dull thrumming sound of the machine which he was using to bore the barrel of a rifle; the man all the while keeping up a vocal accompaniment to the music of the workshop. Next door to the gun-maker was the abode of an honest tinker, who was not slow to leave his bed, and imitate the example of his industrious neighbor. Whether his skill was employed upon tin-pan, kettle, or platter, I cannot say, because I could not see. But it was skill combined with such unwearied industry, as gave no rest to the muscles of the workman, and allowed no morning's nap to the drowsy inmates of the neighborhood. To this was added the heavier pounding, and the deeper bass-notes sent forth by the hammer of a blacksmith, whose smithy was invisible, although located somewhere in the background. What a trio of artisans! What a concord (shall I say discord) of sounds to salute the ears and break the rest of those who were packed under feather beds in the hotel of Mein Herr Gastwirth Tinchaus!

Slowly the day began to dawn; but with its dawning there was a renewal of every noise, and every sound, both of trade and business, without a single exception, that had been heard upon the previous day. The butcher, the baker, the milk-man, the rag-man, the dust-man, all announced their approach, as they began to pursue their daily rounds. After these had disappeared, there was heard the odd low tooting sound of a ram's-horn blown, as it appeared, by the swine-herd of the district. This was, indeed, a novelty in regard both to the quality of the music, and the occupation of the performer. But it was no fiction, no shadowy unreal dream of the night. The man was a true and living specimen of the genus homo, a lout in figure, blowzy in hair, and dirty in face; but he was a man whose duty it was, at an appointed hour every day, in rain and in sunshine, to march through his district with sober pace, and blow his horn at every thoroughfare. As he marched and blew, responsive notes of sympathy greeted him upon every hand, in the shape of squeals and grunts, such as indicate the musical taste and the musical ability of swine. Cunning brutes! notwithstanding their sharp snouts and long dangling ears, well they knew that the blast of the horn proclaimed liberty to captives, and the opening of doors to every greedy inmate of the sty! Nor did they rest until they were all turned loose into the street, to be driven to the rooting-ground, where they were permitted to enjoy the luxury of a daily riot in the open field.

Next came the goose-herd, without horn or pipe, but with a sharp call or cry, which I cannot describe. His business was to gather into one flock all the geese of the neighborhood, and drive them in stately dignity to the common, where they were accustomed to hold their daily conclave, discuss their daily wranglings, and fight their daily battles. To gather them together was easy enough; but to keep the peace among the noisy, jealous rabble was a task that would have defied a score of goose-herds. Screams and hisses, thumps and blows with resounding wings, marked every step of their progress, as they pattered along the dirty streets.

This occurred about nine o'clock in the morning, at which hour the bells of all the churches in the city again rang forth their peals, to announce the Haupt kirche, or principal religious service of the day. But, apart from the fact that some well dressed people were quietly making their way to the house of God, there was little or nothing to indicate to a stranger that this was the Sabbath of the Lord, the day of sacred rest. Almost without an exception, every store was open, as upon any other day of the week; every mart and place of business was occupied by some of the votaries of trade; upon the right and upon the left, the busy fingers of the artisan plied their ordinary work. So far as eye and ear could judge, there was no rest any where, until about one o'clock, or a little later, when it became apparent that men, women, and children were about to indulge themselves with a holiday. Various signs indicated that they had retired to wash their faces, to comb their hair, to don their Sunday clothes, and prepare for a Sunday ramble.

Soon the streets began to swarm with merry-hearted pedestrians, some of whom strolled to the beer-houses, and the winter gardens; while others were contented to snuff the sweet air on the promenade grounds constructed up on the summit of the ramparts. While thus rambling a merry party of boys and girls will come to a spot of older growth, soon fell in with a ship-shod, tatterdemalion, who was seated upon a dismounted carronade, thrumming a hardy gaudy. The shrewd rogue in a twinkling penetrated the mood of his auditors; and he at once opened with a Burschen song, that was received with shouts of wild delight. Its introductory strain must serve as a specimen of the whole.

Ich bin der ganzen V running
In einem fort studirt
Denn sey nun auch der Mashmitteg
Dem literatoff dedicirt

In study's hum drum round did I
The live-long morning plod;
But for this afternoon, good bye!
The beer stuff to my god!

In one respect the hit was a happy one, for it struck the exact vein that was giving impulse to the light-hearted crowd. But I think it very probable that the ragged performer received more applause than pennies, in return for his song.

As the crowd moved on, the next attraction was the person and the music of a melancholy aryan-grinder, a true representative of this particular race of musicians. The man had come out to do his grinding, and earn his pennies upon the Sabbath day, because the prudent city fathers, by solemn vote and binding ordinance, had forbidden him and all others of his class to come out upon any other day. Such had been their decree, because they were not willing that the good people of Munster, fascinated by such an attraction, should desert their workshops, and gaze out of their windows, or stand gaping in their door-ways. Hence, the grinder came forth according to law and statute, duly established and recorded. He displayed no chattering ape, no learned monkey arrayed in a scarlet doublet and dignified by a three-cornered chapeau; nor were such attractive appendages needful. It was quite sufficient that he had himself, his organ, and his music, to tickle the ears of those Sunday revellers, and bring into his cap an ample supply of creutzers. But I must draw this sketch to a close. In so doing let it suffice for me to add, that the evening of that Sabbath day in Munster witnessed more than one crowded ball-room, and at least one crowded theatre.

THE FRUITS OF FREEDOM IN THE WEST INDIA ISLANDS.

Mr. Gurney, a member of the Society of Friends who travelled through the West Indies in 1840, has published the result of his investigation.

In Dominica, he found the Negroes manifesting great anxiety for instruction—a thing that cannot be said of English peasantry. One day, he observes, "The people gathered around us, and a woman came forward on behalf of the company, to beg for a school. 'We are hungry for a school,' said she; 'we are tired of waiting for it.' Nor were these idle words; for the people on this and a neighboring property had agreed to subscribe eight dollars per month in part payment of a teacher. Nothing, indeed, can be more eager than the desire of the Negroes of Dominica for education; they seem determined to obtain it; and it is gratifying to know that the efforts now making for the purpose are at once considerable and successful. There are nearly seven hundred scholars in the four Moravian schools, which are ably conducted, and being quite clear of any peculiar religious bias, are acceptable to the whole population." This forms an agreeable piece of information. In Dominica, a majority of the lower house in the legislature is composed of colored persons, and the same class of persons are now eligible as jurors, both in this and other islands: it becomes absolutely necessary that the people should, by means of instruction, be prepared for performing these functions with propriety. Another circumstance which fell under Mr Gurney's notice at Dominica deserves to be more widely known. During slavery, it was below the dignity of any free person to labour in the fields; and all who could do so preferred to live in idleness rather than work. The abolition of slavery has removed this detestable plea for living in a state of slothful indulgence. It is now quite respectable to work: labor in the fields is not discreditable. This indicates an important social improvement. In speaking of Jamaica, Mr. Gurney shows that a coffee estate which he visited is now conducted at a much cheaper rate than during slavery, when the planters were obliged to support not only the actual workers, but all the young, old, sick, and idle. The owner of the estate in question described the two different conditions of affairs as follows:—"One hundred and seventy slaves, or apprentices, used to be supported on this estate. Now our friend employs fifty four free labourers, who work for him four days in the week, taking one day for their provision grounds and another for market. This is all the labour that he requires in order to keep up his former extent of cultivation. And willingly did he acknowledge the superior advantage which attends the present system. The saving of expense is obvious.

"I understood our friend to allow that the average cost of supporting a slave was £5 sterling per annum.

170 slaves at £5 per annum, is	£850 00 0
Now he pays 54 free labourers is 6d per week, one day's labor being set off against rent for 50 weeks, two weeks being allowed for holidays,	607 10 0
Saving under freedom,	£242 10 0

THE RISE OF AMERICAN UNITY.

As detached colonies, the thirteen communities, on this side of the Atlantic, existed before the Revolution, and thus detached they would have remained colonies to this hour, and, so far as any power of self-deliverance was concerned, would have remained colonies forever.

The Spirit of American Liberty was, of necessity, a Spirit of American Unity.

"Before the Revolution each colony was a distinct community, with its own separate political organization, and without any power of legislation for any but its own inhabitants; as political communities, and upon the principles of their organization, they possessed no power of forming any union among themselves, for any purpose whatever, without the sanction of the Crown or Parliament of England."(1) This was assumed throughout in England, and admitted without dispute in the colonies.

"The free and independent power of forming a union among themselves, for objects and purposes common to them all, which was denied to their colonial condition by the principle of the English Constitution, was one of the chief powers asserted and developed by the Revolution." A Union was a presupposition to liberty and independence. Our Union, in its generic principle, is not the child of our liberty, or of our independence, but its mother. Without that Union there would have been no state's rights to maintain; no rights to be claimed, and no states to have rights.

Hence, the prevailing feeling of the noblest men in these colonies, at the commencement of the Revolution, was an AMERICAN feeling. In the instructions embraced in the credentials of the delegates from South Carolina to the first Continental Congress, it was defined as their duty to consider certain acts passed and bills depending in Parliament which "affect the whole continent of AMERICA—the grievances under which AMERICA labors."

When Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, President of the First Congress, and re-elected President of the Second, suddenly died in Philadelphia, October 23d, 1775, Richard Henry Lee wrote to Washington, on the day after his death, that "to him AMERICAN Liberty lost a powerful advocate."

The credentials of the delegates to the new Continental Congress, which assembled at Philadelphia, May 10th, 1775, conferred on them authority to adopt measures to "recover and establish American rights, and redress American grievances."

When the Congress assembled, civil war had actually commenced, for, be it remembered, that our Revolution was as distinctly and as fearfully a civil war, as is the present one. This Congress was the organ of united resistance. The first practical illustration of this was given when the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts, immediately after the battle of Lexington, applied to it for direction and assistance. While they informed the Continental Congress of the force they had raised, and the proposal they had made to the other New England colonies, "they suggested that an AMERICAN Army ought forthwith to be raised for the common cause." This application, with one from the city and county of New York, caused Congress at once to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to "take into consideration the state of AMERICA."

These proceedings were soon followed by another application on the part of the Provincial Convention of Massachusetts, in which they offer to "submit to such general plan as the Congress might direct for the colonies, or to endeavor to form such a government for themselves, as should promote the UNION and interest of THE WHOLE COUNTRY."

Placed in this manner at the head of American affairs, the Continental Congress proceeded at once to put the country in a state of defence, and virtually assumed a control over the military co-operations of all the colonies. The army was to be known and designated as the American Continental Army, and to be paid by the Continent.

PERFUMES.

The chief places for the growth of the sweet perfume-producing flowers are Montpellier, Grasse, Nismes, Savoy, Cannes, and Nice. Nice alone produces a harvest of a hundred thousand pounds of orange-blossoms, and Cannes as much again, and of a finer odor. Five hundred pounds of orange-blossoms yield about two pounds of pure Neroly oil. At Cannes the acacia thrives particularly well, and produces yearly about nine thousand pounds of blossoms. One great perfumery distillery at Cannes uses yearly about one hundred and forty thousand pounds of orange blossoms, twenty thousand pounds of acacia flowers, a hundred and forty thousand pounds of rose leaves, thirty-two thousand pounds of jessamine blossoms, twenty thousand pounds of violets, and eight thousand pounds of tuberoses together with a great many other sweet herbs. The extraction of the real oils, the small quantities of which are mixed in the flowers with such large quantities of other vegetable juices that it requires about six hundred pounds of rose leaves to win one ounce of otto of roses, of course, demands a very careful treatment.

Nice and Cannes are the paradise of violets, producing annually something like thirteen thousand pounds of blossoms. The variety cultivated is generally the double or Parma violet, which is so productive that the flowers are sold at about five pence per pound; and we all know what sort of bouquet a pound of violets would make.

The abundance in Sicily of every flower which in our climate is most highly prized, recalls the traveller in the story, who arrived in a country where the children played at pitch-and-toss and marbles with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and other precious gems: "These are, doubtless, the sons of some powerful king," he said, and bowed respectfully before them. The children, laughing, made him perceive that they were the street-boys, and that the gems were only the pebbles of that country. In Sicily the crimson granade and rose-trees, the peach-colored rhododendrons, and the delicate white camellias, form the country hedges. The white and green myrtles, and pink, white, and flame-shaped and flame-colored tulips, grow wild. When a pleasure-garden is made, the orange and lemon-trees are taken out, because they are too common. By the same rule, very few people trouble themselves with flowers—they are too vulgar. Alphonse Karr was much surprised to notice that the ladies of Nice never decorated themselves with real flowers, but seemed to dislike them. He observes this is all the more strange in a country where it is no longer a mythological flattery to say that flowers spring from under the ladies' feet. The roses, violets, jessamine, and mignonette are cultivated only by the peasants for perfumery purposes, and honored but as we honor potatoes or cabbages.

We are now wholly dependent for our finest perfumes on France, so that when the crop of flower fails, as did that of the jessamine last year, it will put the manufacturers to serious inconvenience. It would, therefore, be the interest of perfumers to promote the production of these flowers in other countries; and the high price they fetch in market would make it a very profitable speculation. It has been proposed to cultivate flowers in England on a large scale for perfumery purposes, but the climate renders the scheme totally impracticable. For English flowers, however beautiful in form or color, do not possess the intensity of odor required for extraction; and the greater part of those used in the south of France for perfumery would grow here only in hot houses. The one flower which might be had in abundance would be the rose, but the smell of it is very faint compared with that of the southern rose. Add to this the shortness of the flowering season, and the high price of land and labor, and it may be safely said that the cultivation in England of flowers for perfumery would prove as bad a speculation as attempting to make wine from English grapes.

The most widely known of the toilet-waters having an alcoholic basis is the eau-de-Cologne, invented in the last century by an apothecary in Cologne. It can, however, be made just as well anywhere else, as all the materials come from the south of France and Italy. Its perfume consists principally of the flowers, leaves and rind, of the fruit of the bitter orange-tree.—All the Year Round.

FIGS.

Medical men were divided in opinion as to the merits of this fruit. It was considered indigestible; but, to remedy that, almonds were recommended to be eaten with it! The Romans, perhaps, were wiser, who took pepper with them, as we do with melon; and Dr. Madden says that we would never eat figs at all, if we could only spend half an hour in Smyrna and see them pack. So, as I have before said, a sight of the kitchen just before dinner, would take away appetite; but as people do not commonly go to Smyrna, or sit with their cooks, why, figs and dinner will continue to be eaten. Modern professors have resembled ancient philosophers in an uncontrollable appetite for figs. Who has not heard of the famous Oxford fig, which in its progress to fourteen maturity, was protected by an inscription appended to it, conveying information to the effect that "this is the Principal's fig!" which a daring undergraduate one day devoured, and added insult to injury by changing the old placard for one on which was written, "A fig for the Principal!"—Dr. Beaumont.

CEMENT FOR PORCELAIN, MARBLE, ALABASTER, AND GLASS.

Take of isinglass two drachms, wet it with water, and allow it to stand until softened, then add as much proof spirit as will rather more than cover it, and dissolve with a moderate heat. Take of gum mastic one drachm; dissolve it in two or three drachms of rectified spirit. Mix the two solutions, and stir in one drachm of gum ammoniacum in a fine powder and rubbed down, with a little water. Keep the cement in a bottle. When required for use place the bottle in warm water, and apply the cement with a stick or small hard brush to the china previously warmed. Compress the pieces firmly together until cold, taking care to make the contact perfect, and using a very thin layer of cement.

A GOLDEN GUN.

When lately visiting the Tower of London, and poking at the guns, &c., beneath the shade of the "keep," I was shown a great gun, which the wardens informed me and the other visitors was made of gold and other precious metal. I was also informed that the Jews had offered £20,000 for it, while twelve inches had been cut off, sent to Birmingham and when melted was found to be worth £8,000. I may as well state that inscriptions on the gun tell us that it was "founded by Mahomed, son of Hemseh Allah;" that it was made by the order of Sultan Solyman, son of Selim, for an invasion of India in the year of the Hegira, 957 (A. D. 1550); and that it was taken at the capture of Aden, January, 1839, by the expedition under command of Captain H. Smith, C. B. of H. S. Voyager.—Notes and Queries.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Daniel Webster once wrote, after continued provocation, to the editor of a newspaper, which referred to his private character, and especially to his not paying his debts. He said substantially: "It is true that I have not always paid my debts punctually, and that I owe money. One cause of this is, that I have not pressed those who owe me for payment. As an instance of this, I enclose your father's note, made to me thirty years ago, for money lent him to educate his boys."

When he was a boy, he found in a neighboring town a pocket handkerchief upon which something was printed. He had only a quarter of a dollar, which was the price of the handkerchief, and he bought it. Late that evening, by the light of the kitchen fire, he sat reading, studying, committing to memory, the matter printed on the handkerchief. What do you think it was? It was the Constitution of the United States! This was the first time he had read that great charter of our liberties, and of which he was the most able expounder and defender of his time.

THE POWER OF SHORT WORDS.

The late Professor Addison Alexander, D. D., is the author of this remarkable composition, which appeared in the Princeton Magazine:—

MONOSYLLABICS.

Think not that strength lies in the big round word,
Or that the brief and plain must needs be weak,
To whom can this be true who once has heard
The cry for help, the tongue that 's all unable speak,
When want, or woe, or fear is in the throat,
So that each word gasped out is like a shriek
Pressed from the sore heart, or a strange wild note,
Sung by some fay or fiend. There is a strength
Which dies if stretched too far, or spun too fine,
Which has more height than breadth; more depth than length—
Let but this force of thought and speech be mine,
And he that will may take the sleek, fat phrase,
Which glows and burns not, though it gleam and shine—
Light, but no heat—a flash, but not a blaze!

Nor is it more strength that the short word boasts,
It serves of more than fight or storm to tell,
The roar of waves that clash on the bound coasts,
The crash of tall trees when the wild wind swells,
The roar of guns, the groans of men that die
On blood-stained fields. It has a voice as well
For them that far off on their sick beds lie;
For them that weep, for them that mourn the dead;
For them that laugh, and dance, and clap the hand;
To joy a quick step, as well as grief's slow tread,
The sweet, plain words we learnt at first keep time.
And though the theme be sad, or gay, or grand,
With each, with all, these may be made to chime,
In thought, or speech, or song, in prose or rhyme.

AGASSIZ

Prof. Agassiz, in his article entitled "Methods of Study in Natural History," in the January number of the "Atlantic Monthly," speaks with great modesty of his labors in the cause of science. He says of himself: "I have devoted my whole life to the study of nature, and yet a single sentence may express all I have done. I have shown that there is a correspondence between the succession of fishes in geological times and the different stages of their growth in the egg. That is all."

STREET SALTING.

At the recent meeting of the Commissioners of Health two affidavits were presented relative to the salting of streets. Lucius A. White, Superintendent of the horses of the Avenue A Stage Line, testified that last winter, out of 130 horses, they had between 20 and 30 horses laid up with frozen feet. One of the animals had his feet fall off, three were perfectly useless, and had to be given away; many were laid up for months. This year, no salt having been used on the road, the horses are in excellent condition.

Thomas Murphy, Superintendent of the horses on the Harlem River Railroad, testified that during the last winter he had over 70 horses lame from the effects of salt, that they were lame from ten days to one year; that fifteen of them died, and four had to be killed, their feet having fallen off. This year salt had not been used on the road, and the horses were in good condition.

A SCOTTISH MINISTER'S MAN.

A "minister's man"—one of a class of persons of whom many anecdotes are told—was following the minister from the manse to the kirk on Sabbath afternoon, when the minister, glancing back, perceived a smile on the face of his old attendant. "What makes you laugh, James? it is unseemly. What is there to amuse you?" "Oh, nothing particular," says James; "I was only thinking o' something that happened this forenoon." "What is that? Tell me what it was." "Weel, minister, dinna be angry wi' me; but ye ken the congregation here are whiles no pleased to get auld sermons frae you, and this morning I got the better of the kirk session ony way." "And how was that, Jamie?" says the minister. "Deed, sir, when we came out o' the kirk this forenoon, I heaved what they were thinking; and says I, 'Eh, but you canna ca' that an auld sermon this day, for it's no' abune six weeks since you heard it last.'"

A CHEROKEE young preacher once asked Dr. Emmons how he liked his sermon. The doctor (then ninety years old) rose from his chair, protruded his cheeks, inflated his chest, gave a significant puff, and then sat down without saying a word. To another young man he said, "Your sermon was too much like Seekonk Plain, long and level." When he heard a licentiate's sermon that went over the whole catechism, he inquired, "Young friend, do you ever expect to preach again?" "Yes, sir; I hope to." "Well, if you do, what in the world will you preach about?"

A SENSIBLE REMARK.

Duval, the famous Austrian librarian, was once consulted upon a subject of which he was not wholly the master, by one of whose ignorance he was well aware. "I do not know," was his frank response. "Do not know!" answered the intruder, "the Emperor pays you for knowing." "The Emperor pays me for what I know," said Duval. "If he paid me for what I do not know, the whole treasury of his kingdom would not suffice."

Family Circle.

SIN—FALSEHOOD.

I often say to a child that has been guilty of falsehood and will not confess it:—"You do not at all believe in God," and then continue to converse with it. The child is frightened because it has been accustomed so lightly to regard a mere knowledge of God and faith in God as one thing.

The declaration—"Thou believest not in God," is fully true. Where is our faith in God's declaration?—"Thou shalt not lie!" Where our faith in the truth "that God looks into the heart?" Where our faith in the doctrine:—"that God will punish?" If our faith were characterized by "not doubting what we do not see," lying could not have a place. Were faith before the lie, lying would be surely impossible. Were it after the lie, confession, sorrow, prayer, watchfulness, would necessarily follow.

To enforce truth like this upon children whilst going to school is very important. It is this period of life which so much promotes the corruption of the heart. Lying, revenge, theft and hypocrisy are usually developed. Children are thus brought to feel what faith in God is, and it is only where this feeling is rightly awakened, that instruction concerning faith can be properly appreciated.

Translation from Stiaeri.

THE COURTESIES OF LIFE

William Wirt's letter to his daughter, on the "small sweet courtesies of life," contains a passage from which a deal of happiness might be learned.

"I want to tell you a secret. The way to make yourself pleasing to others is to show them that you care for them. The whole world is like the tanner at Marshfield, "who cared for nobody—no, not he—because nobody cared for him." And the world would serve you so, if you gave them the same cause. Let every one, therefore, see that you do care for them, by showing them what Sterne so happily calls the small courtesies in which there is no parade, whose voice is still to tease, and which manifest themselves by tender and affectionate looks, and little kind acts of attention, giving others the preference in every little enjoyment at the table, in the field, walking, sitting, or standing."

THE BOY AND THE WOLF.

When I was a boy I lived among the green mountains of Vermont; in winter making snowforts, and sliding down the steep hills, and in summer and autumn wandering over the mountains after flowers or nuts, or catching the beautiful trout from the brooks. But my brother in Wisconsin wrote me to come to him, and I went. Our house was then on what was called "Baxter's Prairie." The prairie was covered with flowers, and the many clear lakes around abounded in fish and ducks; but our principal food was "hoe-cake" and salt pork.

One of our neighbors had had no meat for a long time, and getting out of powder, they had no game; so one day they sent up their oldest son, a boy about ten years old, for a piece of pork. As he was carrying it homewards, and going through a piece of woods by "Silver lake," he heard a rustling of the leaves in a thicket by the roadside. He stopped and listened—all was still. Again he pushed forward, again the leaves rustled behind him, and he thought he heard a stealthy step. Again he stopped; everything was still except the gentle dash of the waves upon the pebbly beach, and the rapid beating of his own heart. He dreaded to go forward, and dared not stay, for he saw night was approaching, when the woods always echoed with the howl of the hungry wolf, and the savage bear and stealthy catamount came out from their dens. So picking up a club, he again started homeward. Again came the stealthy step behind him, nearer and nearer, until he saw a gaunt and ravage wolf creeping after him, and as he hurried on, still clinging to his meat, the wolf was coming nearer and nearer, and might at any moment spring upon him.

Still, the boy, though he trembled in every limb, did not lose his presence of mind. He remembered having heard his father say that if any one faced a wild animal and looked it square in the eye, it would not dare to attack him. He turned around and faced the hungry wolf and commenced walking backwards towards his home, still a long mile and a half away. As the woods grew darker the wolf came nearer, showing his white teeth, with the hair bristling upon his back. The courageous boy knew that if he gave up his piece of pork, he was safe, and could run home unmolested, but he knew there were hungry ones at home awaiting his return. So backwards he went, step by step. As the wolf came near, he hit him square upon the head with a stone, when with an angry "yelp," the wolf sprang into the thicket, and set up a long and dismal howl. The boy listened to hear if there were any answering howls, and hearing none took courage; but soon the savage beast, maddened with hunger, came at him again. With his club he gave him a well-directed blow between the eyes, which sent him bowling back again into the thicket. Again and again was the contest renewed; many times did the savage, yet cowardly animal make a spring at the lad, and many times did the brave boy beat him off, until at last he came near the log-cabin of his parents, when the disappointed wolf, with a long and wailing howl, dashed away into the woods. Trembling with excitement, and wet with perspiration, the boy dropped the meat upon the floor, crying, "Mother, I've got it; mother, I've got it," and fell exhausted at his mother's feet.

"I don't believe that," says Harry, "we'd all have run, and so would nine men out of ten. I do not believe there ever was a boy so brave as that." Yet the story is true, boys, if it does seem a pretty large one. I can give you the boy's name.

A BEAUTIFUL ANSWER

A little girl in Yorkshire, once, when water was scarce, saved as much rain water as she could, and sold it to the washer-women for a cent a bucket, and in this way cleared near five dollars for the missionary society. When she brought it to the secretary, she was not willing to tell her name. "But I must put down where the money came from," said he. "Call it, then," replied the little girl, "rain from heaven."

THE LITTLE BOY THAT DIED.

I am all alone in my chamber now,
And the midnight hour is near,
And the fagot's crack and the clock's dull tick
Are the only sounds I hear.
And over my soul in its solitude,
Sweet feelings of sadness glide;
For my heart and my eyes are full when I think
Of the little boy that died.

I went one night to my father's house—
Went home to the dear ones all—
And softly I opened the garden gate,
And softly the door of the hall;
My mother came out to meet her son;
She kissed me and then she sighed;
And her head fell on my neck, and she wept
For the little boy that died.

I shall miss him when the flowers come,
In the garden where he played;
I shall miss him more by the fireside,
When the flowers are all decayed;
I shall see his toys and his empty chair,
And the horse he used to ride;
And they will speak with a silent speech,
Of the little boy that died.

We shall go home to our Father's house—
To our Father's house in the skies,
Where the hopes of our souls shall have no blight,
Our love no broken ties;
We shall roam on the banks of the river of peace,
And bathe in the blissful tide;
And one of the joys of our life shall be
The little boy that died.

"I WAIT FOR THEE."

There are few of our readers who are not familiar with Mrs. Hewitt's sweet domestic poem, beginning—

"The clock is on the stroke of six,
The father's work is done;
Sweep up the hearth, and mend the fire,
And put the kettle on."

In the same spirit, if not in fact in imitation of it, are the following lines, which are full of the music and melody of home;

The hearth is swept, the fire is bright,
The kettle sings for tea;
The cloth is spread, the lamps are light,
The hot cakes smoke in napkins white,
And now I wait for thee.

Come home, love, home—thy task is done;
The [illegible]
The warm chair to the fireside drawn,
The boy is on my knee.

Come home, love, home—his deep, fond eye
Looks round him wistfully,
And when the whispering winds go by,
As if thy welcome step were nigh,
He crows exultingly.

In vain; he finds the welcome vain,
And turns his glance on mine
So earnestly, that yet again
His form unto my heart I strain—
That glance is so like thine.

Thy task is done—we miss thee here;
Where'er thy footsteps roam,
No heart will spread such kindly cheer,
No beating heart, no listening ear,
Like these will wait thee home.

At last along the crisp walk fast
That well-known step doth come;
The bolt is drawn, the gate is past,
The babe is wild with joy at last—
A thousand welcomes home!

Selections.

CO-EXISTENCE OF THE TWO RACES AFTER EMANCIPATION.

BY COUNT DE GASPARIN.

Something more difficult to foresee than the suppression, henceforth certain, of slavery is the consequence of this suppression. The problem of the coexistence of the two races rests at the present hour with a crushing weight on the thoughts of all; it mingles poignant doubts with the hopes of some, it exasperates the resistance of others. Is it true that emancipation would be the signal of a struggle for extermination? Is there not room upon American soil for free blacks by the side of free whites? I do not conceal from myself that there is here an accredited prejudice, an admitted opinion which, perhaps more than any thing else, trammels the progress of the United States. Let us attempt to estimate it.

M. de Tocqueville, who has judged America with so sure an eye, has been, notwithstanding, mistaken upon some points; his warmest admirers must admit it. Writing at an epoch when the great results of English emancipation had not yet been produced, he was led to frame that formidable judgment of which so much advantage has been taken: "Hitherto, wherever the whites have been the more powerful, they have held the negroes in degradation and slavery; wherever the negroes have been the more powerful, they have destroyed the whites. This is the only account which can ever be opened between the two races."

Another account is opened, thank God, and no one will rejoice at it more sincerely than M. de Tocqueville—he who is so generous, and whose abolition sentiments are certainly no mystery to any of his colleagues of the Chamber. But his opinion remains in his book, and every one repeats after him, that the blacks and the whites cannot live together on the same soil, unless the latter be subject to the former.

I repeat, that at the time at which he wrote, he had reason, or at least known facts gave him reason, to say this; the liberty of the blacks had then but one name—St. Domingo. To-day, the victories of Christian emancipation have come, to contrast with the catastrophes provoked by impenitent despotism.

The English Colonies bear a striking analogy to the Southern States of the Union. The blacks there are numerous, more numerous even in proportion to the whites than in the Carolinas or Florida. The climate is even more scorching, and the cultures demand still more imperiously the labors of the blacks. As to the prejudices of the masters, I dare affirm that the planters of the Continent and those of the Antilles have not long had any thing with which to reproach each other. Notwithstanding, what has happened in the Antilles? Not only has liberty been proclaimed—this was the act of the metropolis—but the coexistence of races has subsisted. It is to this point that I claim attention. They, the whites and the blacks, alike free, invested with the same privileges, exercising the same rights, encountering each other in the ranks of the militia, in the magistracy, and even in the seats of the colonial assemblies, admirably accept this life in common. And the whites there, whether, as Anglo-Saxons, that is, they belong to that race which is declared incapable of enduring free blacks in its neighborhood.

It is necessary to appeal sometimes from those axioms so boldly laid down, which serve us to make inflexible laws for that which must be subject in an infinite measure to the mobility of circumstances and influences. The influence of the Gospel, especially, is a fact, the scope of which is never sufficiently measured. It has created in the Antilles a negro population which maintains its equality face to face with the whites, yet which does not entirely reject their patronage; a dependent population which is also a free population, free in the most absolute sense of the word. The blacks of the Antilles labor on the plantations, and secure the success of large plantations; but, at the same time, they themselves become landholders, forming by degrees one of the happiest and most remarkable classes of peasants that ever existed. Their little fields, their pretty villages, manifest real prosperity; and there is something among them that is worth more than prosperity, there is moral progress, the development of intellect, and the elevation of souls.

It will be demanded of us if, in the midst of so much progress, the production of sugar has not suffered. I answer that, on the contrary, it has increased. It had been predicted that emancipation would be a death-blow to the British colonies. I suspect that many people are even yet persuaded of it; now, in spite of the faults committed by the planters, who have neglected nothing to disgust the negroes with labor and to drive them from their old mills, they are found to return to them, contenting themselves with wages that scarcely rise above an average of a shilling a day. If we compare the last two seasons of liberty with the last two years of slavery, we shall discover that the total production of sugar has increased in the colonies in which emancipation was effected in 1834. And they have not only had to endure this crisis of emancipation, but also another crisis still more formidable, that of the sudden introduction of free trade in 1854. The colonial sugars, exposed to competition with the sugar produced at Havana and elsewhere by slave labor, experienced a prodigious decline. There was cause to believe that the production was about to be destroyed; it has arisen again, notwithstanding, and the English Antilles, with their free negroes and their unprotected sugar, forced to face entire liberty in all its forms, import today into the metropolis nearly a million more hogsheads than at the moment when the crisis of free trade broke forth.

Liberty works miracles. We always distrust her, and she replies to our suspicions by benefits. The English Antilles, which, during the last thirty years, have had to surmount, besides the two crises of emancipation and free trade, the earthquake of 1840 and six consecutive years of drought; the English Antilles, which have had to liquidate their old debts, and to repair the ruin accruing from the failure of the bank of Jamaica, are now in an attitude which proves that they have no fears for the future and scarcely regret the past.

Under slavery, the Antilles were hastening to their ruin; with liberty, they have become one of the richest channels of exportation which England possesses; under slavery, they could not have supported the shock of free trade; with liberty, they have gained this new battle: such are the best proceeds of experience. If we still have doubts, let us compare Dutch Guiana, which holds slaves, to English Guiana, which has emancipated them. The resources of these two countries are almost equal; English Guiana is progressing, while the cultures of Surinam are forsaken; three-fourths of its plantations are already abandoned, and the rest will follow.

But the question of profits and losses is not the only one here, I think, and after having computed the proceeds of sugar, after having shown that in this respect English emancipation is in rule, it is allowable to mention also another kind of result. Look at those pretty cottages, this neat and almost elegant furniture, these gardens, this general air of comfort and civilization; question these blacks, whose physical appearance has become modified already under the influence of liberty, these blacks, who decreased rapidly in numbers during the epoch of slavery, and who have begun to increase, on the contrary, since their affranchisement; they will tell us that they are happy. Some have become landowners, and labor on their own account, (this is not a crime, I imagine;) others unite to strengthen large plantations, or perhaps to carry to the works of rich planters the canes gathered by them on their own grounds; some are merchants, many hire themselves out as farmers. Whatever may be the faults of some individuals, the ensemble of free negroes has merited the testimony rendered in 1857 by the Governor of Tobago: "I deny that our blacks of the country are of indolent habits. So industrious a class of inhabitants does not exist in the world."

An admirable spectacle, and one which the history of mankind presents to us too rarely, is that of a degraded population elevating itself more and more, and placing itself on a level with those who before despised it. Concubinage, so general in times of servitude as to give rise to the famous axiom, "Negroes abhor marriage," is now replaced by regular unions. In becoming free, the negroes have learned to respect themselves; the unanimous reports of the governors mark the progress of their habits of sobriety. Crimes have greatly diminished among them. They are polite and well brought up, falling even into the excess of exaggerated courtesy. They respect the aged: if an old man passes through the streets, the children rise and cease their play.

These children are assiduously sent to schools, the support of which depends, in a great part upon, the voluntary gifts of the negroes. Grateful to the Gospel which has set them free, the former slaves have become passionately attached to their pastors; their first resources are consecrated to churches, to schools, and sometimes, also, to distant missions, to the evangelization of that Africa which they remember to do it good. We should be at once surprised and humiliated, were we to compare the much-vaunted gifts of our charity with those of these poor people, these freed men of yesterday, whom we think that we may rightfully treat with disdain.

Thanks to the Gospel, and it is to this that I return, the problem of the coexistence of races is resolved in the most pacific manner in the Antilles. Among freemen, however little those freemen may be Christianized, specific repugnances become speedily effaced, and the prejudice of skin is not found to be ultimately as insurmountable as we have been told. In those English colonies which are true republics, governing themselves, and which also remind us, through this feature, of the Southern States, the blacks have come to be accepted as fellow citizens. They practise the liberal professions, they are electors and often elected, for they form of themselves alone one fifth of the Colonial Assembly at Jamaica; they are officers of the police and the militia, and their authority never fails to be recognised by all. I named Jamaica just now. Some may seek to bring it as an argument against me. The fact is, that this great island has seemed to form an exception to the general prosperity; considerable fortunes have been sunk there, and the transformation has been slower and more painful there than elsewhere. But, when they are themselves with these circumstances, they forget two things: first, that the causes of the malady were anterior to emancipation; next, that the cure has come from emancipation itself. Before emancipation, Jamaica was insolvent, her plantations were mortgaged beyond their value, and its planting was threatened in other ways far more than now. Do you know what has since happened? Difficulties which appeared insoluble have been resolved; to-day, the cape is doubled, and men navigate in peace. At the present time, Jamaica comprises two or three hundred villages, inhabited by free negroes; the latter are willing to work; for, according to the latest information, (February, 1861,) the price of daily labor decreases instead of rising. Among these free negroes, there are not less than 10,000 land holders, and three-eighths of the cultivated soil is in their hands. They have established sugar mills everywhere, imperfect, rude, yet working in a passable manner; and mills of this sort are numbered by thousands. The middle class of color thus grows richer day by day; the families that compose it all own a horse or a mule; they have their bank books and their accounts with the savings banks. Lastly, which is of more value than all else, the free negroes of Jamaica have built more than two hundred chapels, and as many schools. At the very moment when I write these lines, an enthusiastic religious movement is prevailing among them; the rum-shops are abandoned, the most degraded classes enter in their turn the path of reformation.

I should have been glad to cite our own colonies instead of confining myself to the English islands. I have been prevented from this, not only by the memory of the conflagration of 1859 at Martinique, and of the state of siege which it became necessary to proclaim there, but, above all, by the circumstances that the liberty of our former slaves has been too often restrained by means of the vagabond regulations, that labor has continued to be imposed on them to a certain point; that the parcelling out of property has been trammelled by fiscal measures; that, moreover, it is less the labor of our former slaves than of the Coolies and others employed, which has secured the success of our experiment; whence it follows that this success is far from being so conclusive as that which has been obtained elsewhere under the system of full liberty. Nevertheless, our success, which is no less real, signifies something also. If we have not yet those little free villages, that class of small negro landholders of which I just spoke, we have, like the English, free negroes in our militia and in our marine; like them, we have had our elections, and all classes of the population have taken part in them; like them, and perhaps in a greater degree, we have increased our sugar production since emancipation. It is true that the crisis of free trade has not yet passed among us, and that we cannot know how this would be supported by our colonial sugars. But it will not be long before we shall be informed on this point: by an act which we cannot but applaud, and which continues the work it has undertaken, the French government has just suppressed the protection continued hitherto to our planters. If, ere long, as it is justifiable to hope, they are delivered from the charges of the colonial system, whose advantages they have lost, we shall see them struggle, and successfully, I am convinced, against the Spanish sugars produced by slave labor.

It will be, perhaps, maintained, that the antipathy of race is stronger in the United States than elsewhere, and that the Americans, in this respect, are inferior to the English. I am as conscious as any one else of those infamous proceedings towards free negroes which are the crime of the North, a crime no less odious than that of the South. What conscience is not aroused at the thought of those prejudices of skin which do not permit blacks to sit by the side of whites, in schools, churches, or public vehicles? Only the other day, nothing less than a denunciation in open parliament was needed to begin the destruction, by a public rebuke, of the classification which is being made on the English steamers themselves between Liverpool and New York. There are some new States which purely and simply exclude free negroes from their territory; those which do not exclude them from the Territory, repulse them from the ballot-box. The injustice, in fine, is as gross, as crying as it is possible to imagine.

Must we conclude from this that the co-existence of races, possible elsewhere, is impossible in the United States? I distrust those sweeping assertions which resolve problems at one stroke; I refuse, above all, to admit as easily that iniquity must be maintained for the sole reason that it exists, and that it suffices to say: "I am thus made; what would you have? I cannot change myself," to abstract one's self from the accomplishment of the most elementary duty. To endure negroes at one's side, to respect their independence, to abstain from wrongs towards them, to consent to the full exercise of their rights, is an elementary duty; Christian duty, I need not say, demands something better.

Does this mean that we are to set ourselves up as judges, and brand as wretches all those who thus mistake the laws of charity and justice? I fear much that, in their place, we would do precisely as they. Living in the South, we would have slaves, and would defend slavery to the last; living in the North, we would tread under foot the free colored class. Is there then neither the true, nor the false, nor justice, nor injustice? God forbid! The just and the true remain; iniquity should be condemned without pity; but we are bound to be more indulgent toward men than toward things. We are bound to remember that the influence of surroundings is enormous, and that, if crimes are always without excuse, there are many excusable criminals.

When we examine men by the prejudice of skin, such as prevails in the United States, we are not long in discovering that it rests in great part on a misunderstanding: men mistake coexistence for amalgamation. I do not fear to affirm that the second would be as undesirable as the first would be desirable. Why dream of blending or assimilating the two races? Why pursue as an ideal frequent marriages between them, and the formation of a third race: that of mulattoes? America does right to resist such ideas, and to inscribe her testimony against such a future, evidently very little in conformity with the designs of God.

But coexistence by no means draws amalgamation in its train. On this point, also, experience has spoken. In the English colonies the liberty of the blacks is entire, the legal equality of the two races is not contested, public manners have shaped themselves to that mutual consideration without which they could not live together; yet neither amalgamation nor assimilation is in question, and the aristocracy of skin remains what it should be, a lasting distinction, accepted on both sides, between races which are not designed to mingle together. I do not know that many marriages are contracted between the whites and the negresses of Jamaica, and I believe that the class of mulattoes increases much more rapidly under slavery than with liberty. Look in this respect at what takes place even now in the United States: an quadroons sell better than blacks; mixtures of white or almost white slaves abound there, and the unhappy women who become [illegible] American combinations are often whipped upon command.

With liberty, each race can at least remain by itself; with it, there can be co-existence without amalgamation; both mingling and hostility can be prevented. This is the necessary, inexorable as the negroes, with the gentleness of their race, willingly accept the second place, and by no means demand what we insist on refusing them. Let their liberty be complete, let legal equality and friendly relations be maintained, and they will ask no more.

But they will ask no less, and they are right. I do not understand, in truth, why so harmless a co-existence should be so long repulsed by the enlightened people of the United States. There are negroes in Spanish America who have reached the highest grades of the army, and who show as much intelligence, decorum, and dignity to command as white men could do. I myself have seen at Paris, a clergyman of ebony blackness, who was really the most distinguished, unexceptionable man that it was possible to meet: he was a remarkable scholar, he had received the title of doctor from several European universities.

In fact, the negroes are our fellows and our equals much more than we imagine; they adapt themselves better than the Indians to our civilization. They seek to be instructed, and not only do the free blacks of the English islands hasten, as we have seen, to provide themselves with teachers, but even those of the United States, crushed as they are by contemptuous treatment, neglect no means of introducing their children into the schools, where is found one-ninth of their total number. In Liberia, they have shown themselves hitherto very capable of ruling. In Hayti, since their deliverance from the ridiculous and odious yoke of Soulouque, they have advanced rapidly, it is affirmed, in the way of true progress; legal marriages increase, popular instruction is becoming established, religious liberty is respected. Lastly, in the negro colony of Buxton, in Canada, the fugitive slaves here become industrious landholders, and are respected by all.

Let us not say that prejudice of skin is indestructible; the suppression of slavery may modify it profoundly. What degrades the free negro today, is the existence of the negro slave. To be respectable, we all need to be respected. The poor, free negro is ashamed of himself; he dares not aspire to any thing noble and great; he preserves, besides, as the legacy of slavery, the idea that labor is dishonoring, that idleness is a sign of independence. This is enough to make him remain a stranger to honorable occupations, and confine himself to the practice of vile trades. When slavery shall have disappeared, the situation of the free blacks will become quite different: they will be numerous; they will have an appreciable share in the regulation of national affairs; their vote will count, and, thenceforth, we may be tranquil, no one will be afraid to treat them with respect, and perhaps to pay court to them.

The law of New York, as well as the supreme Court of that State, has already admitted that color exercises no influence over the rights of citizens. The time draws near when the North will no longer contest the intervention of free negroes at the ballot-box. This will be a great step in advance. Let us remark, moreover, that, after general emancipation, the black population, while exercising its share of influence, will never be able, through the number of suffrages at its disposal, to alarm the jealous susceptibility of the whites; the latter, in fact, will be continually recruited by European immigration, and the day will come when the few negroes of the United States will be scarcely perceptible in the heart of a gigantic nation.

The honor of the North is at stake; it belongs to it to give an example at this time, and to show, by the reform of its own habits, that it has the right to combat the crime of the South. It must set to work seriously, resolutely, to resolve the problem of the coexistence of races, while the South resolves, willing or unwilling, the problem of emancipation. Liberty in the South, equality in the North; the one is no less necessary than the other; it may even be said that one great obstacle to the idea of emancipation is this other idea that blacks and whites cannot live together, but that one must some day exterminate the other.

Why suffer the establishment of this lying axiom which checks all progress? Why not cast our eyes on the neighboring colonies where the prejudice of color reigned supremely before emancipation, and where it has since become rapidly effaced. The United States have a lofty end to attain; let them beware how they take too low an aim! They will not have more than they need, with the efforts of all, the charity of all, the sacrifices of all, the earnest endeavor by which all can elevate themselves above vulgar prejudices, to accomplish a task at once the most difficult and most glorious that has ever been proposed to a great people.

The North, I repeat, is bound to give a noble example by obtaining a shining victory over itself. Let it say to itself that coexistence is not amalgamation; the question is not to marry negroes, but to treat them with justice. The fear of amalgamation once vanished, many things will change in appearance. Why, in fact, is the prejudice of race stronger in the free States than in the slave States? Because the latter know that slavery is a sufficient line of demarkation, and because they have not to dread amalgamation. Now, this is and will be nowhere to be dreaded; the instinct of both races will prevent such mingling, and the blacks are as anxious to remain separate from the whites as the whites are to avoid alliances with the blacks. As I have said, nothing but slavery, and the perverse habits that it engenders, could have succeeded in some sort in breaking down this barrier. If the class of mulattoes thus formed rule in some republics of South America, it proceeds from the absence of a numerous and powerful white race, like that which is covering the United States with its continually increasing population.

Decidedly, fears of amalgamation are puerile in such a country; and decidedly also, any other solution than the coexistence of races would be wrong. Doubtless, a natural concentration of the emancipated negroes will be some day effected; they will flock to those States where their relative number will ensure to them the most influence. Perhaps we may even obtain a glimpse of the time when, by the result of a providential compensation, the countries which have been the witnesses of their sufferings, and which they have watered with their tears, those countries where they, better than any others, can devote themselves to labor, will belong to them in great part. Are the Antilles and the regions of the Gulf of Mexico destined to become the refuge and almost the empire of Africans torn from their own continent? It is possible, but not certain. In any case, this geographical repartition of the races would be wrought peaceably; the effort to effect it by violent measures would justly arouse the conscience of the human race. So long as we talk of transporting the blacks to Africa, to St. Domingo, or elsewhere, so long as the peaceable coexistence of the races be not accepted, the barbarous proceedings which dishonor America will not cease, the Northern States will maltreat their free negroes, and the South will cling to slavery as to the only means of preventing a struggle for extermination.

At the North as well as the South, men need to accustom themselves in fine to the idea of coexistence. Yes, there will be whites and free blacks in various parts of the Union; yes, it is certain that in some parts, the black population will be possessed of influence; it may even happen that, in one or two points of the extreme South, it will come to rule. If this hypothesis, improbable in my opinion, should ever be realized, it would not be a cause of shame, but of glory, to the Union. It is said that the great Indian tribes of the Southwest think of forming a State, which will demand admission into the Union, and which has a chance to obtain it. Why should there not be, at need, a negro State by the side of an Indian State? This reparation would be fully due to the oppressed race, and America will be honored in treading her repugnance under foot, and in showing to the whole world that her so much vaunted liberty is not a vain word.

She would show, at the same time, that her Christian faith is not a vain formality. If the desire of avoiding amalgamation has legitimate grounds, the antipathy of race is simply abominable. Words cannot be found severe enough to censure the conduct of those Christians who, pursuing with their indignation the slavery of the South, refuse to fulfil the simplest duties of kindness, or even of common equity, towards the free negroes of the North.

But I hope that the Gospel, accustomed to work miracles, will also work this. Let us be just! we have already seen the pious ladies of Philadelphia lavishing their cares on black and white without distinction at the time of the cholera invasion. They washed and dressed with their own hands, in the hospital which they had founded, the children rendered orphans by the scourge, without taking account of the differences of color. This is a sign of progress, and I could cite several others: I could name cities, Chicago, for instance, where the schools are opened by law to the blacks as well as the whites. There is a power in the United States which will overthrow the obstacle of the North as well as that of the South, which will abolish both slavery and prejudice of skin.

This power has shown in the Antilles what it can do. There, pastors and missionaries, schools, works of charity pursued in common, have placed on a level the blacks and the whites, devoted to the same cause, and ransomed by the same Saviour. In the United States, likewise, the Christian faith will raise up the one, and will teach the others to humble themselves; it will destroy the vices of the negro, and will break the detestable pride of the Anglo Saxon. The real influence of faith on both—this is the true solution, this is the true bond of the races. Through this, will be established relations of mutual love and respect. What a mission is reserved for the churches of the United States! Checked hitherto by enormous difficulties, which it would be unjust not to take into account, they have not acted the part in the recent struggle against slavery which reverted to them of right. They have done a great deal, whatever may be said; they are disposed to do still more, and their attitude has improved visibly within a year. But this cannot suffice; there are two problems which are resolved instead of one, the question is now, to approach both face to face. True equality is founded, under the eye of God, through the community of hopes and of repentance, through close association in worship, in prayer, in action; and this equality has nothing in common with the jealous spirit of levelling which suffers old grievances to subsist, and continually invents new; it is peaceable, forgetful of evil, confiding, truly fraternal. I do not dream, of course, of the universal conversion of the population of the United States, both black and white; I know only that the Gospel, though it deeply penetrates comparatively few hearts, extends its influence much farther, and acts on those that it has not won. Let the Christians of America set to work, let them rejoice, for it is time, the scandals still presented here and there by their apologists for slavery, let them forbear to spare that which is culpable, to call good evil, or evil good, and they will render to their country a service which they alone can render it, and to which nothing on earth can be compared.

The United States do not know how great will be the transformation of their internal conditions, and the increase of their good renown abroad, when their churches, their schools, their public vehicles, their ballot-boxes, shall be widely accessible to persons of color, when equality and liberty shall have become realities on their soil; they do not know how great will be their peace and their prosperity. Let the two irreparable problems of slavery and the coexistence of races be resolved among them under the ruling influence of the Gospel, and they will witness the birth of a future far better than the past. No more fears, no more rivalries, no more separations in perspective, their conquests will become accomplished of themselves; and, no longer destined to swell the domain of servitude, they will win the applause of the entire world.

And all this will not be purchased, as men seem to believe, by the sacrifice of the cotton culture. At the present time, this culture incurs but one serious risk; the momentary triumph of a party that dreams of a slavery propaganda; it will be saved alone by the progress of liberty. On the day when emancipation shall be achieved, if wrought by the action of moral agents and social necessities, instead of by that of civil wars and insurrections, the cultivation of cotton in the Southern States will receive the impetus to a magnificent development. The emancipated negroes make large quantities of sugar in the Antilles; why should they not make cotton on firm ground? If affranchisement produced the destruction of planting in St. Domingo, we know now the reason. It is a proved fact that negroes who do not owe their liberty to insurrection, remain disposed to devote themselves to labor in the fields.

With slavery, observe, disappear, one after the other, the obstacles in the way of agricultural progress. The capital which no one dares risk to-day in the Southern States, will flow into them ceaselessly as soon as slavery shall be abolished; I say more; as soon as its progressive abolition shall be no longer doubtful in the sight of all. European immigration, the current of which turns aside with so much circumspection, avoiding a territory accursed and given over to calamities, will flock towards those countries more beautiful, more fertile, and broader than those of the Far West. Machinery will come, to more than fill up the void caused by the passing diminution of the number of laborers. The slaves can be intrusted with none but the simplest implements; every one knows that the plough, introduced originally into our French colonies, disappeared to make room for the hoe as soon as Colbert had authorized the slave trade. Ploughs have reappeared there since emancipation. Their agricultural and industrial progress date from the same epoch; to-day, our colonists understand the use of manures, and make improvements in manufacture. A new era is dawning, in fine; what will it be in the United States, among that people which seems destined to surpass all others in the application of mechanics to agriculture?

Still, I have made one concession too much in admitting the diminution of the number of laborers. Supposing that a few negroes quit the field, many whites will come to take their place. White labor is fully possible in the majority of the slave States, and immigrants from Europe will not hesitate to engage in it. Wherever slavery reigns, it is that, and not the climate, that must be arraigned if the whites fold their hands; labor has become there a servile act—it is blighted, as it were, in its essence. A competent writer said the other day: "If Algeria had been subjected to the sway of slavery, cultivation there would have been reputed impracticable for the French, and examples of mortality would not have been wanting." The whites have labored in the Antilles; the whites can labor, not only in all the slave States of the intermediate region, but in Louisiana. Cotton is already produced in Texas, thanks to its German settlers. The question is only, to go on in this way. Slavery once abolished, the small proprietors, who at present carry all the criminal extravagancies of the South farther than any others, will be compelled to set their hands to work. This will be an advantage both to the country and themselves. Who will not pray for the coming of the time when so considerable a part of the population will cease to possess slaves which it is incapable of feeding, when it will be transformed into the middle class, and thus escape the real servitude which imbitters it?

Moreover, let us not forget new cultures, that of the vine among others, which are fitted to become introduced into those new countries, or to develop there, and which lack nothing but liberty in order to flourish. The arts and manufactures also have their place; independently of the tillers of the soil, properly called, the Southern States will have need of workmen in manufactories, and of managers of agricultural machines; large plantations will often become divided, as has happened in the Antilles, and we shall witness the appearance of the small estate, that essential basis of social order. There will be employment for all, and the rich Southern cultures will be less neglected than before.

Whoever has descended the Ohio has involuntarily compared its two banks: here, the State of Ohio, whose prosperity advances with rapid strides: there, the State of Kentucky, no less favored by Nature, yet which languishes as if abandoned. Why? Because slavery blights all that it touches. Could not the whites of Kentucky and Virginia labor as well as those of Ohio? The comparative poverty of these slave States reminds me of the destitution of our colonies and those of England before emancipation: mortgaged estates, plantations burdened with expenses, the complete destruction of credit—such was their position. We must read American statistics to form an idea of the truly unheard-of extent of this fact—impoverishment by slavery. With a larger extent and much richer lands, the slave States possess neither agricultural growth, nor industrial growth, nor advance of population which can be compared far or near with that which is found in the free States. A book by Mr. Hinton Rowan Helper, The Impending Crisis of the South, expresses these differences in figures so significant that it is impossible to contest them.

The Southern States, therefore, are certain to increase their cultures, and to found their lasting prosperity by entering the path that leads to emancipation. But if they take the contrary road, they will hasten to their destruction, and with strange rapidity. Already, their violent acts of secession, and the monstrous plans which are necessarily attached to them, have had the first effect, easily foreseen, of dealing a most dangerous blow to American cotton. In a few weeks, they have done themselves more harm than the North, supposing its hostility as great as it is little, could have done them in twenty years. The meeting of Manchester has replied to the manifestoes of Charleston; England has said to herself, that, from men so determined to destroy themselves, she should count on nothing; and, having taken her resolution, she will proceed with it speedily; let the Southern States take care. English India can produce as much cotton as America; before long, if the Carolinians persist, they will have obtained the glorious result of despoiling their country of its chief resources; they will have killed the hen that laid the golden eggs. The matter is serious; I ask them to reflect on it. As England under pain of falling into want and riots, cannot dispense with cotton for a single day, she will act energetically. Cotton grows marvellously in many countries; in the Antilles, where it has been produced already; in Algeria, where the plantations are about to be increased; on the whole continent of Africa, in fine, where it enters perhaps into the plans of God thus to make a breach in indigenous slavery by the faults committed by slaveholders in America.

CONTEMPT OF GOD.

We have placed at the head of this article a strange caption—Contempt of God! How startling should be the thought of such a thing! Is it indeed so, that there are any of God's intelligent creatures who contemn him? We have just been reading the tenth Psalm, and there, in the thirteenth verse, the question is asked, "Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God?" Here, it is assumed as a fact, that they do contemn him.

When we think for a moment what God is—when we recall to mind his infinite greatness, and glory, and majesty—when we reflect upon his boundless and ineffable goodness, it seems, at first view, almost incredible that any person could be so wicked as to treat him with contempt. Yet, strange as it is, the charge is true. It is made by him who is the God of truth—by him who knows the heart.

Reader, may this charge be brought, in truth, against you? We imagine that we hear you saying, No, this cannot be true: I know that I do not contemn him. It is true, that I am a sinner—my conscience tells me that I do many things that I ought not to do; but I feel in my soul that I do not contemn him—that I do not despise him. What, contemn God!—The great God who made the world. There is something so horrible in the thought, that I will not, I cannot believe that I am guilty of such a crime as that.

It may be so, that your plea of not guilty is well founded. It can do no harm, however, to inquire into this matter a little. We propose to ask you a few questions for your serious reflection.

Do you habitually forget God? How often is it through the day that God is in your thoughts? Is there any thing like an habitual recurrence of your mind to God? Do you think of him in the morning, when you rise from your bed? Do you think of him in the evening, when you retire to your rest?

Perhaps you will say, It is true, that I do not habitually think of God, but how does this prove contempt of God? Let us see. Suppose you were brought into very near relationship to any one—you became by some means intimately associated with him. Now, suppose that person was seeking an acquaintance with you, and was using every means in order to obtain it. Instead, however, of responding to these intimations of his wishes, you very rarely think of him, and get only so, but you actually resist all his efforts to court your favor and acquaintance. We appeal to your candor. Would there not be contempt there? Now, God is doing this very thing. He is continually pressing himself upon your notice. He is calling upon you through all his works, by a thousand voices, to acquaint yourself with him. You see the proofs of his presence, his power, and his goodness, wherever you go. And yet you habitually forget him! Is this not to contemn him?

How do you treat the revelation of truth he has made to you? He has made known to you his mind and will. He has given you the Bible. You are, perhaps, able to read it. It can be purchased for a trifle. There are hundreds of Christians who would gladly give you a copy, if you were not able to procure it, and if you were disposed to read it. You have been made acquainted with the fact, that this book claims to be a revelation from God—that it claims to exhibit his character, his will and his purposes of judgment and mercy towards our world. Now, you know that such a book must be the most important of all books—a book that comes to us from God, the infinite and everlasting Jehovah! What book can be supposed to contain subjects of such unspeakable moment as this? If it be true, you surely have the deepest interest in it. The very possibility of the truth of such a book ought, one would suppose, be sufficient to secure for it your attention, especially when you know that there are thousands who have such a firm belief in it that they would die for it. And not only so, but you know that men of the most exalted minds—such as Newton and Bacon, and Locke, have avowed their belief in it as a revelation from God. Now, have you ever seriously examined its claims? Have you read it through? Are you in the habit of reading it? If not, say what you may you are chargeable with treating God with contempt. You cannot but plead guilty.

How do you treat his commands? He has given you a law, and you know it. Are you in the habit of appealing to this law, that you may come to a determination as to the course of conduct you will pursue? Is it a matter of concern, when you are about to do any thing, what the law of God says in relation to it? If it seems to contribute to your own pleasure or interest—if it will not expose you to the opposition of your fellowmen—if it will not disgrace you in the eyes of the world, will you not do it irrespectively of the commands of God? If so, you are most assuredly contemning God as your great Lawgiver.

How do you treat the invitations and promises of his? You have only to open the Bible, and you will find it to be replete with these. There, you will find God making over a grant of salvation to the very chief of sinners—a grant of salvation from sin and everlasting wrath—a grant of salvation that has been purchased at a price no less than the blood of the eternal Son of God. You are invited, you are entreated by the God of heaven to receive this rich blessing. Oh, it is wonderful that it should be offered to you! But it has been offered. How have you treated this offer? Have you received it with a thankful heart? If not, is there no contempt of God here?

How do you treat the threatenings of God? He has given you the most terrific warnings of the fearful doom that will overtake the impenitent—he has told you that the wicked shall be turned into hell, with all the nations that forget God—that he will render indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil. Have these warnings moved your heart, and prompted you to vigorous action? If not, you are surely chargeable with contempt of God.

Once more, How have you treated his dealings with you in his providence? Think of the favors he has been bestowing upon you—how he has been watching over you, and caring for you. Think how often he has preserved you from dangers and accidents. Have you failed to recognise his hand in any of these things? Have they called forth no expressions of gratitude? He, perhaps, sent afflictions upon you. He laid you upon a bed of sickness. He brought death very near to you, that you might lay to heart the great concerns of eternity. Are you still indifferent? If so, against you, dear reader, we must bring the charge of contempt of God.

Now, why do you thus contemn God? Is there any reason why you should contemn God? Is there any thing contemptible about God? What are we writing? We feel that we are chargeable with irreverence in putting such a question in relation to the infinitely glorious Jehovah. Think of his majesty! He sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and all the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers before him. Think of his power! His word created, and his arm upholds the universe. Think of his wisdom! His works, his providence, all his ways show this to be infinite. Think of his holiness! He is so pure that the very heavens are not clean in his sight. Think of his justice! Why justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne. Think of his faithfulness! It is the girdle of his loins. He never yet, and never will fail to accomplish his word. Think of his goodness! Look at the mercies he is showering down upon a wicked, apostate, rebellious world. Think of his grace! Look at the cross, and there you will see him giving his only begotten Son to the death for us all. Is such a God as this a God to contemn? What can be more irrational? What more monstrous? Oh, reader, if you are liable to this charge of contemning God, you are guilty of that which may well excite the wonder of the whole intelligent universe! "Miserable creature! Angels wonder at you while they pity you. They find their happiness in supremely adoring and loving him whom they contemn. Devils are amazed at you. They know too much of God to contemn him. Though they hate him, they fear him. They believe, and because they believe, they tremble."

MISSIONS.

English Methodist Missions.—It appears from the Wesleyan Magazine that there are eight printing establishments maintained by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, five of which are connected with the Missions under the immediate direction of the British Conference, and the remaining three with the missions of the affiliated conferences. The following statements relate to the five establishments of the former class:

"No report has been received of the work done at the printing establishment at Colombo, Ceylon, during the past year: but it must have been considerable, from the fact stated at the anniversary meeting of the Society, by the Rev. Joseph Rippon, that every month, 10,000 copies of tracts, periodicals, and portions of Holy Scripture, are issued and distributed among the native Cingalese. It is gratifying to learn that the tracts are most eager

EPISCOPAL VISITS.

I will be on the Westchester Circuit on the 29th of March. The Elder may make arrangements up to the 5th of April. I will then leave for Oxford on the Penningtonville Circuit, and remain to the 12th, on which day I will leave for Lancaster Circuit, where I will remain a week. The Elders or Preachers will make their arrangements and inform me of them. W. NAZREY

COUNT DE GASPARIN.

We hope that there is not one of our readers who will overlook the extended article on our first page by the above distinguished writer. The author is a French Protestant nobleman. The extract is made from a late work styled, "The Uprising of a Great People," and we would recommend all our people to purchase or borrow the work. They will find that it will well repay an attentive perusal, and that it gives a fair and impartial view of the present troubles in America. The most acute reader will discern in Count de Gasparin no vestige of that absurd and unchristian prejudice against people of color so often discernible in our Northern States. We commend it also to the notice of one of our contemporaries, who appears to need instruction in this matter.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

☞ Owing to a press of matter this week we have necessarily, though reluctantly, been compelled to omit several interesting articles in this number. We beg our friends to exercise the grace of patience. Their favors shall appear in due time—next week, if possible.

REVIVALS.

Rev. A. L. Stanford, of Little Wesley Church, is having a shower of heavenly blessings poured down upon his congregation. There have been several conversions, and the altar is crowded with anxious seekers, inquiring after Jesus Christ, the Man of God. Oh! that GOD may attend them with the workings of his Spirit.

UNION CHURCH.

Rev. Henry Davis, pastor of Union Church, has also commenced to hold a series of meetings since last Sabbath, and things are moving along very finely, we learn. At 3 o'clock, on Sabbath, the 9th instant, Sacrament, and sermon by the Elder. The Lord permitting, we shall preach for Elder Davis on Sabbath evening, at half-past 7 o'clock.

BURLINGTON CIRCUIT.

It will be seen that Rev. Joseph H. Smith has been having a great time on his circuit. A goodly number of precious souls have been brought to the enjoyment of God's love. Praise be to Him for his infinite goodness and wisdom. May the good work long continue.

REVIVAL.

We have received a letter from our Rev. and dear brother, John Turner, of St. Louis, Mo., which will be interesting to our readers. We are glad that our brother, who came up side by side with us, is awakened from his slumber, and feels the importance of letting his light shine from under a bushel. The Lord is blessing his labors. We are equally gratified to learn that he is about to do a great work for the organ of our beloved Zion.

ANOTHER LETTER.

We have also received a letter from Rev. William Jackson, of Vincennes, Indiana, which will be found very interesting to our readers. Brother Jackson and wife are diligent workers for the Lord, and most powerfully he blesses them for their labors. Go on, Brother and Sister Jackson, and should we meet no more here, we hope to meet you in that better land.

SACRAMENT.

Last Sabbath morning was the occasion of Sacrament in Bethel Church The event was more solemn than usual. We cannot account for it, unless it was because there was less singing while administering the holy rite to the numerous communicants.

FUNCTIONARY.

The subject of one of the functionaries of our Church seems to be the principal topic of discussion—and, while we claim it as the right of the ministers and members of our Church to discuss any matter connected with our Church, we also claim that it ought to be done in the most friendly and Christian-like manner. The readers who seek for information like to read discussions conducted in a philosophical and godlike spirit; for if we all believed one way, there would be no negatives, but all positives. Therefore, as there are two sides to this question, we shall reserve to ourselves the right to suppress, in the future, anything whose tenor is disparaging or uncouth Secondly, we hold that it is the duty of Bishops Quinn and Payne, if, in their judgment, there appears to be something wrong, to at once call together a Bishops' Council, find out the true cause of the controversy, and then give us the facts, as it is one of their "peers" that is in question. Then will the people be better satisfied.

THE MONTHLY REPOSITORY.

The above publication has just been laid upon our table. Rev. John M. Brown is the Editor, No. 64 Henrietta Street, Baltimore, Md. We notice among its contents a piece from Bishop Payne, on Religion and Sanctification. We have given it but a hasty glance, not having found time to peruse it thoroughly; but we can vouch for it as containing its usual acceptable store of good things.

OLD FOLKS' CONCERT.

Father Burris' Old Folks' Concert came off in commendable style on the evening specified. The sum realized by the evening's entertainment was seventy-eight dollars and fifty-seven cents ($78 57.) He presented us, for the benefit of the Christian Recorder, eighteen dollars ($18.) The remainder went towards defraying expenses for the use of the Hall and other incidental items. In our gratitude to Mr. Burris and his assistants for this acceptable and timely aid, and for the noble and Christian spirit he has shown towards us, our heart is too full to find vent in words that would adequately express our feelings. We can only say, many thanks to the kind donor May the hand of time fall lightly on his noble brow, and may he live to see the Recorder the brightest star in the glittering firmament of the African Church. The example has been set. Brethren, some of you who profess to love the Church more than he, would do well to take pattern after Father Burris.

THE CORNISH SOCIETY.

This Society keeps a standing advertisement in the Recorder, and we must gratefully acknowledge the receipt of the sum of six dollars by the hands of their excellent Secretary, Mr Seymour. Why will not all the Societies in Philadelphia give us their advertisements? It would bring them into more general notice, and keep them constantly before the public. We hope, hereafter, to see this matter attended to

HAYTI

February, 15, 1862.

This is to certify that HAYTI is a place not fit for any person to live in who has been accustomed to a residence in the North. I, George Wells, (and wife,) have been to Gonives, Jackmain, Trinidad, Lackaha, Daeryer, St. Marks, and Port au Prince. The natives subsist on pine-apples, sweet potatoes, persimmons, yams, plantains, figs, bananas, and other fruits and vegetables. The spiders are as large as a medium-sized cat—walking wonders in fact.

One vessel called the Truxilla sailed from New York, with one hundred persons on board, and at the present time there is not one of them living. Another vessel called the Flight also went from New York with twenty-five emigrants on board, and only three survive.

APPOINTMENTS.

MR. EDITOR:—You will please insert the following arrangements of my Quarterly Meeting of the Burlington Circuit:

Burlington—4th Sab March.
Mount Holly—5th Sab March.
Evesham—1st Sab. April.
Milford—2d Sab. April.
Snow Hill—3d Sab. April.
Jordantown—4th Sab. April.

We have concluded our protracted meeting at Jordantown, and also at Snow Hill. Through the blessing of Almighty God, we had a six-killing and soul-reviving time. Fourteen souls profess to be happily converted to God, while many others declare that they will not rest till they can testify to the world a knowledge of His saving grace and power.

BALTIMORE ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The Baltimore Annual Conference of the A. M. E. Church will, by Divine permission, assemble at Israel Church, Washington, D. C., on Thursday, the 24th of April, according to the Episcopal arrangements. Bishop Payne will preside.

This has been a year of many strange events in many parts of the Conference territory. Our people have seen strange sights—regiment after regiment passing and re-passing; the tents of the soldiers have been seen upon many hills, presenting the appearance of camp-meeting; yet with all these strange things, our religious interest has been unabating at all points. The financial condition of our churches is no worse than when times were different.

There will doubtless be many changes made during this Conference; for many of the preachers have remained their constitutional term in some of the circuits and stations, and they will be removed to other fields of labor. It is generally a pleasant time when Conference meets. The brethren, who have been absent from each other for an entire year, come together to talk over the ups and downs of the past year. So far, none of the preachers have died this year; their lives and the lives of their families, with one exception, have all been preserved

There is a great desire upon the part of many of the young members of the Conference to distinguish themselves as members of the New Testament, who need not be ashamed, rightly dividing truth from error Those young members have had to some extent the advantage of an early education, and we may expect something from them

On a recent visit to Washington, D. C., we were pleased to learn that some of the brethren there are contemplating the establishment of a church in Alexandria, Va., where we once had a church. Now is the time for us to turn our attention southward, for there is a change of things We pray, "Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the year."

UNDERTARING

Mrs H S. Duterte's advertisement will be found in another column. We take great pleasure in referring our readers to this estimable lady as a person every way worthy of their support, and one well qualified for the faithful performance of the duties pertaining to her department as Undertaker. She is prompt in her business affairs, and sympathising and accommodating to all—rich or poor. She keeps constantly on hand a large assortment of ready-made coffins. A very handsome hearse, with any number of carriages and drivers, always on hand. We most cordially recommend her as a deserving candidate for the kind patronage of the citizens of Philadelphia and vicinity. Mrs. Duterte has shown the good sense to keep a standing advertisement in our paper, in the payment of which she displays a promptness and punctuality which we hope will always be shown towards her by her customers

NOTICE.

Members of the Trenton charge are hereby informed that notices of the protracted meetings recently held upon this circuit, and also notices of the festivals and donations raised for the benefit of your pastor, do not appear in the Recorder this week, because he is unable, through great bodily affliction, to write them properly, and at the same time to attend to other duties, but look for them in another number. They will yet appear if the Lord will Again, remember that an extra donation of five dollars in cash must be raised by this charge for the Editor of the Christian Recorder about the time he makes his appearance here among us, as a token of the respect we have for him and the Recorder in faithfully publishing our notices from time to time This thing must be attended to. Brother Weaver deserves it, and he shall have it. It is unnecessary for me to say more on the subject. I know that the five dollars donation will be forthcoming at the proper time and place. Trenton charge will do the thing right.

A LETTER FROM NEWPORT, R. I.

Feb 28th, 1862.

BROTHER WEAVER:—Permit me to say a few words for the encouragement of the church and Sabbath School at Newport Station. Although I have not written anything for the paper, I am now compelled to. Truly, it is winter, and everything has the appearance of winter. There is plenty of snow here, and we can feel the cold blast at times here piercing; yet when we look at our beloved Zion in its prosperity, and particularly the Sabbath School department, it does not appear to be dreary. The church appears beautiful to me, when we can see prosperity in the Sabbath School.

On the 2d of December, 1861, there was a meeting called by our worthy Superintendent, Brother Thomas Jones, to make arrangements for the school. At that meeting, a sewing circle was formed of teachers, and scholars, and others. Sister Margaret Jackson was appointed President of the Sewing Circle. She has a great love for this department of our Church, and spares no pains to make these meetings agreeable and profitable. On the 25th of December our Sabbath School had a beautiful fair of fancy and useful articles, which the children enjoyed very much. We received in all $71 44, and cleared $41 We took the money and purchased a library for the school, which, we believe, is second to none, looking at our numbers.

Being loyal to Methodism, we, according to your request, celebrated the birth-day of our first illustrious Bishop, the Rev. Richard Allen, on the 14th of February, 1862. The Sabbath School gave an exhibition that evening, through the untiring efforts of the beloved Superintendent. The children were much applauded by all that heard them, as extraordinary. This is now their third exhibition. They have improved much. We received in all $13 60. Truly, our school is in a prosperous condition. We have 48 scholars, with an average attendance of 38 to 40. Though it is winter, when we look at this department of our church, it encourages our heart, and is cheering to all. In our monthly concert for the school, we are looking for the conversion of our dear children. May God, through his Holy Spirit, call on the moments! As to the temporal condition of our church here, I suppose it is generally known that we are not quite out of debt, but we still expect soon to pay the last cent. By the help of the good Lord, we can do it at any time. We are getting along very well. The good Lord is with us. It is true, there is no extra pouring out of God's Spirit; but there is a regular blessing of God. At every meeting, we feel the Lord is with us. Twelve persons have united with us from your city by certificate, and four have been converted to the love of God, and show evidence that he has power to forgive sin. One of them has gone to join on high. She left a bright testimony that it was well with her, and the work of the Lord is felt with us. My prayer is that his kingdom of grace may come to every heart. Pray for us that the good Lord may work more powerfully to the destruction of sin and Satan's power.

LETTER FROM BROTHER JACKSON

Vincennes, Ind., Feb. 19th, 1862

MR EDITOR:—Dear Sir,—A few months ago I informed you of the wonderful work of God in our midst, and that many were brought to believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and were on their way to heaven. I now inform you that the work is still going on, but in the midst of it death has visited us, and summoned one of our soldiers from labor to reward Sister Laura June Steward departed this life, Feb 18th, 1862, after two weeks' illness, which she bore with Christian fortitude She was converted under the administration of Rev Madison Patterson, 1860, and became a faithful and exemplary member of the A. M. E. Church, on May 2d, 1861. She was joined in holy matrimony to Mr Joseph Steward, of this city He was not religious at the time that she was married to him, but by her pious example and upright living before him, he became a member of the A. M. E Church, and five months ago he was happily converted to God, and travelled with her in the Christian warfare up to the present time. I am urging the members to leave the first principles of the doctrine of Christ, and go on unto perfection. Heb. vi. 1. She became a believer in the doctrine of sanctification. She sought and obtained the blessing one month before her death.

HER DYING TESTIMONY

She said, on the morning before she died, (when in her right mind,) "I am very happy. I am going to heaven. When you see me again, you will see me with the angels in heaven, for the Lord has shown me that I am a perfect Christian, and all will see it in the day of judgment." She said to her mother: "Mother, you must pray for father, or he will be lost, for he has not commenced to serve the Lord." And she said to her husband: "Joseph, you must be a perfect Christian, and meet me and the infant in heaven, where we shall part no more."

The gift which God on one bestows
He will delight to prove
The grace through every vessel flows
In purest streams of love.

The pure in heart! the pure in heart!
Robed in spotless white,
Are there with starry crowns of joy:
All glorious and bright

She and the infant are gone
To the realms of joy on high.
Reflecting beauty pure in thine.

LETTER FROM THE WEST.

St. Louis, Mo., Feb. 24th, 1862.

MR EDITOR:—Thinking it might be of interest to you, and others of my brethren East, to hear how I am getting along, and how Zion is progressing in this part of our Master's vineyard, in the midst of war and rumor of war, where may be seen the stars and stripes flung to the breeze in every direction, long trains of transportation wagons, soldiers by hundreds and by thousands, the gleaming spear, the glittering sword, the fleet of war, the huge cannon, the hurry and bustle that is exhibited near the battle-field, and where may be heard the clatter of the hoofs of the war horse, the voice of commanding officers, the patriotic cheers of loyal citizens for the Union, &c., where the war spirit seems to stand out in bold relief upon almost everything movable. Thanks be to God, it hath pleased him to pour out a portion of his Spirit upon this branch of his Zion since our last Annual Conference. We have had forty accessions to the church, and twenty-three professed hope in Christ. Glory be to God, there is quite a number of anxious souls yet in the congregation inquiring the way of salvation. Pray for us, that the good Lord may continue his convicting power in our midst, until scores more shall be finally saved.

LETTER FROM BISHOP NAZREY.

Bridgetown, N. Y.

MR. EDITOR:—Sir, I see in the Recorder of the first of March a letter purporting to be written by Right Rev. D. A. Payne to me; and, if so, I think it out of time and place. 1st. He should have seen me, or written to me if he knew me to have been in an error. 2. It is not common for judges to give a decision before they come to court. I shall answer his reverence as soon as time will permit me so to do. That letter carries a contradiction on its own face.

LETTER FROM BROTHER HALL.

New York, March 3d, 1862.

MR EDITOR:—It is the first time in my life that I have attempted to make any remarks through a public paper; and, even in this humble attempt, I trust that I shall not say anything that will reflect any discredit either upon the subject or upon myself. If I make any mistakes, it will be in the head and not in the heart. I have carefully watched the drift of this all-important subject, in regard to Bishop Nazrey and the position he occupies It does appear that the case is a very plain one. It is a case that every administrator of law ought to see through, and be able to decide upon without so many intricate questions upon the subject. It is a very simple and plain fact, that the General Conference has made its decrees; and, in making those decrees, she has been wise not to make them in Greek, Latin, or Hebrew, for she has but a few scholars of that class of men. Hence the necessity of obedience to the plain law. The wisest and best of men will make mistakes, but these mistakes are generally on minor points. But, Mr. Editor, we see that some one is on the fence, and they are very actively playing that part. But, sir, I assure you, there are men that will take care of that part at the proper time and place. If this connexion, or any part of it, goes to the wall, it must pass over our mangled bodies. We see that our writer has taken up much time and space in speaking of the General Conferences of 1856–60, and of the action of the General Convention of Canada in 1856. Sir, we believe Bishop Nazrey to be a sane man, and not otherwise. The General Conference of 1856 gave consent that one of our Bishops should preside over Canada until 1860, but the General Conference of 1856 did not give the Canadian Convention the right to elect Bishop Nazrey. All that was necessary for the coming four years was to be done by the Bishops and Elders. If we regard our General Conferences and our laws, let us stand by them, and pay no regard to what the Convention was pleased to do. We will also stand by the Pittsburgh General Conference. We look for the fulfilment of Bishop Nazrey's pledge, full and decided, yea or nay.

Now, sir, the arguments used on the other side are like using a large quantity of powder and a very small quantity of shot, or it is like putting the shot behind the powder. To my the least, the gun makes a loud report, but the shot kills the bird. Yours, for the connexion, now and forever.

J. D. S. HALL.

For the Christian Recorder.

FROM BALTIMORE, MD.

MR. EDITOR:—If there ever was a question which agitated any religious, moral, or legal circle until it utterly exhausted itself, and even when farther fermentation was likely to result in disgrace to the parties that were concerned themselves, I think it is the Nazrey question

Somehow it has become a bone of contention in our connexion, and we are about to gnaw the bone in pieces, before we adjust its right by transferring the whole matter to the proper tribunal. And, indeed, it has come to such a pass that we can get nothing from the Recorder that appears to originate with us, except it has its head and tail in Nazrey Why, sir, the immortal worth of souls, the tremendous thought of a judgment day, the sacredly gleaned treasures that result in infinite lessons, constituting the valuation of eternal truths that should ever be laid at the feet of Jesus, have become secondary and insignificant to the great and momentous Nazrey question!

And what makes the thing look much worse, is the plain and undeniable fact, that the General Conference of 1860 and Bishop Nazrey have both erred, and are grievously culpable; for if Bishop Nazrey belonged to Canada, the General Conference of 1860 should have let him alone. But let the case be as it may, we are tired of it. I, as a subscriber, am tired of it, and many others are complaining about the same thing We think it is time to dismiss that subject and consider another, unless the consequences of its monopoly were graver than has yet been proved.

Look here! Immorality and vice are walking with gigantic strides in the Church! Men and women are dying and going to the bar of God in an unprepared condition to meet its stern retributions. The sceptre of ignorance is being swayed over the back of mankind, and, more solemn still, infinite joy or endless woe attends on every breath.

Sir, it is time to consider these matters awhile: let some of our graphic pens engage some of these unlawful deeds and dread issues, and possibly we may find some of them equally as illegal as Bishop Nazrey has been, and to the aggregate much more so, and also demanding as much consideration

And another thing: what are Bishops Quinn and Payne for, if not to look out for the interest and defend the connexion? I think if the preachers have seen such a glaring wrong in Bishop Nazrey's ministration, and Bishops Quinn and Payne have not yet seen it sufficiently clear to warrant, in their godly judgment, their intervention, which is their duty, the preachers should organize committees to wait upon the two Bishops, and explain to them the evil it is doing, and demand them either to settle in person, or convene the General Conference to do it. The ministers can do nothing but talk and dispute on points; but Bishops Payne and Quinn can act in the premises, and either one of those Bishops can call the General Conference together, and then let the ministry adjust the matter; but until then every minister is beneath Bishop Nazrey, and can do nothing but agitate and bother the Church, for Nazrey's equals are only found in Quinn, Payne and the General Conference, and unless for immoral conduct, there is no other power can reach them.

FREE THINKER.

BISHOP NAZREY, OR THE TRUE STATE OF THE CASE

In the 60th number of the CHRISTIAN RECORDER, Rev. J. M. Brown calls our attention again to the 32d page of the minutes of the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church for 1860, as he had previously done in vol. 4, No. 1, page 19, Repository, for something relating to the case of Bishop Nazrey.

In the Recorder he calls it "the judgment of the General Conference," but in the Repository he calls it "The expressed will of our General Conference." Now, which one of these two definitions he will hereafter adopt and defend, we will not presume to say. But this we certainly know by the philosophy of the human mind, that "will" is not "judgment," and "judgment" is not "will." They are both faculties of the mind, but they are not both one and the same faculty.

The General Conference says, that it believes a double exercise of the Episcopal office in two distinct denominations at the same time is contrary to the genius and spirit of our church government. I believe so too; but my belief is not a law binding on the hearts and consciences of others so as to become a rule of action by which they must necessarily be governed. Nor is the mere belief of a General Conference such a rule. The will of a General Conference is the rule of action for its members, and not the belief of that Conference.

The General Conference requested Bishop Nazrey to resign whatever relation he sustained to the B. M. E. Church. But a request is not necessarily binding upon the person to whom it is made.

But the General Conference made a point—when it said that the resignation should take place at a given time and place. This last act is certainly binding upon the man to whom it relates, if there be no previously existing unrepealed act made by the same legislature or ecclesiastical court now in existence at the time of the passage of the said rule of resignation. But in the case under consideration was a previously existing unrepealed act, rule, or decision. The A. M. E. General Conference for 1856 made a rule by which they gave Bishop Nazrey to the B. M. E Church to serve them according to their wishes. That Church received his services, and said that they wished him to serve them for life. Upon these terms alone they received him.

The General Conference of the A. M. E. Church for 1860, did most deliberately acknowledge and confirm all the above stated acts as being legal, just, and right. More than this, the General Conference of 1860 did not repeal, rescind, or by any other means known to the rules governing deliberative bodies, make null and void the act by which the General Conference of 1856 provided that one of our Bishops should serve the B. M. E. Church according to their wishes. Here we have a previously made act coming in contact with the subsequent rule requiring the resignation. Is there an honest man among us who will deny these statements?

I am sorry that I have seen a communication from my dear brother and friend, Rev. John M. Brown, a man whom I have both loved and esteemed, proclaiming the following awful threatening and declaration of an exterminating war. "We tell elder Campbell, we have resolved, and never intend to cease this warfare, until he and others submit to the decrees and mandates of the General Conference. If discord is produced, we will meet it like men, and battle that discord with truth until every man shall submit to the highest court in the A. M. E. Church." This declaration coming from the highly cultivated intellect of Elder Brown, made in the connexion in which it stands, and upon the occasion on which he has seen fit to utter it, is most humiliating.

Against whom has he thus declared war? Not against the men who have resolved to follow their own interpretations of the minutes of the General Conference of the A. M. E Church for 1860, right or wrong But he has made it against the men who have resolved to follow and be governed by the doctrines and discipline of the A. M. E Church in America, as they understand them, and who have resolved to pay, not only due respect to the minutes of 1860, but they mean to respect the minutes of the General Conference for 1856 with those of 1860, and they mean to follow the instructions given in both these General Conferences, as far as they have it in their power This is the class of men, and no others against whom Rev. J. M. Brown has declared an unceasing, never-ending war. May the Lord have mercy upon us. Over forty years ago, I had a little sister whom I loved most dearly, and she loved me, as well as I loved her, but with all the love we entertained for each other, we used to have differences These differences sometimes led to blows. But we had a good Christian mother, who upon these occasions used to sing us the following little song of the good nurse for our better instruction

"Let dogs delight to bark and bite.
For God has made them so.
Let bears and lions growl and fight,
For that's their nature too.
But, children, you should never let
Such angry passions rise,
Your little hands were never made,
To tear each other's eyes."

Brother, are we not children of God? Are we not ministers of Christ? By war you may, you can, and perhaps will injure us if possible in this world, but let me ask you if you think it will be of any real advantage to you in the world to come. It will be of no real benefit to me in this world, nor in the world to come, to inflict an injury, or make a war upon you. Brother Stanford, Observer, Brother Revels, Bishops Quinn and Payne, with the General Conferences of 1852, 1856, and 1860, say, with me, that the Rev. Willis Nazrey is a regularly [illegible] A. M. E. Church. Again, Presbyter, alias Rev. A. W. Wyman, Wm. H. Jones, Rev. J. M. Brown, Bishop Payne, the B. M. E. General Conferences for 1856 and 1860, and the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church for 1860, say with me that Rev. Willis Nazrey has been appointed to serve the B. M. E. Church, as their legal superintendent without limitation. Are these things so? Let Elder Brown answer if they are not.

For the Christian Recorder

LETTER FROM BROTHER GREEN.

BROTHER WEAVER:—As one said in a time of severe trial, "Suffer me to speak, and after I have spoken, then mock on," so may I address you and the readers of the Recorder at this time. I shall "speak as to wise men, and judge ye what I say" concerning the complex case of Bishop Willis Nazrey, and style it "Nazrey against Nazrey," as by this means the Bishop can see more clearly his true position. He says, in your paper, he is weary of contending, and calls for aid to settle the question. As a friend to truth, I feel at liberty to give his reverence my aid in the right way. I shall be very concise, but I shall try to make what I say intelligible

The Bishop, before the "Informal Conference," in Philadelphia, Nov. 9th, 1861, in his defence, refers to a treaty by which two delegated committees were sent from the General Conference of the A. M. E. Church in Cincinnati, to discharge the duties imposed upon them in relation to his serving the A. M. E. Church in Canada, on the grounds of its separation from the Church in the United States. The Bishop gives the starting point. Here is the request:—

"Resolved, That we hereby most respectfully petition and request this General Conference to allow, or grant, Rev. Willis Nazrey, if it be his pleasure to withdraw from this branch of the church, to superintend the church in Canada."

(Signed,) WILLIAM H. JONES,
H. J. YOUNG,
GEORGE W. BRODIE,
ROBERT JONES

The request is not for Bishop Nazrey to superintend the A. M. E. Church and the B. M. E. Church, but the Bishop says the request was: "If it be his pleasure to withdraw from this branch (A. M. E. Church) to serve the church in Canada."

If the Bishop did not please to withdraw, then all the grant of the A. M. E Church, and the request of the delegation could effect nothing; and, according to the treaty, the Bishop would be no more the Bishop of the B M. E Church than either of the other Bishops that might go over to Canada. Hence, is not the Bishop there at all by his own showing, and he can deny it by no principle in religion or politics. In the General Conference at Pittsburgh, 1860, the time the treaty was to be ratified, the Conference said, by a large majority, Bishop Nazrey was as much the Bishop of Canada as Quinn and Payne were of the A. M. E. Church. Bishop Nazrey arose and declared he was not; that he only served the B. M. E. Church for the four years by the Episcopal plan of the A. M. E. Church till his term of service expired, and now came back, as he always was, a member of the latter church, and not of the former. Then that was his pleasure to not leave the A. M. E. Church. And, like Peter before the maiden, lest some of the brethren of the Conference would still think he had some relations to the B. M. E. Church, he denied bitterly, and let them know his pleasure in the following:

Pittsburgh, May 21st, 1860.

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

This is to certify that I do hereby resign my official relation as General Superintendent of the B. M E Church in Canada West.

The above resignation is to take effect on and after the rise of the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church, which will sit in Toronto, Canada West, on the first Monday in September, 1860

WILLIS NAZREY.

Herein he not only refused to withdraw from the A. M. E. Church, but refused to allow his brethren to say that he had a connexion with them at all as Superintendent. This is the Bishop's own doings, and it is marvellous in our eyes!

The Bishop, before the "Informal Conference," said:

"I did say, in the presence of a crowded congregation, that, according to the doings of the B. M. E. General Conference, I was the Bishop of that church."

Now, which of the Nazreys are we to believe? The one that confirmed his denial by a written obligation before hundreds of ministers and members in Pittsburgh that he was not the Bishop of Canada, or he that before a crowded congregation in Chatham said he was the Bishop?

Just look at the inconsistency! The church in Canada only asked if the mother church would grant their request, and the Bishop would withdraw. And all the mother church could do in 1860 could not make the Bishop comply with the request; and yet the action of the B. M. E. General Conference, in direct violation of the will of that A. M. E. Conference, could serve the Bishop's purpose to declare himself the Bishop in 1861. Consistency is a jewel! Provided that the Bishop had complied with the request, he refers us to two delegated committees authorized to make this grant. To save space, I will give the two delegations:—"All the Bishops should meet, and a committee of three Elders make that grant."

Bishops Quinn, Nazrey, and Payne, and Elders Stephen Smith, of Philadelphia, M. M. Clark, (but Elisha Weaver, of Indiana, was substituted on Clark's removal,) and A. R. Green, of Ohio, Conferences, were appointed.

Now, hear the Bishop on the power of that delegation: He quotes the action of the Cincinnati General Conference in 1856, as follows:—

"Resolved, That the committee appointed, having power to grant to the church in Canada its wishes, shall report fully their proceedings to the General Conference of 1860."

The Bishop said he understood clearly this matter. And he then knew that no one but the delegation and their Committee could grant or appoint him; and, if any one else did, he knew it was not legal, and that was why he declared in Pittsburgh that he was not the Bishop of Canada, I suppose.

Did all the Bishops and the three Elders ever grant Rev. Willis Nazrey to the B M E Church on the Convention in Chatham in 1856?

I say no. They never did.

Who were they that appointed him, or granted him to the church in Canada?

(Signed) DANIEL A PAYNE

Richard Warren, Thomas Sunrise, and Elisha Weaver, in the minority, opposed it.

Did the General Conference say that R. Warren and T Sunrise should make this grant? Bishop Nazrey says no, and refers us to the report that the committee sent should make in 1860. According to this statement, there was only Bishop Payne of the Bishops, Bishop Quinn having withdrawn after the second day, and Elder Smith also. And although I was present, from Monday morning till Saturday, yet there was not a word said to me about meeting for to make any such grant, and Elisha Weaver, that was present, voted against it. Anything that was done by any other parties was entirely null and void. The fact is, that only one of the members authorized signed that grant, with four of the others opposed to it. That is agreeing to it in a backward way!

But the Bishop still further, against his pretended appointment, says:—

"Now it follows that the said committee would be discharged at that time, and not until that time, from the duties imposed on them"

What committee does the Bishop refer to? Not Sunrise and Warren, but Smith, Weaver, and Green. What time does the Bishop refer to? To the General Conference in Pittsburgh, 1860

Is it not astonishing now to hear a Christian Bishop set a pretended claim to Episcopal jurisdiction on pretensions in the nineteenth century?

In conclusion, if a treaty has its stipulations, no party can realize the benefits unless they conform to its requirements. And having shown by the Bishop's own statements in his defence before the meeting in Philadelphia of the ministers of the A. M. E. Church, that he had never complied with the treaty; that the Elders delegated with the power had never granted him to serve the church there, I shall only state the reason why the delegation did refuse to grant him, so far as we were concerned, leaving the Bishop to tell why he refused to withdraw from the A M E Church to serve the church he now pretends he is the Bishop of

The Convention in Chatham, in 1856, changed the name from African to British, and the delegates felt they had no right to give the Bishop to any other name than that of the mother church, and they therefore knew that Bishop Nazrey would serve the church by the Episcopal plan adopted by them at Cincinnati in 1856 till 1860, and left the matter rest there till the body sending them met, when we would report our proceedings. From the above we leave you all to judge if the Bishop has not shown most clearly that he never was the Bishop of the Canadian Church, only as appointed in the way and year above referred to by the Episcopal plan And if he was, his resignation would set aside all the claims the B. M. E. Church could make by the treaty he referred to. His resignation further was to be in force after the rise of the B. M. E. General Conference, in September, 1860, or he gave it to his brethren in Pittsburgh to deceive them. If he did not intend what he said in that resignation, judge ye what it is termed in the Word of God. More anon.

Yours, for truth,

A. R. GREEN.

Eddy, Francis Doterte, and William Winters, against Stephen Smith and others, managers of the Olive Cemetery Company, and recently tried before Chief Justice Lowry, the Court has entered judgment in favor of Mr. Smith and the managers elected with him."

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly; for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to, somebody's head may have to come off We hope that the other Bishops will do the same

PROVIDENCE obituary will be found on the 3d page, 4th column

Hon. W. H Seward, Secretary of State, has written a letter to a political organization in this city peremptorily declining to allow his name to be used as a candidate for the next Presidency of these United States.

Professors Bache, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, and Pierce, of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., have been elected Associate Members of the University of Kiew, Russia, and have received their Diplomas through the Russian Minister resident here at Washington, D. C.

President C C. Felton, of Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., has died from an enlargement of the heart, at the residence of his brother, S. M. Felton, in Chester Co., Penn.

Religious Intelligence.

Rev. Dr. Norwood, Rector of the Episcopal church in Georgetown, D. C., having declined to read the prayers for "the President of the United States," and afterwards, through his love for Secessionism, found his way to Richmond, Va., fell, it is said, recently into a perplexing difficulty by offering up in full round tones, while somewhat confused in a public service in that city, the prayer as in his former days, for the President of the United States, but immediately afterwards had to make a full recantation.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, of London, in preaching from the text—"In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord;" Zech. xiv 20, made the following division:—First, Let us hear the horses' bells. Secondly, Let us command their music, and then, Thirdly, Let us go home and tune our bells, that they may be in harmony with this sacred chime—"Holiness unto the Lord."

Rev. Thos. H. Horne, the distinguished and excellent author of the "Introduction to the Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures," died on the 27th of January, at his residence in Bloomsbury Square, London, in the 82d year of his age.

Rev Dr Guthrie, of Edinburgh, is probably one of the most substantially popular ministers of the age. He received £30—$150 for every monthly instalment of "The Religion of Life," published in Good Words during last year. The chapters averaged about five pages each, and were written in leisure hours, without abating his discharge of clerical and philanthropic duties.

Ministers to be Taxed.—Rev. F. A. Crafts, the Secretary of the Maine Conference Missionary Society, is proposing to the ministers of this Conference that as a matter of example to their people, while they are engaging children and their parents to support the missionary cause, they should deny themselves as examples to the flock. He argues that God having opened to us a wide door in many lands, the seed is springing up for the garner of heaven. "We cannot," he writes, "think of recalling our missionaries while the fields are so white for harvest."

Methodism in New England.—The numerical and material strength of Methodism in the New England States, comprised in the six Conferences, and parts of the New York East, New York and Troy Conferences, is: Ministers, 900; members, 96,609; churches, 698, valued at $2,-874,650; parsonages, 398, valued at $365,265. The Methodists compare, in the aggregate population, as one to thirty-five. There are a little more than a hundred members to each minister; there are but two hundred fewer churches than ministers; the houses of worship average in value about $4,000; there are not quite half as many parsonages as churches, average value, $1,100.

Romanism in the United States.—The New York Tablet thus exhibits the progress of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States:

"During the past year there have been one hundred and thirty-five priests ordained for the sacred ministry, which includes those ordained for the various religious orders. There have been thirty-nine deaths among the clergy. There were ninety-five churches dedicated, and the cornerstones of eleven others blessed. The state of the country will account for so few churches having been commenced during the year. We also find the names of one hundred and twenty six young ladies who were received into the different religious orders throughout the loyal States, and eighteen deaths in all in these same communities. We have also given, from time to time, the reports of the different missions held by the Jesuits, the Paulists, the Redemptorists, the Passionists, and other orders engaged in this great work. A great number of these missions, with the most encouraging results, were given during the year. We intended to give the number of persons confirmed, and converts received into the church, but could not make the number anything like correct, as several confirmations were not reported, and of several of those that were, the numbers confirmed were not given. In nearly every case we find that several converts were amongst those confirmed, and from calculations made during the year, we think we can put the number down as nearly received into the church during the year 1861, at very nearly five hundred persons."

South America.—Very few people know the extent of missionary labor in South America. The attention of Christians is directed to the East, and the Old World, to the forgetfulness of what is working on the Southern continent of the new; and yet there are now laboring in South America fifty-seven evangelical missionaries, representing the English and American Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, and Lutherans. Nine only of these fifty-seven ministers are on the western side of the continent. They are faithfully working, encouraged by evidences of happy results and the hope of future larger harvests.—Lutheran Observer.

The Latest News.—A telegraphic despatch from Cairo to the Chicago Tribune brings the intelligence that Gen. Buell has surrounded the rebels at Murfreesborough, Tennessee, and it is probable that he has captured the whole force. The general in command of the rebels had offered to surrender, provided his troops would be allowed to march out as prisoners of war, but General Buell will not be satisfied with anything but an unconditional surrender, and if that is not complied with, he will open fire on the port. It is probable that the rebel army consists of those regiments that evacuated Bowling Green, and subsequently Nashville, on the approach of our troops.

Jefferson Davis' message to the rebel Congress is unusually pensive for a State document coming from the newly inaugurated President of a Confederacy that has claimed omnipotence for a mere staple of its agricultural resources, to say nothing of its boundless wealth of chivalry. The document is filled, from beginning to end, with nothing but illusive hopes and gloomy adjectives. Its opening sentence is a wary admission that "the Government had attempted more than it had power successfully to achieve!"

The first reference to the Roanoke Island affair is exceedingly mild, the substantive "discomfiture" being resorted to, as a gloss for the truth. In the next sentence, however, the confession is made that "it was deeply humiliating." Mr. Davis deems it vitally important that the South should be officially informed of the sense of its own humiliation. He excuses himself from dwelling upon the unpalatable news of the fall of Fort Donelson, because "the official reports have not been received," and meanwhile he asks a suspension of "judgment."

Jefferson Davis is evidently incensed at Floyd for the latter's cowardice, and makes this ironical reference to his services: "The reports of the Secretaries of War and Navy will exhibit the masses of resources for the conduct of the war which we have been able to accumulate."

From Washington, we have a semi-official contradiction of the sensation stories, to the effect that a battle had been fought on the Potomac, and disaster to the Union cause had resulted.

By the way of Fortress Monroe, we have received rebel papers of Wednesday last, extracts from which will be found in another column. The rebels state that our forces only took 7,000 prisoners at Fort Donelson, and that Floyd saved all of his command except the Thirtieth Mississippi regiment, and Gray and Jackson batteries. Senator Simmons, of Kentucky, offered a resolution in the rebel Congress, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, pledging the last man and the last dollar, for the purpose of prosecuting the war till their independence is acknowledged.

It is reported that the rebel troops still hold Cumberland Gap, but they expect an early attack from our forces. The communication between Fort Pulaski and Savannah has been entirely cut off by our forces, who have erected three heavy batteries. The cotton and tobacco planters have held a meeting in Richmond for the purpose of consulting together about destroying the crops before they fall into Federal hands. No action was taken; but we see that a bill has been introduced into Congress compensating all those who burn their crops for patriotic reasons. All the prisoners captured at Roanoke had arrived at Raleigh, having been released on their parole.

General Nelson is in command of our forces at Nashville, General Buell being still on the north bank of the river. It is said that Governor Harris was driven out of Nashville by the Union men, the latter having become bold at the near proximity of our forces.

A despatch from St Louis informs us that the Memphis papers [illegible] that the Memphis and Ohio Railroad should be torn up and the bridges destroyed, preparatory to the evacuation of Columbus, and the demolition of its fortifications. The troops were to fall back to Island No. 10, on the Mississippi river, a place said to have strong natural positions, and one that can be impregnably fortified. No doubt this news is true, as the movements of Generals Halleck and Buell's armies have made the evacuation of Columbus a military necessity on the part of the rebels.

By an order of the Governor and Executive Council of South Carolina, the owners of slaves removed from the seaboard to the interior of the State are required to place them under the control of some white person residing in the neighborhood to which the slaves may be removed. Any violation of this order subjects the party infringing it to a penalty of ten dollars per head per month on each slave so left without proper control.

A private letter received in Washington from Paris states that Mr. Yancey has left for Nassau, via Havana, taking with him a large supply of costly but durable goods, for the clothing of negroes. It is stated that he is fully satisfied that none of the great Powers of Europe will recognise the Confederate Government.

The British ship Labuan, of Hull, England, arrived at New York yesterday, in charge of a prize crew from the United States sloop-of-war Portsmouth. She was captured by the Portsmouth a few miles to the northward of Brazos Cinco, a small village near the Rio Grande, and it is supposed that she intended to run the blockade. The vessel is [illegible]. Her cargo consists of a large quantity of blankets &c.

During the past week, important military movements have taken place on the upper Potomac. On Monday, Gen. Banks' division commenced to cross the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, Col. Geary's Pennsylvania regiment being in advance. On Wednesday our troops occupied Harper's Ferry, and immediately took possession of Bolivar and Loudoun Heights, so that our position could not be flanked. Our forces did not meet with any opposition, but on the contrary, large numbers of refugees returned to their homes, and manifested great joy on the appearance of our troops. It is said that the condition of the country is deplorable, in consequence of the vandalism and marauding depredations of the rebels. The plans of our generals are not known, but all may rest assured that the positions we have gained will be maintained at all hazards.

The fact that Columbus, Ky., had been evacuated by the rebels is fully confirmed by the official despatches forwarded to Washington. Commander Phelps, who was sent with a flag of truce to the town, returned to Cairo yesterday, with the report that the begira had commenced, and that the rebels had fired their quarters, which, with a quantity of army stores, were destroyed. Large fires were also seen in the town, indicating that the torch had been applied to it. The belief prevails in Cairo that our forces have occupied the post. Commodore Foote is doing enough effective work on the Western waters to win an imperishable fame, and the thanks of the nation will reward him.

Our gunboats have made another reconnoissance up the Tennessee river. The Tyler, under the command of Lieutenant Gwin, proceeded up the river as far as Eastport, Mississippi. The commanding officer, in his official report, states that he found the Union sentiment very strong, and that the late glorious successes of our army have been most beneficial to the Union cause throughout the country he visited. He warned the inhabitants of the different towns along the banks of the river that he would hold Secessionists and their property responsible for any outrages committed on the Union people.

Official despatches from the Burnside Expedition have been received at Washington. Our forces went up the Chowan river had returned. They did not go beyond Winton. The rebels fled when they saw our troops approaching the latter place.

Hon. F. W. Seward, Assistant Secretary of State, has informed Superintendent of Police Kennedy, of New York, that the passport system is now abolished, and that it will therefore be left optional with persons to provide themselves with passports or not, as they may deem necessary for their security and protection abroad. Foreign passports will no longer require to be countersigned.

We have an "important, if true," despatch from Washington, stating that the object of the Allied invasion of Mexico, is understood to be the erection of that unfortunate territory into a monarchy. This, of course, is in direct contravention of the assurance given to our Government, and the only plea that will be advanced to justify it, is that of respect for the "free choice of the Mexican people!" This invasion of their country, and dictatorially assuming the reins of government, is giving them "free choice" with a vengeance!

We have foreign news to the 15th ult., by the arrival of the Arabia at Halifax. It is important, though not startling in tenor. The French papers apprehend the disruption of the Palmerston Cabinet upon Mexican affairs. The belief had been expressed that England would withdraw from the Mexican Blustering expedition, should France and Spain attempt to interfere in the internal policy of Mexico. The Independance Belge had asserted the positive acceptance of the throne by Maximilian.

The official documents relative to the blockade were being prepared by the British Government to lay before Parliament. A supplementary naval estimate had asked for an extra appropriation of £364,-000, probably to defray the expense of the Mason and Slidell bluster.

It is reported that the Tuscarora had arrived at Gibraltar, where the Sumter still remained, without coal.

In response to an inquiry of Lord Stanhope, Earl Russel had stated that he had no official information respecting the "stone blockade." The Government had protested against the permanent destruction of Charleston, or any other harbor, as unjustifiable, and its protest had met the approval of the French Chamber.

How J. B. Floyd was lead to Resign.—Mr. Thurlow Weed writes a letter to the Albany Journal of February 13th, in which he gives the following account of the manner in which John B. Floyd was brought to resign his place as Secretary of War under Mr. Buchanan, which he had used to further the ends of treason:

"In February, Major Anderson, commanding at Fort Moultrie, Charleston harbor, finding his position endangered, passed his garrison, by a prompt and brilliant movement, over to the stronger fortress of Sumter, when pro Mr. Floyd, Secretary of War, much excited, called upon the President to say that Major Anderson had violated express orders, and thereby seriously compromised him (Floyd,) and that unless the Major was immediately remanded to Fort Moultrie he should resign the War Office.

"The Cabinet was assembled directly. Mr. Buchanan, explaining the embarrassment of the Secretary of War, remarked that the act of Major Anderson would occasion exasperation in the South; he had told Mr. Floyd that, as the Government was strong, forbearance towards 'erring brethren might win them back to their allegiance, and that that officer might be ordered back.' After an ominous silence, the President inquired how the suggestion struck his Cabinet?

"'Mr. Stanton, just now called to the War Office, but then Attorney-General, answered: 'That course, Mr. President, ought certainly to be regarded as most liberal towards erring brethren; but while one member of your Cabinet has fraudulent acceptances for millions of dollars afloat, and while the confidential clerk of another—himself in Carolina, teaching rebellion—has just stolen nine hundred thousand dollars from the Indian trust fund, the enormity of ordering Mr. Anderson back to Fort Moultrie would be dangerous. But, if you intend to try it, before it is done, I beg that you will accept my resignation.'

"'And mine,' added the Secretary of State, Mr. Black.

"'And mine, also,' said the Postmaster-General, Mr Holt.

"'And mine, too,' followed the Secretary of the Treasury, General Dix.

"This, of course, opened the bleared eyes of the President, and the meeting resulted in the acceptance of Mr. Floyd's resignation."

Columbus.—A despatch from Cairo informs us that a great light was seen in the vicinity of Columbus on Saturday evening. It is supposed that the rebels have burned everything in the town of an inflammable nature.

The Railroad to Martinsburg.—It is expected that we will be in full [illegible] Martinsburg, Virginia, within the next three or four days.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is being rapidly repaired with [illegible] city with [illegible] off by the rebels.

Paine and Halleck.—A week or two ago, was published a stringent order from General Paine, then [illegible] (captured a few days before) for each Union man murdered, and after this two for each, and also continue to shoot, capture, and kill." Major General Halleck has just issued a stringent order, disapproving of the conduct of General Paine, in which he says:

"It is contrary to the rules of civilized war; and if its spirit should be adopted, the whole country would [illegible] in blood. [illegible] innocent [illegible] control."

Cotton.—A despatch states that seven hundred thousand [illegible] had been [illegible] our hands at Nashville, and that the Treasury Department had taken measures to have it brought North.

Jesse D Bright, who was lately expelled from the United States Senate for his alleged sympathy with the South, was born in Norwich, Chenango Co., New York, where his father, who was a hatter by trade, was for several years county clerk, as he had also previously been sheriff of Clinton county.

Mrs. Lucretia Everett, widow of the late Alexander H. Everett, and daughter of the Hon. Oliver Peabody, died a few days since in Boston, about 75 years of age. Since the death of her lamented husband she has been actively connected as a manager with the Old Ladies' Home, the Orphan Asylum, and many other public charities of Boston.

Hon Joseph A. Wright has been appointed, by the [illegible] from that State in place of J. D. Bright, expelled.

Maryland and Jefferson Davis.—In the Maryland House of Delegates, a few days since, Mr. Johnson, of Baltimore County, submitted the following:

Preamble and Resolution on the subject of the course the State will pursue in the present rebellion.

Whereas, Jefferson Davis, a pretended President of a pretended Confederacy, in a paper styled an Inaugural, delivered by him in Richmond, Va., on the 22d instant, has repeated an assertion often recklessly uttered in public bodies of the so-called Confederate States, that "Maryland, already united to us by hallowed memories and material interests, will, when able to speak with unstifled voice, unite her destiny to the South;" and whereas, it is due to the intelligence, patriotism and good name of our people that such assertion be at once repudiated by their representatives here assembled; therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That such assertion is an unfounded and gross calumny upon the people of the State, who, sincerely lamenting the madness and self-inflicted misfortunes of our brethren of the South, acting under a delusion caused by the arts of the aspiring and criminal ambition of a few designing men, are but admonished by the sad condition of such brethren of the fatal results sure to follow from the course which they have pursued, and are more and more convinced of the obligation, alike of interest and of duty, to abide with undying attachment to the Union derived for us by our fathers, as absolutely necessary to our social and political happiness, and the preservation of the very liberty which they fought and bled to achieve for us.

Which were read the first, and by special order, two-thirds concurring, a second time, and passed by yeas 52, nays 5.

The Southern Reverses.—A writer in the Richmond Examiner, referring to the defeat of the rebels at Fort Henry and Roanoke Island, says:

It is high time that these surrenders should cease, for, considering the character of the war in its consequences to us, they have been truly amazing, commencing with that of the cavalry at Alexandria down through that of Colonel Pegram, at Rich Mountain, that of Com. Barron, at Hatteras, &c., to the present lamentable instances.

At Fort Henry, a Brigadier General, unwounded, having a garrison almost intact, lowers his flag over a dozen guns of the largest calibre, and with a hackneyed compliment yields up his bloodless sword. How withering and humiliating to our Southern manhood was the scornful reply of the Yankee commodore. That the General should have neglected to make preparations for preventing the enemy from ascending the river and burning the railroad bridge may be passed over,—because no commission can make a man a commander unless it be given by Nature; but, if the statement as to his surrendering be true, is he to be retained upon the rolls of the Southern army as an officer?

The Roanoke affair is perfectly incomprehensible. The newspapers are filled with extravagant laudations of our valor—the annals of Greece and Rome offer no parallel—whole regiments were defeated by companies, and we yielded only to death. Our men finally surrendered, "with no blood on their bayonets," and what is the loss?—Richmond Blues, two killed and five wounded; McCulloch Rangers, one killed and two wounded; the other four companies lost in all two killed and eleven wounded. Comment is needless. The whole army had better surrender at once, for it will eventually come to it.

The Policy of Jefferson Davis.—Concerning Jefferson Davis' Message, the Appeal says: "He is free to confess the error of his past policy, and the extent of the disasters which have followed from it. He thinks war will soon be made on the advancing columns of the enemy, and that we will attack, pursue, and destroy, instead of being attacked, pursued, and destroyed. The spade will be [illegible], and the bayonet resumed. In other words, the policy of Fabian Davis will yield to that of the Napoleonic Beauregard. In view of these facts, we can see a light gleaming through the dark clouds that at present environ us, which will burst forth in less than sixty days, in a full resplendent lustre.

Religious Soldiers.—"That which chiefly distinguished the army of Cromwell from other armies, was the austere morality and the fear of God which pervaded all ranks. It is acknowledged by the most zealous Royalists, that in that singular camp, no oath was heard, no drunkenness or gambling was seen, and that during the long dominion of the soldiery, the property of the peaceable citizen, and the honor of woman were held sacred.

"Fifty thousand men accustomed to the profession of arms, were at once thrown on the world; and experience seemed to warrant the belief that this change would produce much misery and crime—that the discharged veterans would be seen begging in every street, or would be driven by hunger to pillage. But no such result followed. In a few months, there remained not a trace indicating that the most formidable army in the world had just been absorbed into the mass of the community. The Royalists themselves confessed that, in every department of honest industry, the disbanded warrior prospered beyond other men; that none was charged with any theft or robbery; that none was heard to ask an alms; and that, if a baker, a mason, or a wagoner attracted notice by his diligence and sobriety, he was, in all probability, one of Oliver's old soldiers."—Macaulay.

Foreign Summary.

A curious instance of heartlessness and folly in a solemn hour has just come to light. It is found in the last will of one of the Earls of Pembroke. It says: "Item—I give all my deer to the Earl of Salisbury, who I know will preserve them, because he denied the king a buck out of his own park. Item—I give nothing to Lord Say, which legacy I give him, because I know he will bestow it on the poor. Item—To Tom May I give five shillings; I intended him more, but whoever has read his History of the Parliament thinks five shillings is too much. Item—I give Lieut. Gen. Cromwell one word of mine, because he never kept his own. Item—I give up the ghost."

The Bakers of Paris have set an example to all Bakers for good. It has long been their custom to make a holiday present to their customers on Christmas. On last Christmas, however, they did the far more sensible and useful thing of presenting 295,000 kilogrammes of Bread to the many needy poor of that vast city. Many a heart was made happy by the timely gift.

The influence of Joseph Mazzini upon the Italian mind is known to be very great. It is in a way, per haps, of being still greater and more enduring. Under his own supervision, his works are about to be published by a house in Milan. They will appear in two series, political and literary, and each will embrace six volumes—and, appearing in a cheap and attractive form, they will probably have a wide circulation.

Messrs. Nesbit & Co., also, are about to issue from London a volume of sermons preached by the lamented Henry Martyn, whose name is so familiar and dear to all friends of Missions and of Christ. The volume will be beautifully embellished with a portrait of the lamented author.

A very good story is told of the Rothschilds. While one of them was one day in their bank at Frankfort, in the troublesome times of 1848, two stout, rough looking men entered the bank. "You have millions on millions," said they to him, "and we have nothing. You must divide with us." "Very well," said he, "would an equal division satisfy you?" "Yes, certainly," was the reply. "What do you suppose the firm of De Rothschild is worth?" "Ah! at forty millions of florins." "Forty millions you think, eh? Well, there are forty millions of people in Germany. That will be a florin apiece. Here's yours."

The Free Church of Scotland is losing fried with the loss of some of her best men. Recently, Principal Cunningham died. Then Rev F. Gillies, the gifted [illegible] has lately been called to his rest. Rev. Dr. Candlish, also, is afflicted with partial deafness and frequent attacks of gout, and is becoming frail. His first roll of this Church's truly great men is rapidly passing by. "The fathers, where are they?"

The Customs of the Chinese are proverbially singular. The latest we have described are that for one hundred days after the Emperor's death they will not shave their heads. During that time the mandarins wear white, and shopkeepers paste strips of colored paper upon their signs. They date their year from the entrance of the reigning Emperor upon the throne. The late Emperor died last August, but the year will retain his name to its close, when it will take the name of his successor, a child about six years of age, and who is to be officially called Kee Seeang.

Quite a high Observatory is reported to be raising by the Emperor of Russia. It is to stand on the highest point of Mount Ararat, and with a truly generous spirit the Emperor has devoted one hundred and twenty-five thousand francs (about $25,000) for its erection.

The number of suicides in France annually is appalling. During the past year there were 3,899, or considerable more than ten each day. Of these, 3,057 were males, and 842 females. Thirty-eight men and eleven women were over ninety years of age, and sixteen were children under fifteen years. For the largest proportion were between forty and sixty years.

Russia is very decidedly turning attention to the cultivation of Cotton. The Districts of Khiva and Bokhara are favorable to this, and the effort to cultivate it in them is rapidly increasing. At the fair recently held at Novogorod, $150,000 worth of cotton was sold.

Latest word from Rome speaks of the very precarious state of the Pope's health. Chronic indigestion has brought on frequent attacks of fever. While his physicians urge him to take exercise, his limbs are so swollen that he cannot walk, and he has to be rolled from one room to another. Another very serious symptom is an increasing disposition to somnolency, from which, already, it is sometimes difficult to arouse him.

It has long been the custom to have the Te Deum celebrated throughout the Russian Empire in commemoration of the defeat of the French at Moscow. This year, for the first time in fifty years, it has not been done—the Emperor having commanded it to be omitted.

The British Parliament was formally opened on Thursday, the 6th ult. In reference to the Trent affair, the Queen used the following words—"That question has been satisfactorily settled by the restoration of the passengers to British protection, and by the disavowal by the United States Government of the act of violence committed by their naval officer. The friendly relations between Her Majesty and the President of the United States are therefore unimpaired." In the same spirit, Lord Palmerston said that the British Government would continue its neutral course, and that the distress in the manufacturing districts in England would not justify its interference with the blockade.

Much was said, especially during the recent threatened difficulty with Great Britain, of the immense danger to the United States from the vast Navy of England. But time is showing that the danger may not be so great as was feared. The Warrior is said to be proving a great failure; and an able article in the American Railway Review shows that the screw navy especially must have its efficiency seriously affected by the large draught of water which its ships require. It says: "The three-deckers draw from 34 to 36 feet; the two-deckers from 28 to 35 feet: the frigates, Orlando class, 30 to 32 feet; Euryglus class, 23 to 26 feet; Arrogant class, 19 to 22 feet; the sloops, 17 to 20 feet. Except "off soundings," then, the great body of the navy is only a French bugbear. The harbors of the United States are above their company."

A most destructive rain is reported to have lately visited Mecca, in Arabia. Three hundred lives were lost, one third of the city destroyed, the great sacred Mosque and the Holy Black Stone flooded, and the great Library almost destroyed. In speaking of it, a gentleman who resides in Syria says, "I cannot, in view of the fact, forget that the massacre in Damascus was planned and decided upon in that same so-called Holy City."

Died.

For the Christian Recorder.

Mrs. Clementina S. P. Downing, the daughter of Amy and Ransom Parker, was born in Providence, Sep. 14th, 1840. She experienced religion and joined Bethel Church in this city during the administration of Rev. J. D. S. Hall, in 1857. She was married to Mr. Peter W. Downing Sep. 20th, 1860. On the 24th of April, 1861, she, with her husband, sailed for Liberia, where she died Nov. 16th, 1861. Earthly trials or enjoyments are of short continuance. Death is continually removing those of every age and situation, breaking in upon the most endearing unions as soon as formed, and marring all our outward comforts.

We cannot too decidedly prefer those advantages which shall endure for ever, that we may be ready for every separating stroke.

The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow from which we refuse to be divorced; every other we would seek to heal, and every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep upon this affliction we cherish.

It would seem that our Saviour left sorrow for the Christian's legacy. Who can partake of the Lord's Supper without bringing the suffering of Christ fresh to his mind? By this we see that he intended us to perpetuate his memory.

Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her he most loved, when he feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the closing of its portals, would accept of consolation that must be bought by forgetfulness? The love which survives the tomb is the noblest attribute of the soul.

There is no one who was acquainted with Mrs. Downing but that would enshrine her memory. I have been acquainted with her for many years. I knew her from childhood; she was an ornament to society, and a blessing to the Church, laboring in Sabbath School, instructing the young, laboring in exhibitions for the intellectual culture of her associates, and laboring in the choir, discoursing music for the congregation.

Having married the gentleman of her choice, at his request, she felt it to be her duty as a Christian to sever her ties here and accompany him to the burning shores of Africa, with a bright prospect of opening a new field of labor and usefulness. But a dark shade has been thrown over the smiling scenes of her busy life, for the sad news came to us from across the ocean, that Clementina S. P. Downing is dead!

When the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tears of recollection, and when the sudden anguish and convulsive agony is softened into retrospective meditation, we can truly say, [illegible] who would root out such sorrow from the heart? Though it may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright hours of gayety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hours of gloom, who would so change it, even for the songs of pleasure of the harlot of revelry?

There is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn even from the chorus of the living.

OIL.

To a strict observer of the events which affect the happiness or misery of the human family it must be evident that the age in which we live, is a period of revolution. In politics, what convulsions and upheavings, what secession and rebellion, what transmutations of public virtue and vice, what wars and rumors of wars! In sciences, what discoveries, what demolition of theories, what creations of fancy, what wonderful progress! In theology, what doubting, what dogmatising, what carefulness and labor to clear away the rubbish of "exploded" doctrine! In philosophy, what astonishing things we behold, what unheard of vagaries! In the useful arts, what forsaking of the good old ways, what a daring disregard of that which has become venerable by the continued practice of the fathers! What astonishment would strike the ancients to behold our modern appliances, what indignation, to see their well attested theories of economy and thrifty living, utterly set at naught!

But in no department of the sublunary interests of the rational creatures that people this terraqueous globe, has there been such a complete overturning and reconstruction, as in the application of oleaginous substances to the convenience, enlightenment and "lubrication" of society. It is here that thrones have trembled, dynasties decayed, and royal pre-eminence retired before successful rivalry. The oil-producing monster of the briny deep, so long the undisputed monarch, has at last been superseded, and is compelled in shame to hide his diminished head. His noble prestige is gone forever. The crown has tumbled from his cranium, as surely as Ichabod is inscribed upon the diadem that once so proudly pressed the lordly brow and sacred temples of King Cotton. Even the oriental olive, the queen of early commerce, whose product so often caused the face of man to shine, (especially the merchants') is like to lose what little importance still remained. "Westward the star of Empire takes its way." Petroleum, Petroleum, is the watchword. We read by Petroleum. We ride on the cars whose revolving axles roll in Petroleum. We eat the bread, composed of flour, ground in mills, whose friction would bare them to the very earth, were it not for Petroleum in the gudgeons. We use the implements, picks, spades, shovels, hammers, axes, knives, forks, and even silver spoons; we wear the clothing, cotton, linen, woolen, manufactured by machinery which moves upon Petroleum. It is the last and greatest wonder of the world. As an article of commerce, it is not yet two years old, and still it has made its way into all the important ports of the world, and will soon become as indispensable in every hamlet and village. It is the best and cheapest lubricator, it has no equal for the production of brilliant, yet mild and beautiful lamp light; it is preferable to the most superior coal for the generation of gas, and will doubtless, before a great while, become to many parts of the world, the most economical article of fuel. In Arctic expeditions it can be relied on, as in every particular, surpassing the blubber of the walrus.

The deposits or springs of oil seem to be inexhaustible. It is collected in vast subterranean seas, which being tapped by the drill, flow forth astonishing and incredible quantities of the unguentary fluid. These flowing wells have, of late, monopolised the whole trade, the supply from this source alone being sufficient to so reduce the price as to render pumping entirely out of the question. Many of these wells produce from thirty to one hundred barrels per day. Some yield as high as five hundred barrels, and a few have risen to one thousand barrels in twenty-four hours. The waste has been immense. An old flat boat was lodged in the river at Kittanning, and so abundant was the collection of oil on the upper side of it, that forty barrels were secured in a short time. In and around Oil City the soil is so impregnated with oil that it destroys the hoofs of the horses used in its transportation. The quantity on hand in this one place, secured in tanks or vats, is one hundred and twenty-five thousand barrels, and it is selling at the extremely low figure of fifty cents per barrel of forty gallons.

These oil deposits have only to a limited extent attracted the attention of men of science. No satisfactory theory has yet been advanced to account their formation.

Some think that the oil is a distillation from the vast coal beds that lie west of the Alleghany mountains. And the fact that it possesses in its composition the same ingredients and qualities as oil distilled from coal by an artificial process, seems to confirm the hypothesis. But it is found at a great distance from the coal, as far as a hundred miles and more, and never in the immediate vicinity. This renders the theory extremely doubtful. Moreover, it often lies on a level with the coal, and sometimes even above it, and not invariably below, as the theory must require.

Another, and in some respects a more satisfactory solution, is that the substance of the oil is thrown up in a gaseous form by the internal fires of the earth, through the interstices of the rocks, and cooled and liquified in the caverns where it is now found. If this theory can be substantiated, it will furnish a new and beautiful explanation of the bituminous coal formations. For there would be no difficulty in supposing that the lapse of time has solidified the oil that was formed many ages ago.

There is a theologico-mulierix theory, which must not be passed by unnoticed. It is as wonderful as it is wise and unique. The assumption is, as many able writers also tell us, that, "The last times" are at hand, and that Providence has prepared these vast reservoirs as combustible material against the day of final conflagration. In the opinion of the advocates of this theory, it is very wicked to appropriate or in any way interfere with what has been set apart to this sacred use. The principal defenders of this doctrine, we are told, are a certain dame of undiscovered antiquity and a learned D. D. S. T. P. of a neighboring city, who assures his people, that oil is a certain indication that time is short.

The question is one of deep interest to those who find entertainment in tracing results in nature to natural causes. It opens a new and beautiful field for investigation, and it is strange that it has thus far attracted so little attention and elicited so little discussion in the scientific world.

PHILANDER.

AN EDITOR'S DUTIES.

Mr. R. Wilford, editor of the Newcastle (Eng.) Chronicle, on recently retiring from that paper, enumerated, at a dinner given him, the following as among the duties of an editor: "He must argue with the writers of rejected contributions; mollify the indignation of susceptible people whose heads some obscure or unnoticeable cap in the paper fits, and who refuse to wear it, (laughter;) keep all the hands employed, avoiding either pressure or want of copy; insert something about everything that turns up, even if it be only a few lines, so that the paper may not be disgraced by an announcement that, owing to the pressing demands upon our space, we are reluctantly compelled to postpone our report of the important meeting at ——until to-morrow. He must wade through yards of reporting, bandfuls of 'Simey,' and quires of communications from district correspondents, weeding out redundancies, and 'doctoring up' generally, a process for which, by the way, I am sorry to say, he gets no credit whatever. The reader says: 'What an excellent paragraph that was of Jones'! Lots of people have been talking about it, and all agree that it is capital!' Why, the fact was, that the editor spent twenty minutes in 'touching-up' that identical fifty-four line paragraph, for which Jones gets so much praise. He must know everybody and everybody's connexions, so that if Mr. Smith, address unknown, cuts a figure in the London papers, the event may be duly chronicled at home for the benefit of Smith's admiring fellow-townsmen. He must be acquainted with the locality and orthography of every place under the sun, be familiar with the names, dignities, and history of every person, famous and notorious, have a smattering of all the 'sciences and isms, mechanics, music, the drama, and the fine arts—in short, be a living dictionary of useful knowledge, 'known and read of all men.'"

THOMAS HARTWELL HORNE.

The last steamer from Europe brings intelligence of the decease of Rev T. H. Horne the author of the well-known Introduction to the Critical Study of the Holy Scriptures. He died at his home in London, on the 26th ult. in the eighty-second year of his age. He was born in London, on the 20th of October, 1780, when his father's shutters still bore the inscription of "No Popery," which had been placed upon them to avert the vengeance of Lord George Gordon's rioters. His father being in poor circumstances, he commenced studying at Christ's Hospital, where he remained as a pupil until 1795. During this time, both Coleridge and Arthur Murphy were his schoolmates and friends. Unable to incur the expenses of a university education, he became a barrister's clerk, and afterwards a bookseller's copyist, devoting all his spare time to reading.

Of the character of his studies we may judge from his Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Revelation, which he published when only nineteen years of age. In 1818, eighteen years afterward, he published the Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, for the preparation of which he had spent his time, night and day, in collecting material. It at once made him both well known and wealthy. Supplying a want which had long been felt by the religious world, it was welcomed by all denominations, introduced as a text-book at the various universities, and has been quite widely circulated in this country, as well as in England. So pleased was Dr. Howley, Bishop of London, with the work, that he ordained him a minister of the Church of England, notwithstanding his not having pursued a regular course of theological training. He now turned his attention from general literary pursuits to theological labors, though he did not secure such preferment in the Church as might have been expected from his abilities. His only benefice was that of two combined parishes in London, where the congregations were thin, and duties of a light description. In 1824, at the suggestion of Lord Colchester, he was appointed, along with Sir Frederick Madden and others, to classify and publish the catalogue of the celebrated Library of the British Museum. He afterward spent much of his time at the Library, where he was accustomed to meet his admirers from America, of whom he had very many. The remainder of his life, until his death, he devoted to making additions to and superintending new editions of his great work, and in writing numerous other volumes. In Allibone's Dictionary of Authors, we find the names of forty-five distinct works of which he was the author or editor. Among them are—

Hints on the formation and management of Sunday Schools, published in 1807; An Introduction to the Study of Bibliography, 1814; The History of the Mohammedan Empire in Spain, 1816; Deism Refuted, or Plain Reasons for being a Christian, 1819; Outlines for the Classification of a Library, 1825; The Conversion of St Paul a Proof of the Truth of the Christian Revelation, 1831; Landscape Illustrations of the Bible, 1835; Jewish and Christian Privileges Compared; An Illustrated Record of Important Events; Popery the Enemy and Falsifier of Scripture, and many other ecclesiastical and Scriptural works.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by the University of Pennsylvania. Amiable in his disposition, courteous in manner, he was universally beloved and respected. He died of bronchitis, a complaint from which he had suffered as far back as 1824.

WHAT IS DYSPEPSIA?

With due attention to temperance, exercise, and early hours, you may set dyspepsia at defiance. Neglect one of these precautions, and you lay yourself open to the approaches of the enemy—neglect two of them, and it is hardly possible that you can escape. And above all things, keep this in mind, that no other disease or affection of the body is so stealthy or insidious as dyspepsia. If the first few instances of carelessness or transgression were to be visited with the pains and penalties that afflict the patient when the malady has become chronic, few men would be so insane, or so obstinately reckless, as to postpone the work of reformation. But the earlier symptoms are rarely of an alarming kind. The appetite is not sensibly affected, though the digestion is impaired; and the complaint seems to be limited to flatulency and heartburn. Such unpleasant sensations, however, can be easily removed. Essence of ginger and fluid magnesia seldom fail to give relief, and the patient flatters himself there is no ground for apprehension. But the symptoms do not disappear. They recur with greater frequency; and the antidotal doses, though increased, are found to have lost their efficacy. The stomach has now become more seriously deranged. All kinds of food generate acid; and in this stage the patient usually has recourse to the carbonates of soda or potash, which in their turn give a temporary relief, though without in any way arresting the disorder. By this means dyspepsia, like an insidious serpent, has fairly folded the victim within its embrace, and is squeezing him at its leisure. Everything he eats disagrees with him, and seems to undergo some wondrous transformation. That which was served up at the table as haggis, seems converted, two hours afterward, into a ball of knotted tow—a mutton chop becomes a fiery crab, rending the interior with his claws; and every rice pudding has the intolerable effrontery to become a hedge-hog. After that comes nausea and vomiting. You derive no benefit from the food you swallow. From twelve stone weight you dwindle down to ten. Your countenance becomes ghastly, your eyes hollow, and you totter prematurely on your pins. The mere notion of exercise becomes distasteful. You feel as if you had no strength for anything. You are pensive, moody, and irritable. Your mind loses its elasticity and power; and when you sit down to compose, instead of manly matter, you produce nothing but the dreariest of drivel.

Blackwood's Magazine.

CURED BY A LAUGH.

A comely young wife, the 'spouseare' of her circle, was in bed, apparently dying from swelling and inflammation of the throat, an inaccessible abscess stopping the way. She could swallow nothing; every thing had been tried. Her friends were standing around the bed in misery and helplessness. "Try her wi' a compliment,' said her husband, in a not uncomic despair. She had genuine humor as well as he; and, as physiologists know there is a sort of mental tickling which is beyond and above control, being under the reflex system, and instinctive as well as singing. She laughed with her whole body and soul, burst the abscess and was well.

WARNING TO THE INTEMPERATE.

Charles Lamb tells his sad experience as a warning to young men in the following language:

"The waters have gone over me. But out of the black depths, could I be heard, I would cry out to all those who have set a foot on the perilous flood. Could the youth, to whom the flavor of the first wine is delicious as the opening scenes of life, or the entering upon some newly discovered paradise, look into my desolation, and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when he shall feel himself going down a precipice, with open eyes and a passive will, to his destruction, and have no power to stop it, and yet feel it all the way emanating from himself; to see all godliness emptied out of him, and yet not able to forget a time when it was otherwise; to bear about the piteous spectacle of his own ruin; could he see my fevered eye, feverish with the last night's drinking, and feverishly looking for to night's repetition of the folly; could he but feel the lobby at the door, at which I beg admittance, before entry to be deliverance, it were enough to make him dash the sparkling beverage to the earth, in all the pride of its mantling temptation."

Harmless mirth is an excellent cordial.

RIDICULE AND REPARTEE.

The fatal fondness for indulging in a spirit of ridicule, and the most unjustifiable consequences which sometimes attend the too prompt reply, can never be too seriously or too severely condemned. Not to offend is the first step toward pleasing. To give pain is as much an offence against humanity as against good breeding, and surely it is as well to abstain from an action because it is sinful, as because it is impolite. A man of sense and breeding will sometimes join in the laugh which has been raised at his expense by an ill-natured repartee; but if it was very cutting, and one of those shocking sort of truths, which, as they can scarcely be pardoned in private, ought never to be uttered in public, he does not laugh because he is pleased, but because he wishes to conceal how much he is hurt. As the sarcasm was uttered by a lady, as far from seeming to resent it, he will be the first to commend it; but, notwithstanding that, he will remember it as a trait of malice, when the whole company shall have forgotten it as a stroke of wit. Women are so far from being privileged by their sex to say unhandsome or cruel things, that it is this very circumstance which renders them more intolerable. When the arrow is lodged in the heart, it is no relief for him that is wounded to reflect that the hand which shot it was a fair one.

Hannah More.

WHAT THE ENGLISHMAN IS AFRAID OF.

Mr. Pyne mentions in his delightful Eighteenth-century gossip, "Wine and Walnuts," a conversation between the King and a favorite German general, whose everlasting theme was the bravery of his English subjects. (George loquitur.) "But, mein general, dere is von ting dat de Briton is afraid of." "Your majesty is under von mistake; der Englishman is not afraid of noting at all." "But I tell you dat he is; and if you keep it ein great secret, I will tell you." "Most honored, your Majesty." "Den you will never tell it to no one at all." "I vill not, your Majesty." "Come closer, den, for fear of any von hearing it—der Englishman is afraid of him's wife."

FEEDING BOXES BETTER THAN RACKS.

Horses do not naturally gather their food from trees—why, then, should they be compelled in winter to take it from a rack overhead? Every mouthful requires the animal to assume an unnatural position, which, with young horses particularly, must interfere with the proper development of the muscles of the neck, and with the graceful carriage of the head. May not the awkward manner in which many horses thrust their noses forward and upward, be attributed to the force of habit acquired in feeding from a high rack? Another serious objection to racks is the danger from the seeds, dust, etc., falling into the eyes of the animal; and further, all the effluvia of the stable, the vapors from liquid and solid excrements, the exhalations from the lungs, pass upward, and are to some extent absorbed by the hay—an addition neither savory nor healthful. The feed-box may be made equally convenient with the rack, and is open to none of the above objections. It need not be made large, and if the bottom be made of slabs, all rejected fodder can be easily removed. A closed box on one side for feeding grain will be needed if the bottom of the main box be left open. The above may seem an unimportant matter to many, but everything is worthy of attention which can add to the comfort and health of the noblest domestic animal.

American Agriculturist.

KEEPING VEGETABLES.

Most persons, says the Country Gentleman, are fond of good vegetables—some relishing one kind better than another—still, all have a liking for one or more kinds. I do not know that I ever knew an individual who had not a fondness for some one of the several sorts that are commonly grown. It is, therefore, very desirable to have them fresh and good through the winter and spring, and well into the summer. This can be done by keeping them in dry sand. My way is to select, in the fall, at the time of digging, those that are nice and smooth, and of suitable size—medium size is best—and pack them in barrels. I then put in dry sand sufficient to fill the barrel, and cover the roots entirely over. When the sand is put in, the barrel should be jogged or shaken a little, so as to cause the sand to fill up the interstices, and exclude the air. Turnips, beets, parsnips and carrots—if any one likes them—can be kept in this way, fresh and good, until well into the summer. We have had turnips the first of August that were as solid and sweet as when first dug, and beets in good cooking condition into July. Parsnips are better if left in the ground through the winter, though it is well to dig a few and keep as above for winter use. Potatoes, I think, should not be treated in this way, as they would be liable to rot. I tried a barrel a year ago last fall, but thought it injured their flavor, and caused decay; they seem to require air.

HOW TO MAKE MONEY.

If you will take a back note, and while you are folding it up according to direction, peruse the following lines, you will arrive at their meaning with no little admiration for the writer's cleverness:

"I will tell you a plan for gaining wealth,
Better than banking, trading or leases;
Take a bank note and fold it up.
And then you will find your wealth increases.

"This wonderful plan, without danger or loss,
Keeps your cash in your hands, and with nothing to risk or,
And every time that you fold it across,
'Tis plain as the light of the day that you double it."

A WORD TO YOUNG MEN.

"What does that young man do for a living?" is the common inquiry, as some foppish, well-dressed individual passes by. "Nothing, nothing at all," is the frequent reply. "But what supports him in his extravagances?" None can tell—but we, being a Yankee, have the privilege of guessing. That young man that dresses in broadcloth, carries a cane, and is so extremely polite to all his acquaintance, especially the ladies—is the son of a man in moderate circumstances, who finds it difficult to sustain himself with a moderate income. His son wishes to be a gentleman," and lives without labor. The father in his folly refuses to put him to a trade, or send him to work on a farm, hoping that something may turn up, by-and-by, when business will be better, for his son to obtain a good living without work. He is now obliged to dispense with the luxuries of life—perhaps with some of its comforts, for his son to keep up appearances, and get into good society, so that kind of company is termed, where young men have nothing to do but to dress according to the latest fashion. He is quite independent, and uses language to his seniors that might be considered unbecoming in a king. He is on all classes and conditions without a blush, and dares to look with contempt on the honest apprentice, whose generous soul would outweigh a thousand as light as his own. The companions he chooses are like himself, puffed up with vanity, swelling with importance, and who make a pretence of doing something, by occasionally visiting a lawyer's office, to read a page or two of Blackstone. I would that such a youth it needs no prophetic vision to see. "It is as plain as the way to market," as Dr. Franklin would say, that he will turn out a low, despised, and miserable tool. Perhaps the Penitentiary will bring him up, perhaps the gallows. But if he escape these, it will be to hang like an incubus on those of his friends, who for pity's sake, have not the heart to send him where he deserves.

"ONLY MOTHER:"

OR, THE FIRST LESSONS IN DRILLING.

The July sun was almost overhead in the heavens, drinking up the water from the little brooks, and fairly scorching the short grass in the pastures. The cattle left feeding in the meadow and stood knee-deep in the pond, where the thick shadows of the wood fell over it. It was far too warm to work, or even to play, so the boys who had been standing all the morning with their fish ing lines dangling over the railing of the bridge, put up their hooks and threw themselves down in the cool shade of the old elms on the bank. They made a very pretty picture as they lay there, with their shirt collars unbuttoned, and their moist hair pushed back from their flushed faces. One of them, Willie Downer, had a pictorial newspaper in his pocket, with large engravings of the companies of soldiers at Washington, their camp grounds, flags, and cannon, and the uniforms they wore. He spread the paper on the grass, and began explaining the pictures to his companion, Archie Morris.

"If I was only old enough," said Willie, earnestly, "I should enlist for a soldier. It would be so grand to go and fight for the country, and defend our liberties. Don't you wish you were a man, Archie?"

"Yes," said Archie, "I should like to be a man, but mother says we need not wait till that time to be brave; we can show courage now."

"I know," said Willie; "cousin Lyman joined the company, and he is only three years older than I, but then he is as tall as father, every bit."

"That wasn't what mother meant," said Archie; "she said a good soldier must be ready to undertake any duty, and it took a great deal more courage to do little disagreeable things than to march up in the face of an enemy to battle. Then she said the first duty of every soldier was to learn to obey orders, and that is just what we boys are doing."

Willie looked a good deal dissatisfied, and did not seem to like this view of the matter; but just at this moment somebody came to the door of one of the white cottages just below the bridge, and called, "Willie! Willie!" He did not stir, but went on examining the paper.

"Somebody called you, Willie," said Archie, looking toward the house.

"It's only mother," replied Willie; "she wants me to go of some errand, and I am not going out in this hot sun."

Archie looked at him a moment in astonishment, and then asked, "But what will she say when you go home?"

"O," said Willie, carelessly, "she won't know that I heard her, for I did not turn my head a bit."

"She is going to the spring for water," said Archie, still watching the house, "I would scratch my face to a blister before I would lie here and let my mother do that."

"Pooh!" said Willie, "that's nothing; she is so used to being over the hot stove that she don't mind it much."

Just then a woman with a baby in her arms came to the window of the other cottage and called Archie.

"Ay, ay!" said Archie, springing up, and swinging his hat towards the house.

"Don't go yet, Archie," said Willie; "just wait till we finish this paper; it won't make any difference."

"I'm learning to obey orders," said Archie; "besides I know mother wants me to take care of the baby while she gets dinner."

"I do hate baby tending; it's girl's work," said Willie.

"So is cooking and washing clothes, but the soldiers have to do both. Right about face!" said he, shouldering his fish pole, and starting for home, "my company has received marching orders."

"Just in time, Archie," said his mother, placing the baby in his arms. "I see my volunteer means to be on hand whenever his orders come."

Now, Archie really disliked tending baby very much, especially on such a warm day, when it took all his patience and ingenuity to amuse his little brother, made unusually fretful by the heat. But one glance into the heated kitchen, where his mother was busy over the glowing stove, made him think himself very fortunate to be able to remain in the sitting-room, with closed blinds and open windows. But baby was not at all pleased with the darkened room. He would not sit on the floor and roll Archie's ball; he would not laugh at all at Archie's antics and grimaces, he wanted to be carried, and carried he must be.

"Come on then," said Archie, tossing him to his shoulders. "Now I'm on a forced march from Washington to Texas, and this is my knapsack and blanket. Heavy load—hot weather—mercury up to 500 degrees in the shade—whole army of secessioners running away from us—bound to get there before morning—band strike up Yankee Doodle"—and he commenced rapidly pacing the room, whistling Yankee Doodle, to baby's great satisfaction.

Just as he was beginning to find it pretty hard work, the door opened, and his sister Sarah came in from school. "Turn out and relieve guard," said Archie, dropping the baby into her lap, and throwing himself full length on the carpet.

"You're full of your war nonsense," said Sarah, laughing.

"O, well," said Archie, "anything to amuse baby and keep a fellow good-natured this hot weather."

DOMESTIC DUTIES.

A knowledge of domestic duties, says Mrs. Child, is beyond all price to a woman. Every one of our sex ought to know how to sew, and knit and mend, and cook, and superintend a household. In every situation of life, high or low, this sort of knowledge is of great advantage. There is no necessity that the gaining of such information should interfere with intellectual acquirement or elegant accomplishment. A well regulated mind can find time for all. When a girl is nine or ten years old, she should be accustomed to take some regular share in household duties, and to feel responsible for the manner in which her part is performed, such as her own mending, washing the cups and putting them in place, cleaning silver or dusting and arranging parlors. This should not be occasionally, and neglected whenever she feels it convenient; she should consider it her department. When older than twelve, girls should begin to take turn in superintending the household, making puddings, pies, cake, etc.; to learn effectually to do these things themselves, and not stand by and see others do them.

NURSERY THOUGHTS.

One of the oddest things about very little children is their passion for hearing the same story told in successions a dozen times within an hour; and their positive refusal of the alteration of a word in the narration, which, by the way, they are lynx-eyed to detect. It is worth while to watch the face of a little one, listening to the favorite story, to mark the flitting expression of the face, the mirthful kindling of the eye, or the tragic little mouth, when the dish of appetizing horrors is brought on. All this past time is very well now and then, but a child so quickly moved should not be unduly excited in this way, particularly just before retiring to rest, when uneasy dreams may be the consequence. Moreover, it is a great temptation to the child-experimentalist, if I may apply this term to those fond of studying them. Such do not always remember how delicate is the brain thus stimulated for a passing amusement. It is hard to keep from talking with an interesting child, or answering the questions it industriously propounds. The trouble is, that such childish curiosity can be the seed-corn of [illegible] amusement. A wise parent or guardian will see [illegible] there, the brain [illegible] amusement.

How the little creatures will plead to "sit up," when their eyes are heavy with sleep, and their heads are swaying about like flowers on their stems. How valorously they will deny it all and [illegible] succumb to the ignominious bed of ruth—and how gratefully happy are they for a respite as they lie in your lap, listening to the pleasant parlor hum of voices. It is only a very conscientious person or a child hater, who can decisively introduce them to the abhorred nightgown at this interesting crisis. Alas! it is so hard to love a child wisely. It is so hard to refuse that which gratifies so much, even when we know it is harmful. And what a marvel that we see as many children as we do, grow up healthy, and happy, and good, in spite of that miscalled "fondness" for them, which is too apt suddenly to evaporate, when this injudicious indulgence brings forth its legitimate fruits—petulance and obstinacy.

HOME AFTER BUSINESS HOURS.

The road along which the man of business travels in pursuit of competence or wealth is not a meadowned one, nor does it ordinarily lead through pleasant scenes and by well-springs of delight. On the contrary it is a rough and rugged path, beset with "wait-a-bit" thorns, and full of pitfalls, which can only be avoided by the exercise of watchful care and circumspection. After each day's journey over this worse than corduroy turnpike, the wayfarer needs something more than rest. He requires solace, and deserves it. He is weary of the dull prose of life, and athirst for the poetry. Happy is the business man who can find that solace and that poetry at home. Warm greetings from the loving hearth, fond glances from bright eyes that

"Mark our coming,
And look brighter when we come!"

the welcome shouts of children, the thousand little arrangements for our comfort and enjoyment that silently tell of thoughtful and expectant love; the gentle ministrations that disincumber us into an old and cosy nest before we are aware of it—these and like tokens of affection and sympathy constitute the poetry which reconciles us to the prose of life. Think of this, ye wives and daughters of business men. Think of the toils, the anxieties, the mortifications and woes that fathers undergo to secure for you comfortable houses, and compensate them for their trial by making them happy by their own firesides.

BIOGRAPHY OF DR. CHALMERS.

We all, both young and older people, like to know as much as we can of the lives of those who have been great and distinguished in the world: and good persons like especially to know the histories of those who have been at once great and good. Such a one was Dr. Thomas Chalmers. I propose to give my young readers a sketch of his life.

Thomas Chalmers, you may perhaps know, was a Scotsman. He was one of the greatest preachers of his time. He was also a man of great piety and benevolence. He did a great deal of good in his lifetime. There are many persons yet living who have seen him, and heard him preach. I once stood two hours in one of the aisles or passages of a church in Edinburgh, hearing him preach a charity sermon. The church was so crowded that many were standing in the aisles, too happy if they could but listen to so eloquent a preacher. Would not you like to know something more about him? This wish I proceed to gratify.

DR. CHALMERS AS A CHILD.

Thomas Chalmers was born at Anstruther, in Scotland, on the 17th of March, 1780. He was the sixth of fourteen children, all of the same father and mother. When he was two years old, he was committed to the care of a nurse who treated him cruelly. Her cruelty and deceitfulness to him he remembered throughout life. Even in his latest years, he used to tell how inhumanly she treated him; and how, when he was roused sometimes by her cruelty, to run and complain of her treatment of him to his parents, she would stop him and pet him, and pour over him, as he expressed it, "a perfect flood of affected tenderness," extorting from him a promise that he would not tell, and after getting his promise, (which was never broken,) she treated him worse than ever.

This treatment by his nurse was the cause of his being sent to school at the early age of three years, to which he went of his own accord; not drawn by love of learning, but driven by the fear of his nurse's persecution. The ways of his first teacher were not favorable to his progress in learning. He had been, it would seem, an effective teacher, but his days as a good teacher were nearly over. His sight, which he afterwards entirely lost, was beginning to fail. At that time, there was far more flogging done in school, than is now a days. Of young Tom's first teacher it is said, that his thirst for flogging grew with the decline of his sight, and survived its loss. He would creep stealthily about behind a row of little boys, listening, (for he could not see,) for each indication given by word or motion, of a punishable offence, and ready, as soon as he ascertained whom to strike, to inflict the avenging blow. But the quick-sighted urchins were too cunning for him, and soon fell on a contrivance to enable each other to escape his vengeance. In the row opposite to that behind which the master took his walk, one of the boys was set to watch; and whenever, by his sudden stop or uplifted arm, the master showed an intention to strike, the boy in front gave a signal to the intended victim, which enabled him to slip at once noiselessly out of his place, so that to his enraged discomfiture, and to the no small amusement of his scholars, the master's best aimed blows fell upon the hard, unfleshing desk. After some time, this old teacher got a young assistant, who was as easy as the other was harsh. Both were, as teachers, equally inefficient. The consequence was, that our young friend, Tom Chalmers, neglected his lessons; so that when the time came to recite them, they were but half learned; although when he did set himself to learn, not one of all his school-fellows could do it at once so quickly and so well. By his school-fellows who survived him, he was remembered as one of the idlest, strongest, merriest and most generous-hearted boys in Anstruther school.

I will tell you more of Dr. Chalmers in a future number.

RICHES AND HAPPINESS.

We recollect hearing our mother tell a story which her father often told his children, about a poor, but happy cobbler. This poor cobbler, as he worked away at his trade making a living for his family, was always singing. A rich neighbor, who often passed his little shop and heard him singing, stepped in one day and asked the cobbler why he seemed so happy, and why he was always singing? The answer the cobbler gave was, that he had enough work to supply the wants of his little family, and he was content with this; and, therefore, he could sing all the time. This rich man thought he would test the effect of money on the cobbler's happiness. So one day he contrived to place in the cobbler's bench twenty guineas. The cobbler found them, and wondered how they came there, and what to do with them. He did not sing any more—he was unhappy. In a few days his rich neighbor called on him again, and asked him why he did not hear him sing any more? The poor cobbler told him about the twenty guineas which he found on his work bench, and that he could not sing for thinking about them. The rich man told him that he placed them there to see the effect. Immediately the cobbler resumed them to his workbench and said, that he would not sacrifice his happy ease for money, and that must take them back. After that the cobbler sang as much as ever.

Now, dear children, you see that riches do not always bring happiness. No, indeed, we can only find happiness by being contented with our lot, whatever it may be, and by being God's children. We hope none of our little readers envy those who are richer than themselves. And, boys, if you set [illegible] in the South [illegible] and [illegible] heart purified, [illegible] pure [illegible] parents are rich; and you, nicely dressed little girl, with your beautiful bonnet and silk dress, do not despise that little girl who has only a calico dress to wear; for God loves poor children as much as rich ones, if they love him. God loves all children who love him. We want you all to love God.

From the Youth's Evangelist.

A SISTER'S INFLUENCE.

We have a word to say to our sweet little girls. We say our girls, because we consider that we have an interest in you all. We know something about the influence which a sister has over a brother, as we have experienced it ourselves. Never shall we forget the love and cherish our sister for their love and kindness to us. Often when we were about to do something which was wrong, the influence of a sister has kept us from committing the sin. Often have the words of encouragement, spoken by a sister, cheered us on to work and toil to accomplish a difficult task, when we were almost ready to give up in despair.

Now, dear little girls, you who have brothers, will you not try and remember that you have great influence over your brothers? It may be that you think you have no influence over them, because they do not heed what you say to them always, and because they sometimes speak roughly to you. But this is not so. Your brothers may be thoughtless when they are engaged in their sports, and may speak heedlessly when they are in a hurry to join their companions in their plays; but still they love you, and are very ready to take your part when any one tries to impose on you. If you possess this influence, try, oh try, to use it for the good of your brothers. Try and get them to learn their lessons for both Sabbath and day schools. Try and keep them from doing any thing that is wrong, and when they grow up to be men they will bless you for your good teachings, and your kind, loving warnings, given them in their youthful days.

A STORY FOR GIRLS.

Laura Burford was the eldest child of parents who had once been wealthy, but who were at this time very poor. Mr. Burford, for long months, had been an invalid, unable even to rise from his bed. Mrs Burford was obliged to spend most of her time assisting her neighbors in their household duties to get something to support the four dear ones depending on her. This left two little brothers almost entirely in Laura's care.

She was about nine years old, but she was a little woman in her conduct towards them, neglecting nothing which she thought would be for their good. They loved her dearly, and gave heed to her instructions. Her parents did not love God, nor teach their little ones about Him. But Laura had been at the Sabbath School when she was younger, and had there heard about the blessed Jesus.

She told Eddie and Nathan, of His coming to earth to die for sinners, then ascending into heaven where he now pleads for us. Every morning, when Laura had finished her work, she would take these little boys to the side of her bed and pray with them, teaching them also how to pray. She had a great deal of faith that God would hear and answer her prayers. One evening when her father was worse than usual, Mrs Burford remained away longer than usual. Night approached, but she did not come. Laura became uneasy, not knowing how to send word of her father's illness. She knelt down and told her heavenly Father all about it. She then sat down, much happier, to await her mother's return. Mrs Burford feeling very tired, had decided to remain all night; but after awhile, an anxiety for which she could not account, filled her mind. She said she must go home, though she could not tell why. Upon arriving there, she found her husband sick, and was glad she had not remained. Laura did not tell her of her prayer, but her faith in God was still stronger. Many instances could be given of answers to her prayers; of her goodness and usefulness, but I will not give them for fear of tiring you. Her father died when she was about eleven years old, but through Laura's influence, died trusting in his Saviour.

Mrs. Burford lived to an advanced age, a consistent Christian. Her sons, Eddie and Nathan, grew up to be active in the church, and useful members of society, always remembering with gratitude the good example and instructions of their sister Laura.

Girls, have you any little brothers and sisters? If so will you show them the way to heaven? Will you not lead them to the blessed Jesus?

BAUGH'S
RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE OF
MANUFACTURED FROM UNBURNED BONES
BY BAUGH & SONS,
Wholesale office and Store, 20-8 Wharves, between Market and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.
CASH PRICE $45 PER 2000 POUNDS. (2½ CTS PER POUND.)
In the preparation of this Valuable Manure, BONES ARE USED IN THEIR RAW STATE ONLY. They have never been boiled or calcined. They are taken as nature has made them, crushed with powerful machinery, and subjected to a process, by which, while all the virtues of the bone is retained, a Fertilizer is procured, furnishing in a concentrated and soluble form, the two indispensable ingredients for the growth of Plants and enriching the soil—the phosphoric acid and ammonia. These two ingredients, by the use of BAUGH'S RAW BONE SUPER-PHOSPHATE, are given to the soil in all their original strength and purity. They assimilate at once with the soil, furnish all the needful ammonia for the growing crop, give it ample nutriment, and leave the land permanently benefited, so that its presence can be traced for years afterwards.

Downingtown, Chester County, Pa., April 9th, 1860.
Messrs Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—I have been using your article of Super Phosphate on wheat and corn for several seasons, and am well satisfied of its value as an active and "quick" fertilizer. I have applied it on wheat at the rate of 200 pounds per acre, as top-dressing to a heavy coat of barn yard manure, kept dry and under cover, and the result was, that by harvest the wheat where the Phosphate was put, was much the better headed and heavier, while the grain was taken more strongly than on the other portion of the field. I have also used the Phosphate by the side of Peruvian Guano, each in the same quantity, and in regard to both grain and straw, the action of your preparation was much the more satisfactory. In corn, by experience in its use for some years, it pays well for its use, as I have said before. I am, Gentlemen, yours respectfully,
ISAAC T. LEWIS.

Northern Square, Delaware Co., Pa., July 23d, 1860.
Messrs Baugh & Sons: Being unable to get manure to test some prepared manures offered for sale, I was induced by your agent to make a trial of those different kinds, which I did on wheat, side by side in the same field. I purchased Peruvian Guano and your Phosphate of Lime (one of the most popular in use) together with your Bone Dust Super Phosphate, and used them as above stated. During the growing, as well as the gathering of the crop, the test resulted much in favor of the latter.
But whether it is from the seeds used alone in preparing, or in the superior quality of the material used in your Raw Bone Super Phosphate I am unable; but be it ever [illegible] I pay [illegible] of my trials, thinking that others may be induced to make similar experiments, and in my opinion, greatly to the agricultural interests of the whole country.
Yours, &c., JAMES DUNWODY.

Plymouth, Montgomery Co., Pa., August 10th, 1860.
Baugh & Sons: Gentlemen,—Having used your Super Phosphate bought of Jno. W. Christman, at the Montgomery Agricultural Works, on wheat and corn, I can with pleasure recommend it. The effect is produced was as manifest, that it greatly increased our crop. Where it was applied on Fertilizer [illegible] Where it was applied on the corn, I am satisfied the yield was fully double.
Very respectfully, DAVID MARLER.

THAT CITY.

BY M. L. FARNELEE.

I know her walls are jasper,
Her palaces are fair,
And to the sound of harpings
The saints are singing there;
I know that living waters
Flow under fruitful trees—
But ah! to make my heaven,
It needeth more than these.

Read on the sacred story,
What more doth it unfold,
Beside the pearly gateways,
And the streets of shining guld?
No temple hath that City,
For none is needed there.
No sun nor moon enlighteneth,
Can darkness then be fair?

Ah! now the glad revealing,
The crowning joy of all,
What need of other sunlight
Where God is all in all?
He fills the wide ethereal
With glory all his own,
He whom my soul adoreth,
The Lamb amidst the throne!

O! heaven without my Saviour
Would be no heaven to me!
Dark were the walls of jasper,
Rayless the crystal sea;
He gilds earth's darkest valley
With light, and joy, and peace;
What, then, must be the radiance
When night and death shall cease?

Speed on, O! lagging moments,
Come birth-day of the soul!
How long the night appeareth!
The hours, how slow they roll!
How sweet the welcomed summons
That greet the willing bride,
And when mine eyes behold Him,
I shall be satisfied!

LONGING FOR GLORY.

FROM THE HYMN BOOK OF 1776.

O when shall I with God appear,
And in His presence shine?
When, Lord, shall I thy supper share,
And lose my life in thine?

My body, soul and spirit longs
For everlasting day;
I, waiting, pass with mournful songs
My tedious time away.

Others may love the things below,
And be on earth content;
But 'tis not with my spirit so;
I wail my banishment!

Yet if the holy counsel be,
That I this cross must bear,—
Amen! lay what thou will on me,
Only, my God, be near!

I would not murmur, I would wait
Till thy salvation come;
Till thou shalt change my helpless state,
And take my spirit home.

I long to leave this wretched world;
To banquet on thy love!
I long to see my Saviour's face,
And all his goodness prove.

I long to flee to thee, my Lord,
Where griefs shall all be o'er!
When I shall see the happy land,
And mourn and weep no more.

To see my friends, the saints in light,
And full perfection know;
While from my heart, in ceaseless streams,
The well of life shall flow.

PUNISHMENT AND DISCIPLINE OF CHILDREN.

From the German of Thiersch. By Rev. G. A. Wenzel.

Christian education is preservation, but an essential part of the governing activity is chastisement.

We build on the proper foundation when we regard our children as also the children of God. "Reckon ye yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord." This injunction we must regard, both, as concerning us and our children. For that which justifies us in applying it to ourselves, justifies us also in applying it to our children. "Know ye not that so many of us as were baptised into Jesus Christ, were baptised into His death? Therefore we are buried with Him by baptism into death; our old man is crucified with Him,—that henceforth we should not serve sin." Rom. 6: 1, 6, 11.

Whence then comes the necessity of discipline, and whence is sin, which renders discipline necessary? Christian discipline is necessary, in order that the old man, who by a Divine act was given over to death, may not again come to life. For it has been put to death and laid at our feet in such a way, that when we relapse into unbelief, we can call it back to life again, and permit sin to resume its dominion over us, which will be more cruel and oppressive than before. What Christ has once conquered and destroyed by his bitter sufferings should not be again recalled to life and raised from the grave by us. Since we are, however, even as renewed creatures, still frail instruments, watchfulness and discipline is necessary to do this. This is the true meaning of all self-correction or asceticism, to exercise and confirm us in our victory over the old Adam. This is the object of all Divine chastisements; as well as of all we inflict upon others. And as necessary as Divine chastisements are for us, just so necessary are they for our children.

Hence, those teachers, who would do away with all punishment, at least, with all corporeal punishment, as a means of training, are deserving of no attention. Discipline and punishment are nearly synonymous terms, so nearly, that all discipline is punishment, but every punishment is certainly not discipline. Both include retribution and the declaration of righteousness, yet with this difference, that with discipline we inwardly associate the idea of the fraternal intention to save, to purify and heal, whilst we can conceive of punishment being inflicted without this intention, simply as a judicial maintenance of the law. In this sense, punishment is not to be inflicted as a means of training; for here all punishment emanates from paternal authority, and must therefore be nothing but an emanation from a paternal heart.

The Holy Scriptures express themselves in the strongest terms in favor of the necessity of using the disciplinary rod. What then is the meaning of that tenderness and backwardness which demands a system of training without the rod? It can only be explained on the ground, that there is a feeling and fault of despair which does not believe in a judgment and an Eternal Judge, "which has nothing to preach about the wrath of God," which denies to government the right of exercising retributive justice, strips all judiciary punishments of their judicial earnestness, and by necessary consequence denies to the father the right to punish, and which would also do away with the earnestness and salutary rigor of punishments in the training of children.

The objection is raised, that corporeal chastisements do not produce moral effects, but operate only upon the senses, and that those so chastised will only avoid evil from a dread of bodily pain, and that this encourages them to act from physical and not from moral motives, thus producing just the opposite of what morality requires and education is designed to accomplish.

This objection, however, only holds good against the most barbarous modes of punishment; for those who urge it, see, so to speak, only the child and the rod, and seem to have respect to nothing else. They overlook him who punishes and the relation which he sustains to the one punished. If the punishment is of the right kind, it then produces not only an effect on the senses, but through the physical terror and pain is inflicts, it also excites and heightens the consciousness that we are amenable to a moral power, a righteous judge and an inviolable law. It does not dissolve, but rather strengthens the moral bond by which the child is united to the father, as it is a fact well attested by general experience, that strict fathers are most beloved. It confirms no one in the false maxim, to act in a way, so as to avoid that which is physically unpleasant, but whilst the physical pain is soon past, the serious impression, which enables the one chastised to overcome returning temptations remains.

There is a discipline of Christ to which we are subjected. He chastises us severely as often as we need it, and sends such visitations, which whilst they are not the least painful, most effectually mortify the desires of the flesh. And yet He chastises in moderation, for He does not afflict willingly, and as soon as He sees that we humble ourselves and acknowledge our faults, He refreshes us again with his consolations, so that we may know how gracious the Lord is. Thus he deals with us, and the Scriptures say, "Ye fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" which means, chastise them as the Lord chastises you, admonish them as the Lord admonishes you. Let yourselves be trained by Christ, and learn of Him, both the rigor and tenderness of true discipline. Imitate Him, yield yourselves up as his instrument, and He will bring up your children by you. Whatever we might say in addition, would only be a weak attempt to explain the signification of this Divine injunction.

Chastise severely when necessary; but not in a passionate and bitter mood. "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." James 1: 20. The anger of a man, though apparently a genuine moral feeling, does not produce that moral fruit which it is intended to produce. Wrath begets wrath, and bitterness exasperates. All the benefit of punishment is lost, when it, instead of being the application of a higher and holy law, is only the sudden ebullition of a sinful temper. Put away wrath, and let the fear of God rule within you; then only can you be instruments in His hand, and your chastisement shall become a blessing. Neither should you chastise from motives of disappointed ambition, being vexed, because more particularly your children do this or that, but humble your spirit and mourn over what has happened, before God. If your child has been humbled, let it again see and feel your entire love, even as God does with you when you accept his chastisements. If your child has been made momentarily unhappy, you should take care that it experiences increased happiness in the renewed enjoyment of your paternal love. In this way it becomes convinced that the punishment it craves, elsewhere: it will overleap the protecting barrier of the family, and soon find beyond it other comforters, friends, teachers and models, who will occupy the place which father, mother, sisters and brothers, ought to occupy, and pull down with ease what is built up at home. No necessary is it that the paternal mansion presents to the child a real home, that it be made the abode of its happiness and the place around which shall cluster the most pleasing recollections of its life. And it takes, in reality, but little to make a well trained child happy, and to attach it to its home. The want of this attachment may, to a degree, at least, be ascribed to poverty, but is more generally the result of an irritable, quarrelsome and worldly minded temper displayed by parents.

Our chastisement, to be like that administered by Christ, must be just. It must be inflicted with firmness and no formity not treating the same case at one time with severity, and at another with indulgence. It should be proportioned to the fault; far be it from us to fall into that gross practice which rates the harm perpetrated by dollars and cents, visiting, for instance, with condign punishment some inadvertency by which a trifling pecuniary loss is sustained, and remaining indifferent when an actual sin, such as telling a lie and cruelty to animals, has been committed. Far from us too be that folly, which, in the presence of strangers, or in strange houses, forthwith scolds about things, which, in the absence of strange witnesses, has been permitted to pass altogether unnoticed. We have received the sacred trust of training our children from Christ, for which reason we must look to Him and not to men, and in the balance of his law weigh guilt and innocence.

Frequent threats and passionate outbreaks (a habit to which most mothers are unfortunately addicted) are of no use. It produces indifference in children, weakens the mother's authority, while she prepares for herself endless trouble and vexation, which might otherwise be avoided. Her maternal heart hesitates to inflict severe punishment and therefore leaves her threats unfulfilled. But as a general thing severe punishments are not required. A very light punishment punctually administered, and in case the offence is repeated, again inflicted, will effect that which can never be attained by threats. Nor is it necessary that every punishment should consist in blows, when slight deprivations will be felt as much and make as deep or rather deeper impression of a deserved chastisement.

In cases of minor importance the mother should not immediately, whilst those of a more serious nature should be referred to the father. She should never conceal from her husband whatever transpires for fear of troubling him; for he must bear this burden. His is both the power and the duty to use the rod of correction; a duty, which he may not throw off under the pretence of other labors. No fears need be entertained, lest he should by such appeals of the mother to his tribunal, become a bug bear to his children, as long as he lives as a father ought to live among his children, participating in the pleasures of their prosperity and good behavior.

If a severe punishment should ever become necessary, it should be inflicted in a spirit of forbearance and not in the presence of brothers, sisters and servants, that the culprit may not lose self-respect. As a wholesome measure to deter others from offending, it may suffice to let them have some inkling of what is being done. In letting them be witnesses to the punishment, they are in danger, (as in the case with all public punishments) of easily learning to regard it with diabolical pleasure; moreover, the least demonstration of joy at his misfortune or mockery on the part of the spectators would only exasperate the culprit and weaken his sense of self respect.

THE SABBATH A PRIMEVAL INSTITUTION

In the sacred scriptures we may be expected in a concise history we often find the most important facts recorded, and the most important principles laid down in a few plain words, which to the inattentive reader, may have the appearance of a mere accidental note. And what many who are not entire neglecters of the Bible have read the first two verses of the second chapter of Genesis, without supposing that the passage contained the original institution of the Sabbath. Others may have been taught to regard the Sabbath as having been here instituted, but, supposing that it would require a process of reasoning too subtle and intricate for them to undertake, they may have closed the book without having been enlightened. Let us enter on the inquiry.

After the account of the creation of all things, which is given in the first chapter, the sacred historian proceeds: "Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the hosts of them." All the parts of the creation—the sun, the moon and stars, with the various creatures here below, were arranged and regularly disposed by Infinite Wisdom, so as to occupy their proper places, and perform their various evolutions, revolutions and movements with order and beauty, like a well disciplined army. This is, at least, one reason why they are called a "host." Having noticed this, the historian proceeds to state: "And the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and on the seventh day he rested from all his works which he had made." Why is this particularly noted? It was implied in the preceding verse: because, when God's work was "finished," he, of course, had "ended it," and "entered on his rest." Let us inquire into the import of the word "rest," when applied to God. It must at once be apparent that it cannot have precisely the same meaning as when applied to men; but it must have some meaning at which we can readily arrive from its known use among men. Pure spirits, so far as we know, are never wearied by exertion. We are positively told that the "Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary." God cannot, therefore, be understood as resting on account of exhaustion or fatigue, like a weary man. But two ideas are intended to be conveyed to our minds—that he ceased from his work because it was finished, and took complacency in it, because, as we were before told, "he saw that it was good." The latter is chiefly intended; for it is only when we are satisfied with the labors of the day which has come to a close, that we can be said to "rest," or enjoy rest. But why was this told us? No sufficient reason can be given but this—to show us the obligation which devolves on us, in consequence of his example, to work six days and rest on the seventh. And not only so, but to follow our worldly employments on six days with care and diligence, studying, the meanwhile, to have a conscience void of offence both toward God and men, that when the labors of the six days are finished, we may enter on the seventh with peaceful minds. This latter idea should never be overlooked. That this lesson might be taught us—a lesson which would have saved thousands and millions of our race from destruction and misery, had they learned it in time—six days were employed in the work of creation. But for this, the Infinite One could have commanded the whole creation into existence in the twinkling of an eye. He could as easily have said, Let the world be, as "Let there be light;" and, in a moment, the heavens and the earth, and all the hosts of them, would have sprung into existence.

But the historian still proceeds: "And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made." What does this mean? The word bless has two significations in the scriptures. It expresses the homage of an inferior acknowledging his dependence on, and obligations to, a superior. But this cannot be its meaning here. 2. To pronounce a blessing on others. This is the idea intended. God pronounced the seventh to be a blessed day,—declared good things concerning it—declared that it would be a good day for those who should observe it—a blessed day, and a day of blessing to the sons of men. Moreover, he "sanctified" it. There are also in the scriptures two, and only two uses of the word sanctify. 1. To make inherently holy, to infuse positive holiness. But rational creatures only can be the subjects of such sanctification. Thus believers are sanctified; but thus a day cannot be sanctified. We must therefore take the other signification of the word, which is to consecrate or set apart from common to holy uses or purposes. Thus the seventh day was distinguished from the other days of the week. Whilst they were allotted to the common purposes of life, the seventh day was set apart for holy or sacred uses.

Now, the Creator did all this, either on his own account, or for the sake of his rational creatures. It could not be on his own account; for all time is alike holy to him. He has no need of a day periodically recurring to call his mind to holy meditations. And he does not need a rest from his labors and toils. We cannot suppose that he intended to mark it as a day on which, throughout all ages, he would intermit his providential agency, and take complacency in contemplating his works. Such a supposition would be alike contrary to reason and scripture—that is, that on the seventh day, the system of nature could subsist, and the course of nature move on, without his upholding and guiding hand. Therefore, it must have been for the sake of his rational creatures—for men or for angels. Whether the angels keep a Sabbath or not, we cannot tell; but our Saviour assures us "that the Sabbath was made for man."

What then have we here but the institution of the Sabbath? We have a day sanctioned by the example of God himself as a day of rest—a day concerning which he declared good things—a day in the observance of which men would "receive blessings from God," and be made partakers of spiritual good things—a day set apart from common to holy uses;—which make up the full idea of a Sabbath. This was before God had a peculiar people—before the introduction of ceremonial rites. The Sabbath is a primeval institution, like marriage, and the dominion of man over the lower orders of creation. It was not made for the Jewish nation, but for man, for mankind. Hence its origin was coeval with that of the human race. It is as old as the creation; and it is to continue till the heavens and the earth "shall wax old as doth a garment." D.

GEMS FROM CUMMING

We are now building for eternity, we are building for happiness or woe. Whilst I speak and write, and you read or hear, time is fast rushing away. The clock of St. Paul's Cathedral does not strike any one hour within hearing of the same people in whose hearing it struck the last hour. Two or three that heard it strike at eleven never heard it strike twelve; two or three that hear it strike twelve will not hear it strike one. There is a ceaseless funeral march, a continuous procession of souls to the judgment seat; and if our eyes were opened we should see the whole air peopled with souls rushing to the judgment; and if our ears were unstopped we could hear the trumpet of judgment summoning every moment to the Great White Throne.

CHRISTIANITY is not a thing of fits and starts, but a persistent power. It is not the electric element gathered into a jar, that sparkles on the Sabbath when touched by the wand of the preacher; but like the electric element in the shape of gravitation, binding orbs into harmony, giving fertility to the poorest soil, and order, harmony, and beauty to all things. The sea-bird will soon scream where great capitals stand; and the hoarse voice of the raven will be heard where cathedrals and churches now are; but the soul—that which is really me—never dies; but lives in the brightness of glory or in the agony of misery for ever and for ever.

All life is a journey, not a home; it is a road, not the country; and those transient enjoyments which you have in this life, lawful in their way, those incidental and evanescent pleasures which you may partake not home, they are little more than refreshments on the roadside. Life, where you are to-day, for a moment, that you may take again the pilgrim's staff and journey on seeking what is still before you,—the rest that remaineth for the people of God.

God is everywhere, and everywhere acting. The foolish notion of many is that God made the world, wound it up like a watch, and then left it to uncoil itself as it may, or that he set the shipping out, and then left it to make the best of its way to a haven. God is, and acts in all that is supremely minute, and in all that is magnificently great. God is as present to-day on an organ's tear as he is to wheel that star in its orbit, or to listen to you archangel's song. He pours out every vial; He sounds every trumpet; He is disentangling every complication; He is overruling all things to the glory of His name and to the good of His cause. It is this thought that gives one comfort. If you have a relative tossed upon the deck on a tempestuous sea on the inhospitable Euxine; if you have a near and dear one in the trenches or in that thin line of my countrymen at Balaklava; if you have a beloved friend amid all the perils of shot, and shell, and rifle;—you may be just as convinced as you are of your own existence, that he can neither be touched by shot, nor shell, nor sabre, until the moment comes when God has no more use for him. What Louis Napoleon, the sagacious Emperor of the French said—not, I fear, upon the same ground upon which I state it—is a magnificent truth: "I am immortal till I have finished my mission."

"CAST THY BREAD UPON THE WATERS."

AN INTERESTING INCIDENT.

The remark, "that republics are ungrateful" has almost passed into a proverb; with what degree of truth, I have never been able to determine; but that despotic governments are not ungrateful, I think the incident to be related will show.

Some years since, an individual might have been seen traversing the hills and valleys of our state, collecting, as he went along, specimens of the many plants and flowers so abundant in Pennsylvania. For many months he continued his labors, seemingly absorbed with the one pursuit. Many attempts were made to induce him to prolong his stay in certain localities, but he rather avoided than encouraged every effort made with a view to establish social friendships. He found it less difficult, however, to avoid the influence of his admirers than the noxious miasma of the fields—the pestilence which flieth like an arrow. Like our own Wilson, exposure and arduous labors proved too much for his unacclimated system, soon prostrating him, so that he was compelled to seek an asylum in the nearest habitation. His sickness assumed a formidable character. Despite the attention bestowed upon him, he gradually sank, and in a few short weeks the spirit of the traveller had passed away.

The friend under whose roof he died was a stranger to his history, except that he was a subject of Austria, and his only request was to have his papers, and particularly the plants and flowers placed in a box, and given in charge of the resident consul. He complied with his wish; the subject was soon forgotten, and, as he thought, forgotten forever.

Three years passed away, a father loud and hasty summons at the door announced an individual desiring to be introduced to the head of the family.

"Do you recollect," said he, "an individual that abode under your roof some three years ago, who died whilst in your house?" Our friend replied, that he did, and "regretted that he was unable to give more attention to his wants, perchance, he would have been restored to health, or at least his life might have been prolonged until he should have been restored to his home and kindred."

"My master, the Emperor of Austria, has heard how kindly you received and cared for his subject; he has commissioned me to place in your hands this package, which you will receive as a token of regard for the kindness which you have manifested. Accept it as a memento of his friend's untimely death, and your hospitality." The gift, for such it was, proved to be a most costly and exquisitely made snuff box. It was a golden box, six inches long, four inches broad, by two inches in depth.

The lid is formed of a solid plate of what appears to be agate, on which is impressed as it were, a bouquet of flowers most delicately inlaid; various flowers composed of precious stones of different colors. Around the flowers are sporting many kinds of insects, butterflies, &c., all formed as before stated from the precious stones.

The fly, for instance, with its delicate, fibrous wings, and eyes of diamond, has the appearance of being suddenly impressed upon the stone ere a muscle or membrane could be displaced. The beautiful insect found upon the Asclepias plant—its intense crimson covering, and its finely marked lines of black are there, true to life, and one almost wonders why the insects do not fly away, so life-like are they.

Not the least conspicuous is the bee, emblematic, doubtless, in common with its companions, of the life of the student of science.

In short, the grouping of the flowers, the selection of colors and the species, together with the insects, all have an emblematical significance intelligible to one versed in the language of flowers. Truly this is a gift, such as, perhaps, loyalty alone can bestow. Were we to estimate the depth of gratitude, which prompted this return by the intrinsic value of the gift itself, we should conclude that it was very great, indeed, and should command our admiration where, perhaps, we have been prone to condemn.

THE TWO LEGACIES.

A young sailor married a thrifty young woman, and in a house of two rooms they began housekeeping and set up the family altar.—No beginning could promise better. When the young sailor was in port, he was at his seat in church. Sometimes his voice was heard in the prayer meetings.

After a year or two the sailor fell down the hold of a vessel while she was loading, and was too much hurt to go the voyage; but he had a snug harbor of a home to cast anchoring, and a good nurse to attend him. When he married her she brought only a small legacy to her husband, a bundle of old books left by her father. These had been stowed away in an old sea chest, and never examined until her husband was sick, when he remembered and hunted them up to read; for, unused to keep within doors, the time sometimes hung heavily on his hand.

Two or three years more pass away. James is well, and has his berth in the ship again.—But he is seldom seen at church; another has his seat in the prayer-meeting; his Bible is neglected, his Sabbaths are broken; he has no family altar. In a year or two more James is a swearer, a hard drinker, a scoffer, and a visitor of low dancing-houses.

Would you like to know the date of the change which had come over this poor fellow? Hear his own account: "My wife's legacy from her father's old chest, that lot of unworthy old books ruined me," said James. "They were infidel books blasphemous books. I read them from curiosity, but their poison entered my soul. I hadn't learning enough to argue them down, or faith enough to rise above them; so they drove me on the lee-shore of unbelief, and I am likely soon to be wrecked for ever on the rocks of perdition. Bad books are a terrible legacy."

In contrast with this was a well young sailor who married a poor woman whose only legacy was a pewter spoon and two forks. She had lots of his wife won the young husband to spend his evenings at home; and she told him many things of her godly father, and how he loved the book which he had left her. The young husband falling sick, he took up the books, and opened and read, and was well pleased with what he read. One of these was Arthur Bonar's "Plain Man's Pathway to Heaven," and more and more each day he hear the simple, solemn talk of the little book as it spoke to them of Christ and heavenly things. Then the young couple turned their own steps into the same "Pathway." The wife went only a little way, and then reached the end. But the poor husband had a longer and harder road to travel, yet he found the way brightening as he went, and he has left a shining track behind for thousands and thousands to walk therein. It is called the "Pilgrim's Progress." I dare say you have caught sight of it—the man was John Bunyan. Oh what a priceless legacy is a good book! Family Treasury.

RULES FOR HOME EDUCATION.

The following are worthy of being placed in a conspicuous position in every household:

1. From your children's earliest infancy, inculcate the necessity of instant obedience.
2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children always understand that you mean exactly what you say.
3. Never promise them anything unless you are sure you can give them what you promise.
4. If you tell a child to do anything, show him how to do it, and see that it is done.
5. Always punish your children for wilfully disobeying you, but never punish in anger.
6. Never let them perceive that they can vex you, or make you lose your self-command.
7. If they give way to petulance and temper, wait till they are calm, and then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.
8. Remember that a little present punishment when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment, should the fault be renewed.
9. Never give your children anything because they cry for it.
10. On no account allow them to do at one time what you have at another time, under the same circumstances, forbidden.
11. Teach them that the only sure and easy way to appear good, is to be good.
12. Accustom them to make their little recitals the perfect truth.
13. Never allow of tale bearing.
14. Teach them that self denial, not self indulgence, is the appointed and sure method of securing happiness.

THE FLOOD IN CALIFORNIA.

A correspondent of one our exchanges gives the following account of this overwhelming calamity:

Our winter, or rainy season, commenced in the latter part of the month of November, and with but little interruption, the rains have continued until the present. In consequence of this we have been visited with the greatest calamity that has ever befallen our hitherto prosperous State, in the form of a flood.

From the commencement of the nocturnal war now raging on your side of the mountains, the people of this State have been congratulating themselves on their exemption from its evils. It seems, however, to be the will of Providence, that the whole country should be visited with his judgments. The public papers have, no doubt, informed you in relation to it. I am free to say, however, that no tongue or pen can describe the fearful scene. The severity of this flood is doubtless owing to the peculiar structure of the country. Paradoxical as it may appear, California is the highest and the lowest, the hottest and the coldest, the wettest and the driest, of any state I ever saw or read of. It is this peculiarity which has rendered the present inundation so terribly destructive. In the morning regions on the mountains, snow often falls to the depth of twenty five feet on a level. In the plains below, distant only about seventy-five or one hundred miles, none ever falls. In the beginning of December, after one of these great snow storms, there came suddenly a thaw. You may judge of the effect on the plains below, when I tell you that Trinity river rose ninety-three feet in twenty-four hours. In the dry season, a boy can with ease ford it on foot. These streams nearly all empty into the Sacramento, (to a Protestant a strange name for a river,) which drains the Sacramento valley, embracing an extent of country of more than two hundred miles long and one hundred and fifty broad. The city of Sacramento, the capital of the State, is one hundred and twenty-five miles from this city. It contains an industrious population of fourteen thousand—not to mention the politicians. It is in this city that the fury of the present flood has been most severely felt, owing, to the extent of the population, it being the second city in point of population.

Last night I returned from a visit to the ill-fated capital, and as I before stated, it would be impossible to picture the reality of the scene. On arriving at the city, I hired a boat and proceeded to the handsomest part of the city, principally occupied by the private residences of merchants. It contains the Governor's mansion. All of them were, a short time before, beautifully decorated with flower-gardens, conservatories, ornamental trees and shrubbery, in short every thing which our soil of unparalleled fertility could furnish. When in the centre of this once beautiful spot, I sounded the water, and found it to be from six to ten feet in depth. I then ordered the boatman to sail around the new capitol, the building of which was commenced about one year ago. It will cost, when finished, about one million of dollars. It is only about twenty feet above the foundation. The walls are of great thickness. I am apprehensive that it will have to be re-built, for there I found the water to be upwards of ten feet. Quite near to this one of the city no owned a milch cow. She swam to the walls of the State House, and there the poor creature was still! (some three weeks having elapsed!) Her owner, I was informed, sends to her in a boat, her daily supply of food. Knowing that the ancient Egyptians worshipped the ox, it required but little effort of the imagination to transform the State House into the ruins of an Egyptian temple, surmounted by a statue of the sacred animal. How easy to imagine that this was one of the overflowings of the Nile!

A great number of the inhabitants of Sacramento have fled to the city, where it was amply provided for. The loss of human life has not been great, except among the Chinamen in the mines. This people invariably live low down the banks of the rivers, and in the [illegible] some of them were carried off. The loss to the State is estimated to be from twenty to thirty millions of dollars!

Numerous interesting and affecting incidents might be recorded. I shall mention one. A boatman was engaged in Sacramento [illegible] a widow and her three small children from the second story of a house. She told him to start with the children and return for her, as she had not finished packing up her clothes. He did so, but before he could return the building fell, and the poor mother was drowned!

It is now raining with great violence, and the prospect in the future is one of deep gloom. We hope, however, with the blessing of God, and the energy of our people, to recover from it.

VERITAS.

FOREIGN RELIGIOUS ITEMS.

Popery in Britain. From the Roman Catholic Directory, we copy the following statistical facts, showing the actual state of Popery in the United Kingdom at the beginning of the present year. There are 22 Romish Peers, 9 being Peers of England, and 4 Peers of the United Kingdom; 13 Romish Peers sit in the House of Lords. There are 13 Romish Baronets, 23 English, 3 Scotch, and 17 Irish. Of the members of Parliament, 31 are Romanists. In Great Britain there are 1,388 Romish bishops and priests; 1,018 churches, chapels and stations; 50 communities of men, 162 convents, and 13 colleges. The increase in the last three years is, of bishops and priests, 166; of churches, chapels, and stations, 93; of communities of men, 16; of convents, 52; of colleges, 1; showing an increase of 13½ per cent. on the number of the bishops and clergy; an increase of ten per cent. on the number of churches and chapels; an increase of 47 per cent. on the number of communities of men; an increase of 47 per cent. on the number of convents; and an increase of nine per cent. on the number of colleges.

These are valuable facts. Somewhat startling, no doubt, to those who do not look very carefully into the progress of Popery in our land. For it is certainly remarkable, that Great Britain is almost the only country in Europe, where Popery is progressing. It is, however, not a little consoling to know that the increase, from actual bona fide converts from Protestantism to Popery, is very small indeed, and almost exclusively from the Puseyite section of the Church of England. The increase is mainly caused by the great influx of Irish Papists from the Emerald Isle to this country, in order to obtain employment. In Ireland, the adherents of the Romish Church are decreasing every year; so that, if matters go on as they are doing, a very large number of the Irish mass houses will soon have to be shut up for want of people to attend them; while the priests will have to emigrate and find flocks elsewhere.

New Irish Bishop. The elevation of the Rev. Dr. Gregg, Archdeacon of Kildair, to the vacant see of Cork, appears to be exceedingly popular in Ireland. The Dublin Daily Express has an article approving highly of the appointment, and saying that Lord Palmerston's government is rising fast in the estimation of the Protestants of Ireland, as they think him far more to be relied on in ecclesiastical matters than Lord Derby. Dr. Gregg's appointment has completely won the hearts of the Church people. If they had been polled he would be the man whom they would unanimously pronounce "Dignissimus." His name is a household word with the Protestants throughout Ireland on account of his power as a preacher, his earnest advocacy of religious societies, his active benevolence, and his popular sympathies. He has especially devoted himself to the working of the Protestant Orphan Society, and he is almost idolized by the working classes. He has often mentioned on the platform, that he came to Dublin, when he entered college, an unfriended orphan. It may be truly said, that no man in Ireland has done so much, during the last quarter of a century, to revive the church, and give an earnest tone to its ministrations. He is greatly beloved by the Evangelical clergy, who listen to his exhortations at the "April meetings," as if he was their bishop. His appointment is regarded as the inauguration of a new era for the Irish Church.

Great Central Evangelical Hall in Dublin. At the time when the revival movement was at its height in Ireland, the Rev. I. Denham Smith, independent minister at Kingstown, at the special request of many friends of Evangelical truth in the Irish metropolis who believed him to be pre-eminently qualified to engage in revival work, consented to remove to Dublin, where his labors have been signally blessed in leading many stricken ones to the Saviour. Mr. Smith now proposes to make Dublin a centre of evangelizing efforts, and in furtherance of his wishes the friends of the movement are taking measures for erecting a large central edifice, to be vested in trustees, capable of accommodating 2,500 persons: a site has been secured in an eligible situation. It is intended, in order to make way for more extended labors throughout the country, to associate with Mr. Smith, other ministers of Christ, who shall share with him the happiness and responsibility of laboring in a field already white unto the harvest. It is expected that the proposed building will cost about £8,000. Towards this amount, £2,500 have already been secured, and we doubt not, that the rest will ere long be forthcoming.

Gavazzi threatened with a prosecution. The wonderful success of Gavazzi's public lectures in Florence, where he had taken apartments, and held four meetings weekly—two on Sabbaths, and the other two on Tuesday and Friday evenings—has excited against him the rage of his Popish enemies, who feel terribly annoyed at his telling exposures of the errors of the Church of Rome. In a letter received from him, dated December 27th, he states that he has been formally accused to the attorney general, and served with notice of a regular trial on the charge of attacking the religion of the State on various specified points. The accusation was under the judicial consideration of the tribunal to see if there was sufficient ground to proceed against him by public trial. Out of the seven accusers, five are foreigners, and two of them are Irishmen. We trust that Baron Ricasoli will not belie his own past conduct and professions, by allowing this attack to be made upon the religious freedom so recently won for the long down-trodden and priest-ridden people of Italy.

THE LAST READING.

In one of the coal mines of England, a youth about fifteen years of age, was working by the side of his father, who was a pious man, and governed and educated his family according to the word of God.

The father was in the habit of carrying with him a small pocket Bible, and the son, who had received one at the Sunday school, imitated his father in this. Thus, he always had the sacred volume with him, and whenever he enjoyed a season of rest from labor, he read it by the light of his lamp. They worked together in a newly opened section of the mine, and the father had just stepped aside to procure a tool, when the arch above them suddenly fell between them, so that his father supposed his child to be crushed. He ran toward the place and called to his son, who at length responded from under a dense mass of earth and coal.

"My son," cried the father, "are you living?"

"Yes, father, but my legs are under a rock."

"Where is your lamp, my son?"

"It is out, father, father."

"What will you do, my dear son?"

"I am reading my Bible, father, and the Lord strengthens me."

These were the last words of that Sunday scholar; he was soon suffocated.

Prof Blackie, of Edinburgh, in a recent lecture on "Scottish Character," said that he found eight points which distinguished the animal Scotsman: 1 The Scot was essentially a working animal; 2 He was an enterprising and adventurous animal; 3 He was a thinking or [illegible] animal; 4 He was a practical and utilitarian animal; 5 He was a sure and cautious animal; 6 He was an earnest, devout, and religious animal; 7. He was a fervid, impassioned, and poetical animal—perfervidum ingenium Scotorum; and, 8. He was a humorous, an amusing, jolly, and jovial animal—not at all the grim kind of a creature made of iron and wire that Mr. Buckle thought he was.

LUTHER AS A PULPIT ORATOR.

Not the least of the blessings bestowed upon the Church of Christ by the reformation of the 16th century, was the restoration of the preaching of the word to its true place in public worship. In this important work, Luther stood pre-eminent. In vigor, warmth and popular power, he has rarely, if ever been surpassed. His eloquence was an element of his success as a reformer, quite as truly as his published writings and personal character. His students went forth from Wittemberg admiring his preaching, and seeking to imitate it, and all Germany soon became familiar with the new and forcible style of pulpit address which Luther introduced.

The only monograph on this subject with which we are acquainted, is one published a few years since, at Berlin, by Jonas, pastor of a church in Stettin. In the following remarks we shall avail ourselves of the results of his examination of Luther's characteristics as a preacher.

First of all, he was a good man. He complied with Quintilian's rule. He was honest and true; blameless in his life, pure and elevated in the motives which governed him, a warm friend, a despiser of all trickery and cunning, a kind husband and father, and above all, sincerely devoted to Christ in the habitual exercise of a living faith in which all these virtues had their root and life.

The second secret of his power, as a pulpit orator, lay in his earnestness. No one of his hearers ever suspected him of lacking interest in the subject of his discourse. No one ever thought that he was attempting to excite feelings in the minds of others of which he knew nothing himself. There is a false or spurious earnestness, which is nothing but the excitement of natural emotion in the speaker, and hence possesses no element of spiritual edification. The temperament of Luther was choleric, and he might easily have commanded that kind of power which springs from excited passion. In several of his controversial writings this appears, but in his sermons never. In the pulpit he always exercised a noble self-control. He avoided all unworthy rhetorical artifices, scrupulously abstained from appealing to the weak side or selfish feelings of his audience, or seeking to arouse them into mere passionate emotion. His whole earnestness was directed to the work of edifying believers and delivering the ungodly from the chains which bound them.

With this was united great warmth of heart. Some preachers who have many pulpit gifts, fail to reach men because they are too coldly intellectual. Luther was intellectual; his mind was charged with great thoughts; but he was never cold. He speaks as a father to his children, as a friend to friends. In the most humble of his hearers, he sees one for whom Christ has done and suffered all, and for whom he himself must do all, to win him to goodness and to God. It was no part of his object, however, to excite mere transient emotions, the shedding of tears, or a sentimental melancholy. He had no fondness for loud groans and sighs, which are so often the expression of weakness and sin, rather than the utterances and help of faith. But the warmth which animated his address, appeared in the manifest desire to help his brethren; in the impressiveness of his exhortations; in the singleness of aim with which he vindicated the saving truths of the Gospel; in the confidence with which he proclaims them; and in the sympathy with his hearers and the knowledge of their inward state which he constantly exhibits.

Another secret of the pulpit power of Luther was his openness. He had nothing to conceal. Every one was at liberty to read his heart, and see whether he could find there any traces of selfish ends. Hence the confidence which the people reposed in him. From his peculiar position, he could hardly avoid speaking, at times, of himself. But this he does rarely, and never in the spirit of ostentation. It is only when the interests of the truth seem to require it, that he makes these personal allusions, and then they are so frank and honest that you thank him for admitting you to his confidence.

The enumeration of the elements of power in the preaching of Luther, would be incomplete if its popular style should be overlooked. The common people heard him gladly. No preacher has since risen in Germany, not even Spener, who could speak so distinctly and forcibly to the masses. The Gospel, and its precious truths, he always made prominent, and allow

EPISCOPAL VISITS.

I will be on the Westchester Circuit on the 29th of March. The Elder may make arrangements up to the 5th of April. I will then leave for Oxford on the Pennington ville Circuit, and remain to the 12th, on which day I will leave for Lancaster Circuit, where I will remain a week. The Elders or Preachers will make their arrangements and inform me of them. W. NAZREY.

REVIVALS.

Rev. A. L. Stanford, of Little Wesley, is still conducting the revival of the Lord; and the Lord is blessing his labors. A number have found peace with their Redeemer, and many more are anxiously inquiring the way to find Jesus.

UNION CHURCH.

Rev. Henry Davis patter.—God is most powerfully blessing his labors, and he too is leading on the van. Last Sabbath was a time of solemnity with the members. They had the presence of father Richard Robertson, who preached the sacrament discourse for brother Davis. At night we preached to a crowded house of white and colored. It would have been a hard matter for a stranger to tell whether the congregation were half or two-thirds white. We hope they received good instruction.

ZION MISSION.

Rev. Stephen Smith pastor in charge. We preached for brother Smith, and his congregation had a good time. They had also sacrament in the after part of the day. May the good Lord bless brother Smith and his flock. We are sorry that sickness prevented us from lecturing there on last Monday night.

We hope that our readers will read the death of Mr. Decker, and the high compliment paid to his character, as a human being, and not as a thing, nor an orang-outang, nor an ignoramus, by many of the greatest men of this nation, and if their statement be true, which no one, I presume, will dare question, then away with the doctrine, that black men cannot be men in this country. Hence we refer our readers to the piece which we copy from the New York Tribune.

REV. S. T. JONES.

We hope that our ministers will read Rev. S. T. Jones' Harrisburgh article upon the great subject of a Religious Union, and express their views in relation to it. Brother Jones says he has not seen any reply to his article; we will re-print our article in reply to his first, with a view that some one will reply.

SACER.

The article signed with the above Latin word is intended as a reply to our article, which we publish in another column. We give our brother credit for the zeal he has to write, but are not disposed to enter into a controversy with him, as his article did not relate to our church polity, her doctrines, &c. Were we so disposed, we might criticise, heavily, Sacer's article in this number.

AN OUTRAGE.

We hope the day is not far distant when such conduct as the following shall cease:

TO THE PUBLIC.

On Monday evening, 3d inst., about ten o'clock, Mrs. Palmer, a highly respected and intelligent colored lady, residing in the upper part of this city, was ejected from the cars, in the midst of a severe storm of wind and rain that was sweeping over our city at that hour.

Returning from her duties, as the Secretary of a benevolent society, and being a woman of feeble health, sought shelter in the cars on Spruce St., near Tenth, to avoid the violence of the storm, and was thrust out with the utmost rudeness.

Her condition, when she reached her residence, was certainly such as to seriously disturb her friends. Mrs. Palmer is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and a tax payer in this city, and a person that understands so well the proprieties of life, that there could be no just complaint against her whatever. Who, I ask, is benefited by this rudeness on the part of the conductors of the city cars?—for this is by no means an isolated case.

Will city papers please copy? J. C. G.

BROTHER STROTHER.

Your reply to Rev. J. P. Campbell will appear next week; and we will say now that we hope that our brethren, on a subject of that kind, will not write us such lengthy pieces.

ARE WE DOING WHAT WE CAN, AND IF SO, IN WHAT DIRECTION?

When we take up that little book called Discipline, and peruse its pages, we are led to inquire, in the most solemn manner, "Are we doing what we can, and if so, in what direction?

1. Every man and woman, who coolly and calmly considers the worth of his or her immortal soul, feels the need of entering into ways and means by which they can secure the favor of Almighty God.

2. They at once set about the work, and continue to work faithfully in offering prayer to God, in faith believing, taking no denial, until at length God descends in the attitude of his mercy and goodness, and speaks the life-giving Word to the poor penitent. The soul, in ecstacy of joy, praises God. Never before had they such a disposition within to love and to serve the true and the living God. Envy, malice, strife, superstition, and hatred of all kind, seems to be extricated and removed. Things we once loved we now hate; and the things we once slighted and paid no attention to, we now love with all of our heart. He is a different man, and she is a different woman, while under the influence of the Spirit of God.

3. Those in possession of this state of godly feeling, having separated from the world, prove that they have left the world by making application to some branch of the evangelical church of God to become one of its members to do good then and there, and take upon themselves, with their own free will and accord, the obligation to obey all of her rules and regulations, and to do all the good they can in aiding the Gospel cause and building up Zion, and especially that part of Zion to which they have attached themselves. This is right, of course, and should be, for we believe it is the will of high Heaven. Then it becomes the imperative duty of all such to do what they can willingly, cheerfully, and in the fear of God; both in a spiritual and temporal point of view; and if this course is pursued and continued, it may be said, and truthfully said too, that such are doing what they can in the right direction.

4. There is another view to be taken in relation to doing what we can:—Even after the professors attach themselves to the church, they take upon them a strict obligation to obey all the rules and regulations of the church, and after continuing in the faith for a time, they cease from doing good, and do all they can in the direction just the contrary, which would not be in accordance to their obligation, but are doing what they can, namely: in impeding or retarding the cause of salvation; doing what they can in a direction disproved of by the great God and his church militant. Hence they are doing what they can. But they who continue to do what they can in that way which is pleasing in the sight of God and his church, are justified and blessed in their deeds. This course is pursued until some feel called upon to preach the Gospel of the blessed Jesus, and they go before the church of the living God, and take the second obligation upon them. They do well for the time, and then the third coat is wanted, which the church says they shall have, and they bow upon their knees before God and the people at the altar, and take the obligation with the Bible in their hands, declaring they will do what they can. This having been done, and they continue well for a season, the time arrives for another coat, which we will call the elder's coat, and they still continue to do well, and do what they can, and the church says they must have the elder's coat, and they bow in the church, at the altar, and receive the coat from the highest authority in the church. Let us now ask them that important question, "Are they doing what they can?" Yes; so long as the church and everything moves along to suit their peculiar and particular notions; but if it does not please them, they are doing what they can to pull down, obstruct, and scatter. They sow the seeds of discord, they envy, and are doing what they can to destroy what they helped to build up, and had taken upon themselves some less than half a dozen vows before God and the people to obey. Awful thought! and should make every man tremble when he thinks of the many obligations he has taken, if he fails to carry them out.

Now, my readers, let me prevail upon all who make a profession of the religion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ to examine this subject, and see whether we live to our avowed obligation as a member, as a preacher, as a deacon, as an elder, or even as a bishop, then ask yourself the question, "Am I doing what I can, and if so, in what direction—for good or evil?"

CAN THE CHRISTIAN RECORDER LIVE?

The question is often asked, Can the Christian Recorder live? Perhaps the most appropriate answer is, that if one-fourth of the members and ministry of the church would give two dollars per annum, it can live. The question may be asked, then, Shall it live? It has been conceded that the Recorder is a creditable paper; its columns are well filled with useful matter, such as is not objectionable to any but those who desire to strain on the subject of originals. On this, I am not quite certain that the field of our operations affords sufficient practical experience in the useful and the classic, to make our originals as generally acceptable as a considerable intermixture of useful, miscellaneous clippings; however, pride of place, and note, may prompt our vanity. I like to see aspiring ambition, but not an overstraining of resources, so much so, that to admit it, would be the sure defeat of any measure. Perhaps, as useful originals come to hand, clippings will give place to them. So let them come, not after the Africo-Canadian stamp though, for that sets our teeth on edge.

Can the Christian Recorder live? ought never to be asked, especially when we consider it as a means of diffusing knowledge, and its credit to the organization of which it is the organ, and its power to give us a hearing, where we would not be otherwise heard, and the ability of the church in means and members to support it. There are, however, unfortunately, with us, as with other portions of the community, persons who hang on as dead weights, and are ever, in words and in acts, ready to retard the forward movements of any and every measure; it matters not to them if it promises ever so much good, if it is not of their dictation they will not enter themselves, and will hinder those that would. It is not the people that will not support the Christian Recorder; it is those that have control. There is very little effort to give prominence to the paper, or to set forth its usefulness. It will live if the people can be reached, and made generally to understand its usefulness; if the people cannot be reached, it will not live, for they are its life. Having been a member of the church thirty-one years, I have paid some attention to its general movements, and can say, that to my knowledge, the church never had a paper that came up to the Recorder—and the Sold presented for its success and its future was never before so auspicious. A FRIEND.

Philadelphia, March 11th, 1862.

For the Christian Recorder.

DEAR BROTHER:—On the 14th of last October, I sent you a communication expressive of my views on the importance of a union of the religious element of our people, and especially that portion of it who subscribe to the doctrines, and worship under the form of Methodism—which communication you kindly and promptly published. It was hoped, that a subject of so much importance to the church, as well as to humanity, and so intimately connected with the destiny of our race, would elicit the prompt and hearty advocacy of the intelligent and pious, and more particularly those whose sentiments, as expressed from the pulpit and the forum, have induced us to believe that they fully appreciated the vast importance of such a measure. But, I confess my surprise, that up to this writing, no one, so far as I know, of the many able contributors to the Recorder—not one of that numerous host who speak so eloquently of the "watchmen seeing eye to eye," and of the church "flowing together" with an "enlarged heart," as among the triumphs of a preached gospel—has regarded the subject as of sufficient interest, to write and publish a single sentence in furtherance of it, with the encouraging exception of the Rev John A. Williams, whose communication also appeared in the Recorder. Why a subject, so generally urged and insisted on in theory, by ministers, laymen, and all who wish to be regarded as being awake to the interests of the race, and the future prosperity of the church, should be silently ignored when an effort is made looking to a practical solution of it, is a problem of rather difficult solution. It may be, in the first place, that the zeal usually manifested in urging its importance, so far from being the result of a deep conviction of such importance, is, after all, but a borrowed zeal; for, such a conviction, it strikes me, would find its counterpart in an equally zealous effort to bring about a desired end. Or, in the second place, knowing it to be a popular theme, and one to which the members of our churches readily and warmly respond, it may be used as a mere pretext to gain popular favor, while in reality, the heart is selfishly opposed to it. Which of the twain is most reprehensible—inexcusable ignorance, or hollow pretence—I will not stop to discuss; but this I know, that each contributes its share of opposition to that which Heaven wills and good men desire, but which devils and wicked men oppose.

The fact, that scarcely any one will publicly advocate disunion—that all whose position entitle them to consideration, pay a high tribute to religious union, whenever that subject is publicly discussed by them, is proof positive of a wide-spread conviction of what is a known fact—that the people love and ardently desire it, and would hail with general joy a consummation so glorious. My own observations, during an itinerant life of more than twelve years, has assured me, that it would be a difficult matter to meet any considerable number of laymen, of the Methodist persuasion at least, of which it would not be found, upon introducing the question, that at least two-thirds were favorable to union; and I feel perfectly safe in saying, that there is not a single consideration, so far as they are concerned, that would render its postponement necessary twelve months longer.

Clearly, then, the responsibility of the delay of a result so beneficial to the race, and at the same time so glorious to the church, rests, not with the laity, but with the ministry. We all, either publicly or privately, express our surprise—if not our indignation—at the hesitancy—if not refusal—of the representatives of a government established upon the openly avowed principles of justice and humanity, to perform an act which, while it would be at once fair, righteous, and humane, would, at the same time that it would speedily terminate a most destructive and expensive civil war, also, forever wipe out the cause of it. But, I think we shall have cause to feel less indignant, and more charitable toward these representatives, when we reflect, that as the acknowledged representatives of the Methodist Church, and, to a large extent, the recognised leaders of the people, we are manifesting the same degree of hesitancy or unwillingness to do, or lend our influence and aid in the doing of what no one will attempt to deny, would prove a great blessing, not only to the present, but to generations yet unborn. Whatever may have been the sentiment of northern voters one year ago, we are inclined to believe, that if the question were fairly presented to them to-day, they would remove the possibility of another civil war for the same cause which originated the present. It is not the people, therefore, that retain this incubus upon the destiny of a great nation, but their leaders. The remark will apply equally to us, as a race, but especially as a religious body. Our great difficulty, and the principal element of our weakness is, a want of union of interest and of effort. This notorious cause of our failure to accomplish the good we might, could be speedily removed, if the leaders of the people were really desirous of such a result, and would lend their aid to its accomplishment. The necessity of our being united, though always obvious, was never more so than now, and, it would seem that the Almighty had permitted events so to crowd upon us, as to induce us to open our eyes to our real condition, to the end, that seeing it, we might set about the work of improving it. The people are fully awake to the importance of some action with a view to the general interest, but are looking for the ministry to lead the way. With their patience already taxed almost beyond endurance, it is not easy to determine how long they will permit us to continue our long cherished schemes of ambitious selfishness, to the great detriment of their most vital interests. If the time should arrive when, refusing any longer to follow our misleaders, they should proceed to shape their own destiny, though sharing, to some extent, the humiliation, I should, nevertheless, regard it as an eminently fit and deserving rebuke.

It remains to be seen, Mr. Editor, whether we are sufficiently awake to the interests of our people,—whether we are sufficiently observant of the signs of the times, to improve the present favorable opportunity.

It remains to be seen, whether we are capable of rising above the petty prejudices and party feelings which have hitherto kept us a divided, and, therefore, a weak people. The great problem remains to be solved—whether, as ministers of Jesus Christ, we will transmit to the church and to posterity, our divisions, prejudices, and weaknesses, or give them an example of our self-sacrificing devotion to their interests, which shall enshrine us in their grateful memory.

Praying that the Divine Being may influence our hearts, and that we may prove ourselves equal to the task, I shall continue to look for "favorable responses, leading to practical results."

Yours, for religious union,
SINGLETON T. JONES.

SEARCH FOR TRUTH.

MR. EDITOR:—Your somewhat spirited and sharp, still kind manner of answering my criticism of your article, affords me much pleasure. This little battle with the pen forms one of those recreative occurrences which give intellectual pleasure. I am happy that you regarded my article so highly as to devote to it about a whole of one of your not very short columns; inasmuch as you "could not see the force of it" and only remembered "to give it for what it is worth." The questions you ask about "Brother Lynch meaning to say that you are not Editor of the Recorder, &c.," and "denying you the merit of the article criticised," I look upon as just so many unnecessary moves that you were compelled to make before you could get under proper headway. This is mostly the case with a steamboat going out of the dock; it makes moves in various directions which seem to have no reference to the course she is going; this is the case sometimes when they are getting up steam, &c. Therefore, my brother, your attempted harangue about "poor blind Bartimeus," (good old soul!) loses force from its flying so wide of the mark. Did we not address you as "Mr. Editor"—the veritable—the chief—the only—the acknowledged editor of the only colored religious newspaper of the United States? Yes, I did address you as such! and would be the last one to dim the lustre of that resplendent literary glory with which your editorial career has girded you, or pull a particle of the laurels green—intellectual triumphs which are your possession. 'Rest in thy glory! Thou hast toiled hard, be at peace, for I do not think any one would have such little regard for the tenth commandment as to envy you éclat.

To one or two things in your reply, I object, "begging the question," "dodging the question," and making a bold, sweeping, almost denunciatory conclusion, precede a premises, argument and inference. The skilled controversial tactician does this only when he thinks he has little or no ground to stand upon, and calculates by a mighty coup d'etat, to place his opponent hors du combat. Again, you had not the editorial rule fresh in your memory, which forbids the signature of the name de plume and real name to one article. It was not so in the manuscript; if it was, you are responsible, as your proof reading should have detected the error. I object to the appellation of "fable theology" to any part of my reasoning. I think it unwarrantable. Perhaps, dear brother, you have mistaken historic facts for fables, or as distinguished men—editors generally—Beecher, Greeley, Gen. Morris, N. P. Willis, et al., often coin words, I suppose our Rev. brother and editor ("I thank thee for giving me the word,") coined this one. The only danger of coining too many would be that we might be under the necessity of calling for the immediate issue of "Weaver's Dictionary, unabridged."

Your best arguments are your quotations from great writers, these I claim as arguments on my side. Your quotations from them, help me, thank you! thank you! for they all make the Spirit of God the sine qua non of a conscience that is infallible, and a "correct guide in our conduct," but without such control by the Holy Spirit, conscience can be just like the Apostle Paul's was when he held the clothes of those who stoned Stephen, pantomited the Christians, &c., for he says he did this "in all good conscience" till arrested by God's Spirit.

You fear we do not send Methodist theology—be not alarmed! We do try to read the Bible; pray over it, ponder its truths, and there we get theology quite as good as Watson's Institutes. We confess to a want of ability to eagerly adopt the opinions of others. Your printer made some mistakes in my last article. "Superfluities the Deity has thrust upon us," these words should be preceded by the words, "are they?" Thanking you for your high consideration in giving place to "five sides of foolscap paper," and hoping you will give place to three sides more,

I am, as ever, yours, SACER.

TRENTON CIRCUIT.

Lo! the winter is past, its rains are over and gone. Spring has appeared, the time for the singing of birds has come and the voice of gladness sounds in our ears.

Many hearts can say with joy and thanksgiving "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad." He has brought us through a dreary winter, and many souls are saved. During the last quarter, amid all the distress brought upon the land by the calamities of war, we have been greatly blessed. At Trenton, we have purchased a beautiful cemetery lot at a cost of $1700. The Rev. G. M'Mullen Ladies' Sewing Circle held a fair during the holidays, by which we have realized a net profit of $70. The outstanding debts of the church have been reduced to the small sum of $250.

The membership at this point, as their custom is, made their pastor a handsome donation visit on the fifth day of February, that being his birthday Upon this occasion, himself and family received many good things, with a very pleasant addition of a little ready cash.

January 23d, the members of the class at Louisville held a festival for the purpose of raising a portion of the minister's allowance. They were successful in raising the handsome sum of $27.

February 20th, the church at Pennington held a festival for the above stated object, by which they raised, and paid over to their Pastor on account, the sum of $23. This was an unexpected, but very pleasant visitor at this season of the year Very pleasant, indeed!

But our agreeable surprise was increased by the Ladies of Pennington, through the addition of a donation visit in which we received a most beautiful and valuable Quilt, a fine young turkey, chickens, and other things by which our heart was made glad. This people by their acts of kindness have endeared themselves to our hearts forever.

As long as this people of Trenton circuit shall manifest such love for their pastor, the blessing of the Lord will abide with them forever.

Above all other things, we have been blessed with a most gracious outpouring of the Spirit upon the churches in this charge, by which they have been greatly revived, having their spiritual strength renewed. We have had about forty conversions within the past three months, many of whom are most hopeful cases. The Lord of hosts is with us, and the God of Jacob is our refuge.

But as we have no desire to glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, we close these statements with this observation, that we have been greatly blessed during the past year in our church relations, beyond all anticipated calculations, for all of which we give praise unto the name of the Lord our God. J. P. CAMPBELL.

ROTE.

On the first Sunday, March 2d, 1862, we preached again our discourse on the death of Rev. Walter Proctor, in the A. M. E. Mount Zion Church, in the city of Trenton, N. J., to a crowded congregation. Our audience was very attentive, and undoubtedly deeply affected to floods of tears at the relation of the story of the good old man, his life, conduct, conversation in the world, and happy death.

We have formed here a society called the Daughters of Conference after those in the mother church at Philadelphia. These all turned out in society order upon this occasion, and commanded great attention and respect. We had present at the same time, two Doctors of Divinity from the M. E. Church, both pastors in this city. These were interested in the exercises, while they wept with those who wept, and rejoiced with those who rejoiced. The services of the occasion passed off most profitably, for God was with us. J. P. C.

MR. EDITOR:—After several months' contention about Bishop Nazrey's relation, we are just where we were, when the contention commenced. The readers of your paper are still in the dark, some believing one thing, and some believing another.

I wish to suggest what I think would be the best for all parties concerned. Let Bishops Quinn and Payne call a council of elders, say two from each conference to meet at some central point to settle this perplexed question, and the sooner it is done the better; for there is, as I understand, a suit in the Court of Chancery in Canada, entered by Bishop Nazrey vs A. R. Green to restrain him (Green) from exercising the Episcopal powers in Canada West.

I call upon the aged sires, who have witnessed the onward passage of our noble ship for forty years, to come and fall in with our suggestion, and as soon as possible put an end to this useless strife. Will you sit still and see our noble ship driving upon the rocks and torn to pieces, when it can be avoided? No, no, you will not.

If the bishops say they have nothing to do with this question, then we say the General Conference has something to do with it. The young men may feel timid to look this thing in the face, for fear of being called aspirants of the bishop's office, but this is no time to fear what men may think or say. We love men, but we love the church more.

The distracted condition of our brethren in Canada, demand that we should do something in the case. The conflicting opinions in the states demand it—the future peace and prosperity of the church demand it. We call upon the bishops and elders of the church to look to this matter before it is too late.

I am yours in Christ. SHEPHARD.

MR. EDITOR:—In the CHRISTIAN RECORDER for February 16th, an article appeared on the subject of "Sanctification," and signed "Henry Davis." I have read the article with much interest, mingled with regret, that the meaning of some of its statements was not more clearly defined; I mean the distinction between justification and sanctification. It is set forth in the article as follows: "Justification precedes, and sanctification follows as the fruit and evidence of it." Here it is plain that the principle of sanctification is destroyed, because the pronoun "it," in the above statement, makes justification the same thing. The fruit and evidence of a principle cannot be a principle of itself: it is only the evidence of an existing principle. Hence, no distinction can be made between the evidence and the principle which produced that evidence.

Again, the writer says "Justification and sanctification are inseparably connected in God's word." If so, why does he or any one attempt to treat, as distinct things, that which is inseparably connected in God's word? This is a dangerous undertaking, and is calculated to defeat its own purpose: the plain simplicity of gospel truth, and of former times seems to be passing away. How little do we now see and hear of Christians going from house to house, as was the case in former days! In conclusion, the writer gives four evidences of divine sanctification; the first and fourth of these evidences is, to my mind, very objectionable: the first is "an increasing hatred to sin." I regard it as a fatal error to admit, that hatred is a necessary trait in the character, life, or conduct of a Christian. One will have to find a new page and appendage to the Bible to find a warrant for Christians to entertain hatred, either in their conduct, life, or character. It was this principle which constituted the first murderer the world ever saw, and all along the line of ages, from that day to this, innocent blood has marked its unholy pathway. Need I refer to that man who spoke as man never did: it was "hatred" that said away with this man; it was "hatred" that said, he casts out devils by the prince of devils; it was "hatred" that said crucify him; it was "hatred" that brought him before the court as a criminal; and now, in our day, we have it recommended as a Christian trait, and as an evidence of divine sanctification.

But again, "hatred" is not only recommended, but an increase of it; this is still worse What faculty of the soul would long remain untouched by its unholy influence, were it permitted to go on increasing its work of death and destruction? But it may be said that we are to hate sin, in order to destroy and overcome it. This view is a fatal one. No element can be destroyed by one of its own nature. This is the same as adding fire to fire in order to destroy it, which only serves to increase the flame, and make its destruction more certain. "Hatred" is only another name for sin; and in order to overcome it, we must do it by an element contrary to its existence—which is love in the soul. We are not only to love those that love us, but we are to love those that hate us; and how are we to do this, if we have hatred within ourselves. Such a thing is so absurd, that it only needs to be stated

Again, the third point of evidence is, "practical love to God, and to all mankind." Now, it must be clear to every intelligent mind, that no man can have practical love to God and all mankind, and at the same time hate sin or anything else. To admit this, would be to admit that love and hatred can exist in man at the same time, when both are direct opposites Love cannot be practical, unless it drives out all hatred; and it must be kept out; otherwise, it does not deserve the name of practical love I regret very much to find this evil spirit receiving encouragement at clerical hands. I am led to believe going about doing good to the souls and bodies of men and women, is far better evidence of divine sanctification than an increasing hatred to sin, because I regard hatred and sin both the same thing.

The next point of evidence, is "punctual attendance on all the ordinances of the Christian church." I do not know in what sense this could be taken as an evidence of divine sanctification, unless it be in an external sense; for I think any one at all acquainted with man's strange perversion, must know that all these ordinances may be complied with, and yet be no holiness of heart—no knowledge of this everlasting and unchangeable standard of life and light in the soul. We must go beyond the mere surface of things. Unless the motives be honest and pure, which produce the punctual attendance on all the ordinances of the Christian church, it is as sounding brass, and no dependence is to be placed therein: the world is nearly filled with external performance. Where is that Christian vitality that once fructified the earth and gave promise of an abundant harvest? Where is that Christian affection which knew no bounds, but encircled within its holy embrace all mankind? Where is that tender Christian sensibility, that went from door to door, and flourished as the lily of the valley? Alas! alas! it is locked up in creeds and professions, in sects and parties. Watchman, look well to these things, lest something be required at your hands.

For the Christian Recorder.

Yesterday (Sabbath) was a day of some interest in our city, as two Conferences are now in session here. On yesterday afternoon, Rev. Bishop Jaws addressed all the colored class leaders of the M. E. Church in this city, at Sharp Street Church, after which he ordained the following deacons: Lewis Murray, Thomas F. Smith, Henry H. Tartar, Warner Cook, and George Lewis.

There has been a great deal of discussion in the conference upon loyalty and disloyalty among the preachers, but everything has become quiet once more. The funeral discourse, on the life and death of the late Rev. Walter Proctor, will be delivered in our city, on next Sabbath afternoon, by Rev. J. M. Brown; and, doubtless, it will be an occasion of interest, for there was no man more beloved in our city than Rev. Walter Proctor. He has a good many spiritual children here in Baltimore.

Many of your readers will regret to learn that our esteemed father in the gospel, Rev. Charles Dunn of our city, is becoming quite feeble in health; he has not been able to attend to public worship for some time. There is no man more missed from his seat on the Sabbath in the sanctuary, than Father Dunn—his silver locks are always looked upon with delight.

On Saturday last, it was our painful duty to accompany to the grave one of our most pious and useful Christian sisters, viz.: Mary E. Ryan, wife of Thomas Ryan. Sister Ryan was well known by the members of the Baltimore Conference: in her house they were always welcome.

While I am writing, a funeral is gathering to convey to the "house appointed for all the living," Miss Virginia Barnes, the daughter of Mrs. Caroline Barnes. Virginia has been a great sufferer; yet in all of her affliction, the Lord was with her, and she died in great peace. "None knew her but to love her."

The lovers of good music anticipate a delightful season here, as Miss E. T. Greenfield (the black swan) is expected soon to visit our city, and will give several concerts. W.

Baltimore, March 10th.

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred (dollars,)—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference.

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty-five times two hundred is fifty dollars.

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, Indianapolis, Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty-five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly; for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to, somebody's head may have to come off. We hope that the other Bishops will do the same.

The Army in India is to be greatly reduced. The European portion of it will be 73,557, and the native will be 111,000—making the total less than 200,000 men.

The Viceroy of Egypt is said to be in an unpromising state of affairs. He is about to advertise, as is stated in the Glasgow Herald, for tenders for a loan of four million of francs.

A REPLY TO HIS REVERENCE, RIGHT REV. DANIEL A. PAYNE.

DEAR SIR:—I have carefully read and considered the letter and spirit of the article to which you referred me, and have arrived to the following conclusion

That you have departed from a plain, Scriptural, and disciplinary duty, either from an erroneous judgment concerning the subject about which you write, or with an intention to deceive and lead astray the judgment of others.

First. Our Christian relationship for sixteen or eighteen years, and our confederation in office for the last ten years, would demand you to seek an interview with me before making such an open declaration as appears in the CHRISTIAN RECORDER of March the 1st, 1862. This you have failed to do.

Secondly. Your known ability forbids you being excused for publishing anything which is not strictly the truth, especially that which is injurious to ministerial character. From these two considerations, your wrong will plainly appear to all, and many will arrive at the fearful conclusion, that your intention was to deceive and lead astray the judgment of others.

I now proceed to notice your article. 1st. You say that I asked the members of the General Conference of 1860 to give some plan concerning my bishopric. This assertion I positively deny. I used no such language in the connexion which you apply it.

2d. If the words "in accordance with this request," in or near the head of your article has any force with what follows, you must admit that the Clark resolution, in the Cincinnati Conference, is in full force. See General Conference Minute of 1860, page 31.

Hence, if the words "in accordance," &c., in the connexion as used by you, mean anything, they also mean what the Canadians claim in the Clark resolution.

3d I deny having exercised double Episcopal authority. I have never in my life exercised the Episcopal office, otherwise than by the authority given me from the A. M. E. Church; and if there is anything double, it is in the legislation of the General Conference, and not in my administration. I have always acknowledged the right of the church to send her ministers and bishops where she thought best, and it is their duty to obey. Hence, Bishop Brown, from 1835 to 1844, Bishop Quinn, from 1844 to 1856, and Bishop Payne, from 1854 to 1856, alternately exercised Episcopal jurisdiction over the Canadian church. If this Episcopal jurisdiction was not double then, I cannot see how it became so, soon as Nazrey took the charge, by order of the same power which made a special act, that one of the bishops should serve in Canada, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Church. There is no man living can be more opposed to this state of things which now exist, than I, but my being opposed does not change the law governing the case.

4th. I deny your assertion, that I have failed to fulfil the pledge, (or any pledge) made by me to the A. M. E. Church. Also, your own statement is contradictory to such an assertion, because you first give a copy of my written resignation, which reads as follows: "To all to whom it may concern:—This is to certify that I do hereby resign my official relation, as General Superintendent of the British M. E. Church in Canada West. The above resignation is to take effect on and after the rise of the General Conference of the B. M. E. Church, which will sit in Toronto, Canada West, on the first Monday in September, 1860. WILLIS NAZREY"

In the next words you tell us that "nearly eighteen months have expired since I were to have fulfilled my own deliberate pledge," &c., "and that I have failed to fulfil this pledge."

Now, sir, the same written document or resignation above mentioned was presented to the Canadian General Conference, which act called up the present case which you are trying to palm on me. When this part of my resignation was read: "To all whom it may concern." The members of the General Conference felt deeply concerned from the following: "In 1856, in the General Conference in Cincinnati, M. M. Clark moved the following as an amendment:

"Whereas, this General Conference does not feel authorized to give one of its bishops to that portion of the church unsolicited; therefore, resolved, that when we shall be solicited of it before the next General Conference, all of our bishops shall meet with three elders selected by them, and decide which one of the bishops shall serve in Canada, in accordance with the wishes of the Canadian Church agreed to." Hence, the parties or Canadians with whom the above contract was made, said that such was their right by a legal contract, that they would not quit their claims. It is, therefore, plain to all unprejudiced minds that I have done all I pledged to do. It is also apparent that, if I was to resign every day, it would not affect the written law or contract between the two parties.

5th. I deny that the General Conference of 1860 made any such decree as you affirm in your letter. Knowest thou not a request is not a decree?

6th. If the General Conference of 1860, said that it believed this apparent double exercise of Episcopal office in two distinct denominations at the same time is contrary to the genius and spirit of our church government, it conflicted with, and gave judgment against, the positive decree of 1856, and, therefore, should have repealed the law governing said act. And it is evident that the General Conference made the appointment, not Nazrey. It is also an established principle among legislative bodies, that when a law is passed, acknowledged, and enforced, it holds the precedence of any other that may be passed after it, until repealed.

7th. If I had gone to the Lutheran or Presbyterian church, and found your reverence facing the storms, and laboring for the rebuilding of said church or churches, and I had ordered you, at some future time, to retire and leave, not only the church, but the country, and go to Canada, you would have thought that it was great impudence on my part, and vice versa. So think I in this case

I wish your reverence, and all others who have written, or intend to write on this subject, to know that Willis Nazrey joined the A. M. E. Church, when she was not quite so popular as at present; and he (Nazrey) obtained the great blessing of religion within her borders, and has rendered a strict adherence to her laws, and will defy any man to find a mark on her Quarterly, Annual, or General Conference books against him, at any time previous to the present harangue, which was got up on purpose. And now I say, if I have violated any law of the church

I can be dealt with accordingly. There is not a man within her now extensive borders, that will submit to the mandates of the law quicker than I, but I am the wrong man to mob away from home.

Again, I wish your reverence to prove that I have been exercising Episcopal jurisdiction in Canada by proxy, as affirmed in your letter. Though the positive decrees of the General Conference of 1856 and 1860 are so plain and easy to be understood, yet there are those who would rather destroy both churches if possible, than to do right in correcting a wrong, if there be any. The request that I made to the members of the General Conference was done in a simple and Christian manner, knowing that the Book of Discipline, page 57, gave the power to call a General Conference at any time when necessary. Seeing the deranged state of things in the church, not only in the case of which we have been speaking, but the Book Concern, and also the present Book of Discipline, in which the general rules of the church are left out, and many other defects I might mention, demand immediate notice. In view of all this, I thought that some one of the members of the General Conference might suggest the idea of calling a delegated General Conference, as the case may be, to meet at some central point with certain restrictions to settle these matters, which I conceive to be a Christian course; for a continual agitation makes no peace.

Now, I have endeavored to consider the genius and spirit of the document to which my attention has been called. I have done it, I trust, in a Christian spirit. And if I have violated any Christian duty which I owe to you, my reverend colleague, for whom I have always cherished the highest regard, you can do what you should have done before publishing your article, and that is either to have written to me, or seen me personally. And if there was a wrong, we could have adopted some course to settle it; but if this will not do, you must crack the whip, and the team is bound to go. I have done my duty.

(Signed,) WILLIS NAKE BY.

CORRESPONDENCE OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

MR. EDITOR:—On the 16th of February we lost one of the most public spirited, high toned, and honored citizens among us. We would have spoken before now of the illustrious dead, but left the task for abler pens. The lamented one is Mr. F. Datcher; of whom the Correspondent of the New York Tribune thus speaks:—

A FAITHFUL PUBLIC SERVANT.

Washington, Feb. 20th, 1862.

Francis Datcher, a colored man by birth, a French nobleman in manner, honorable, faithful, intelligent, and respected, died last week in the 43d year of his service as a Messenger in the War Department. A part of his property was a parchment, covered thickly with the autograph records of the approval of his official conduct by the several Secretaries of War under whom he served in that long period of time. A month since, a friendly compact was made between Francis and myself, that when death should discharge him of his duties to the Government, this parchment record of honor should be published to the world in the journal which he honored for its love of his race. I esteem it a privilege to be permitted to fulfil this promise.

Francis Datcher has served during the last six years as Assistant Messenger in the War Office, and I have pleasure in certifying that he has performed the duties assigned him with zeal, intelligence, attention, and integrity, and is entitled to the approbation of the Department.

Given this 3d day of March, 1825.

[Seal.] J. C. CALHOUN.

May 24, 1828.

I with pleasure bear testimony to the good qualities of F Datcher stated in the above during my administration. JAMES BARBOUR.

I heartily concur in the above testimonials to the good conduct and faithful services of Francis Datcher. P. B. PORTER.

I concur with my predecessors in the opinion they express of the character and conduct of Francis Datcher, having found him obedient, attentive, and faithful in the discharge of his duties. J. R. POINSETT.

The conduct of Francis Datcher, as Assistant Messenger during my administration of the War Department, has met my entire approbation. His capacity for the performance of his duties, and his zeal and fidelity in their execution, have not, in my opinion, been exceeded by those of any other person of my acquaintance. LEWIS CASS.

F. Datcher has continued to act as Messenger during the time I have been in the War Department, (two years,) with a fidelity that has met my entire approbation

He is an honorable and honest man.

3d May, 1831. JOHN H. EATON.

I have found Francis Datcher to be all my predecessors represent him, and cheerfully bear testimony to his uniform good conduct and his great zeal and ability as a Messenger

My only complaint against him is, that he would not leave the War Department and follow me in the Treasury Department at a higher salary

March 17, 1838. J. R. SPENCER.

Francis Datcher has officiated as Assistant Messenger at the War Department during my administration of it. I have found him attentive, obliging, and polite. Have never in any instance had occasion to find fault with him, and esteem him as a man of integrity and intelligence. I cheerfully join with my predecessors in the commendations they have bestowed upon him

J M PORTER

I cannot sufficiently recommend the faithful conduct and excellent behaviour of Francis Datcher WM THILKINS

March, 1845.

My predecessors seem to have exhausted the language of praise in their testimonials to the merits of F. Datcher, Assistant Messenger in the War Department; but after four years' acquaintance with him, I can truly say that they have done only bare justice to his character and accomplishments. As a man, he has my sincere respect; as an officer, my high commendation.

March 3, 1849. W. L. MARCY.

I cheerfully add my evidence to the admitted excellent qualities of Francis Datcher, Assistant Messenger of the War Department

July 20, 1850. GEO W CRAWFORD

It affords me pleasure to express my hearty concurrence in all that is said in the foregoing certificate in regard to the zeal and fidelity with which Francis Datcher has discharged his duties.

March 6, 1853. C. M. CONRAD.

Though the language of commendation has been somewhat exhausted, four years of daily intercourse assure me the merit of the subject has not declined. In Francis Datcher I have found what Mr. Pitt is said to have declared he had, through his long public life, sought for in vain—a man exactly suited to the place he held. It gives me pleasure to add my testimony to that of so many illustrious predecessors in his favor, and to commend him to the most respectful consideration. JEFFERSON DAVIS.

War Office, March 3, 1857.

I perform only a duty in bearing my cheerful and sincere testimony to the high character of Francis Datcher, the Assistant Messenger of the War Department. With a perfect knowledge of all the duties of his place, he discharges them with a fidelity, sagacity, and perfectly well-bred courtesy, worthy of all praise. Here, and wherever he be, the object of respect with all strangers visiting the Department, and of sincere regard with its inmates. I commend him heartily to those who may hereafter preside over the War Department. JOHN B FLOYD.

Dec. 29, 1860.

More than forty years ago I came to Washington a boy, on business connected with the War Department, and was kindly and courteously received by Francis Datcher, a colored man, having the manners and deportment of a gentleman, who ushered me into the presence of Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War. Almost every year since, in passing through the various grades of life open to every American, I have had occasion to visit the War Department, and I have always found Datcher at his post, as courteous and civil as when I first saw him. When I entered upon my duties as the Head of this Department, I was glad to have the opportunity to say: "Francis, while I am here, you will do me a great favor if you will remain, and extend to me the treatment which I have received at your hands during the long years of our acquaintance." SIMON CAMERON.

War Department, Jan. 18, 1862.

Rev. James Gloucester, of Brooklyn, New York, is with us. His visit is highly appreciated, as he is one of the live divines of the day. He preached for us to a crowded house. The theme was "The Christian Patriot; or, The Man for the Hour," which he handled ably, and with a heart power that impressed his audience.

The President's extraordinary message, which is just one remove from nothing, so far as anti-slavery is concerned, creates a variety of opinion.

We saw a military occurrence this morning which will be heard from in a few days. According to regulations here, the press cannot speak of it definitely. I had concluded to sign myself "Bartimeus," but I think I will keep the name of SAMPH.

DEATHS.

Departed this life, on Feb. 20th, 1862, George Gale, aged 16 years, and on March 2d, Susan Gale, aged 13 years, son and daughter of Littleton and the late Margaret Gale.

Little Susan, after a short illness of twenty-four hours, departed this life. Before the breath left her body, she called her step-mother to her couch, and threw her arms around her neck, and said, "Mother, mother, kiss me, and weep not for me, for I soon shall be praising the Lord in heaven with my other mother and brother George! O, mother, will you meet me in heaven?" She called the remainder of the family, one by one, and asked them to meet her in heaven.

Dear little readers, will you think of little Susan Gale, who when she was called by death to hear and know her doom, knew that "God was reconciled," and that she was going to heaven to praise her Maker for ever? J. J. HUBBERT.

Pt. Deposit, March 10th, 1862.

DIED.

We are sorry to record the deaths of two of Rev. Michael Sluby's children, of Wilmington, Del. We can sympathize with brother Sluby, when we remember that both corpses were in the house at the same time. Bennett H. Sluby died on the 6th inst; and William Sluby died on the 7th. They are gone to that better world, brother Sluby: your loss is their infinite gain.

Gradual Emancipation.—Message from the President.—WASHINGTON, March 7.—The President to-day transmitted to Congress the following Message:

Fellow Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:—I recommend the adoption of a joint resolution by your honorable bodies which shall be as follows:

Resolved, That the United States ought to cooperate with any State which may adopt gradual abolishment of slavery giving to such State pecuniary aid to be used by such State in its discretion to compensate for the inconveniences, public and private, produced by such change of system.

If the proposition contained in the resolution does not meet the approval of Congress and the country, there is the end; but if it does command such approval, I deem it of importance that the State and people immediately interested, should be at once distinctly notified of the fact, so that they may begin to consider whether to accept or reject it. The Federal Government would have no right or interest in such a measure as one of the most efficient means of self preservation. The leaders of the existing insurrection entertain the hope that this government will ultimately be forced to acknowledge the independence of some part of the disaffected region, and that all the Slave States north of such parts will then say—The Union for which we have struggled being already gone, we now choose to go with the Southern section. To deprive them of this hope, substantially ends the rebellion, and the initiation of emancipation completely deprives them of it as to all the States initiating it. The point is not that all the States inaugurating slavery would very soon, if at all, initiate emancipation; but while the offer is equally made to all, the more Northern shall, by such initiation, make it a part of the national honor and interest that the less Northern shall follow in their footsteps. I say initiation, because gradual and not sudden emancipation is better for all. In the mere financial or pecuniary view, any member of Congress who has carefully calculated treasury reports before him, can readily see for himself how very soon the current expenditures of this war would purchase, at fair valuation, all the slaves in any named State. Such a proposition in the present General Government sets up no claim of a right by Federal authority to interfere with slavery within State limits, referring as it does the absolute control of the subject in each case to the State and its people immediately interested. It is proposed as a matter of perfectly friendly action with them. In the annual message last December, I thought fit to say: The Union must be preserved, and hence all indispensable means must be employed. I said this not hastily, but deliberately. War has been made, and continues to be made an indispensable means to this end. A practical acknowledgment of the national authority would render the war unnecessary, and it would at once cease. If, however, resistance continues the war must of course continue, and it is impossible to foresee all the incidents which may attend, and all the ruin which may follow it. Such as may seem indispensable, or may obviously promise great efficiency towards ending the struggle, must and will come. The proposition now made is an offer only. I hope it may be accepted no offence to ask whether the pecuniary consideration tendered would not be of more value to the States and private persons concerned than are the institution and property in it, in the present aspect of affairs. While it is true that the adoption of the proposed resolution would be merely initiatory, and not within itself a practical measure, it is recommended in the hope that it would soon lead to important practical results. In full view of my great responsibility to my God and to my country, I earnestly beg the attention of Congress and the people to the subject. (Signed) ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The War an Invasion for Cotton.

[From the Richmond Examiner.]

Who has read without deep mortification the late order of the Federal Government that "the cotton just taken in Tennessee to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars shall be forwarded to New York?" Fifty thousand bales, it is said, are already in New York, brought from Port Royal; another quantity was secured by the gunboats ascending the Tennessee river; now it is ascertained that a hundred thousand dollars worth (twenty-five hundred bales) have been secured on the first entrance into Tennessee.

The Dress of the Federal and Rebel Soldiers.—The Richmond Dispatch, of Friday, has a long editorial on the dress of the Federal and rebel soldiers. The editor concludes thus:

The ability of the Yankees to dress themselves in handsome style is all due to the South, whose staples they have used to make themselves rich, and in dulge in all manner of luxurious living. This mat ter of dress is a matter of taste, even when people are not shut out from the source of supply. The North has always been in the habit of paying all it was worth on its back and in entrenails, whilst the South has been content with a plain style of living in everything.

How the Virginians try to Escape the Draft.—The muster rolls just handed in to the colonels of the Nineteenth and One hundred and seventy-ninth regiments are the most ridiculously curious documents it has ever been our luck to encounter. In their anxiety to get clear of militia duty, hundreds of the men have attached to their names the record of some permanent injury or horrible distemper. The rolls are thus made complete catalogues of all the ills that flesh is heir to. The great number of one-eyed and deaf men, the prevalence of chronic diarrhœa, and rheumatism in all its varieties, is truly astonishing. Some parties, who, perhaps, could think of no particular affliction, have stated in general and comprehensive terms that they were "physically disabled," and in "bad health." One old gentleman, who avowed himself a hypochondriac, actually appended his will and codicil to his signature. Great numbers have signed themselves "exempted by the Governor," and numerous citizens, thought only, perhaps, making a pair of shoes for a clerk in the Treasury Department, have followed their names with the imposing announcement, "employed on Government work."

It is our opinion that this city has already contributed her quota to the army, but we hope these muster-rolls will be published, that the world may know the men who would shirk muster themselves, and only parade (in many instances assumed) diseases when their country calls for soldiers.—Examiner.

The Arrest of Prominent Union Men in Richmond.—The Examiner, of Thursday, has the following in its local columns:

It has already been announced that the Rev. Alden Bosserman, pastor of the Universalist Church in this city, had been arrested.

On the last general fast-day Mr. Bosserman refused to open his church, and gave as his reason that Mr. Franklin Stearns had requested him not to open it, and that as Mr. Stearns paid him more money than all his congregation put together, whatever he said should be done. On last Sunday he prayed from his desk in church that this "unholy rebellion should be crushed out."

Good Generalship.—The boast in the South has always been that they had the ablest Generals, and that in a war where military science and strategy played a conspicuous part, they would necessarily have the advantage. This advantage turns out to be as baseless as the supposed superior courage and determination of the rebel soldier. We have just seen the fact developed how much abler our Generals are in strategy than the rebel leaders, who were not able to penetrate designs so fatal to their cause till it was too late to prevent disaster to their arms. Our General divided the line of the enemy, and put himself in the rear of both their armies, and so arranged his forces that suddenly, and without a moment's notice, he had both their armies attacked in the front and rear at the same moment. On the other side of the Mississippi, General Price was met in the same way. The rebel armies had cannon in the front of them, and cannon in the rear, and nothing was left them but flight. It was probably to keep Price from running away successfully (as Floyd has done) that our army retired from Springfield instead of driving him back, to concentrate elsewhere.

It is important to remark that it would have been fatal to our entire success to have had the plan of the campaign developed until the rise of the Western waters in Kentucky and Tennessee should have allowed our boats to go up the Cumberland and Tennessee twenty feet above the shoals and the torpedoes laid for them. These rivers, fed from the South, rise before those dependent on the melting snow. This is the beginning of the season for reliable operation of gunboats on the waters of the Western and Southwest. It was for this rise that General Scott wanted eleven months to work upon. Had the rebels, however, suspected for a moment his real object, nothing would have been easier than to have defeated it. General McClellan has completely out-generalled the whole of the Southern leaders, military and civil, and thrown his whole attacking force just on the very spot (Nashville) to which the rebels had thought of retreating with their confederate capital, as the most secure from all attack. We know not, at the present, how much of the conception of this plan is due to General Scott, or how exclusively to McClellan. There is in it glory enough to make a name in history for both, if both were in for it, for McClellan beyond all doubt.

From Gen. Banks' Command.—The enemy entrenched near Winchester, with 60 pieces of Artillery CHARLESTOWN, Va., March 6—Reliable intelligence states that the enemy is in full force at Winchester, and have completed formidable earthworks on this side, mounted with sixty guns, including the field batteries

Yesterday several deserters were brought into town by the cavalry. Among them was Lieutenant Arthur Markell, of the Fifth Virginia volunteers.

Latest from Charlestown, Va.—Smithfield occupied.—CHARLESTOWN, Va., March 6—8 o'clock, P. M.—Smithfield, seven miles northwest of this place, was occupied to day by a strong force.

General Banks has issued a general order forbidding all kinds of depredations or marauding upon the property of citizens. He says: No officer or soldier shall disturb in any manner the ordinary business of the country.

The country supplies, which, on our arrival, were cut off, are now coming in more freely. Public sentiment in regard to our presence is gradually undergoing a favorable change, and faces which scowled upon the Union soldiers now smile in pleasant intercourse with the officers and men.

The army store-houses here are fast filling up with confiscated articles of produce and manufactures, and such as are required are being issued to the army. The sources include fire hundred and seventy barrels of flour and two hundred bushels of wheat, the latter being in bags marked "Confederate States."

It is believed generally at Bunker Hill that the force at Winchester had been greatly reduced, leaving not over 5,000 to 6,000 men there. Others say that Jackson's force has been strengthened by the regiments from Lynchburg. Capt. Coe's scouts last night reached a point only four miles from Winchester, but no entered it, a regular force of the enemy's cavalry picket.

Departure of Gov. Johnson for Tennessee.—WASHINGTON, Feb. 7, 1862.—Gov. ANDREW JOHNSON, accompanied by Messrs. Clark, Nelson, Johnson, Wm. A. Brownlow, secretary, &c., Hon. Horace Maynard and Hon. Emerson Etheridge, Clerk of the House, left Washington this afternoon for Nashville.

A Great Naval Battle with the Iron clad Steamer Merrimac.—Whatever doubts may have been at first expressed regarding the efficiency of the rebel iron-clad steamer Merrimac, the events of the last day or two show that it is never wise to despise an enemy or underrate his power to do mischief. The steamer Merrimac has been preparing for many months for some desperate undertaking, and on Saturday she came out of Norfolk, while the two rebel gunboats Jamestown and Yorktown came down the James River, and the three engaged the frigates Cumberland and Congress, the first a twenty-two gun ship, and the latter a fifty-gun ship, which, unfortunately, had no regular crew on board. The Merrimac ran into the Cumberland with all steam on and sunk her. The Congress struck her flag, and was set fire to by the rebels. The Minnesota, fifty guns, the Roanoke, fifty, and the St. Lawrence, fifty, came up and joined in the fight, but the Minnesota got aground. The shot from our ships glanced harmlessly off the iron sides of the rebel iron-clad vessel. Night put an end to the naval fight, and there is no telling what might have been the result, but for the opportune arrival of the new iron steam battery, the "Monitor," from New York. She reached Fortress Monroe on Saturday night, and soon had her powers put to the test. Early yesterday morning, the three rebel vessels attacked her, but after a five hours' fight they all hauled off, the Merrimac in a sinking condition.

This action illustrates the fact that iron-plated vessels are more than a match for the best not iron plated. The Merrimac at first was a failure, because she was overloaded with iron; but the rebels, with an energy and perseverance which are characteristic of them, went to work and remedied this defect by stripping the vessel of some of its armor. She fully proved herself to be a most formidable vessel of war, superior to the largest wooden vessel, unless the character of the armament on board our vessels of war is changed, and guns of the Rodman pattern are put on board of them. Nothing but a crushing weight of iron can affect the sides of a vessel sheathed with railroad bars. Bollins' attack on our vessels at the mouth of the Mississippi, some months ago, demonstrated the fact that our wooden ships, with smooth-bore guns, were entirely at the mercy of iron-plated ships, and were obliged to fly from them. That ought to have been a warning to the Navy Department, and with the preparations known to be making upon the Merrimac at Norfolk, a floating battery of heavy guns should have been ready for her at Fortress Monroe. Any of the old hulks, useless for sailing purposes, could have been plated in the same way the Merrimac was, and armed with the heaviest guns known, would have been an effectual safeguard against any attack. But if the Merrimac illustrated the superiority of iron-plated vessel, the Ericsson proved the still greater efficiency of iron armor combined with the heaviest weight of guns. She is armed with two of Rodman's guns, which throw a 480-pound ball. The effect of these on the Merrimac seemed to have been most damaging. To the superiority of the Ericsson is certainly due the honor of retrieving the disasterous the early part of the fight. But for her arrival it is possible that the rebel vessel would have battered all our ships to pieces. The Merrimac is not adapted for sea, but with coal enough on board, it is quite possible that she could have passed Fortress Monroe, run down the coast, and captured every one of our vessels of war which could not run away from her. The Navy Department should now keep their eyes upon the Nashville, at Beaufort. It would not be surprising to see her sent out some day from under the guns of Fort Macon, plated with iron or armed with heavy guns, and capture the blockading vessels.

Another Triumph.—We have glorious news from Missouri. A grand battle has been fought and a grand victory achieved. Fort Donelson is destined to be wholly forgotten, for the time, in the jubilation over the last intelligence from HALLECK. The army of the South-west, under General Curtis, has completely routed the combined hordes of McCulloch, Price, Van Dorn, and McIntosh, which are being pursued by our cavalry. A large quantity of guns, provisions, etc., have fallen into our hands. The loss of the enemy, as may readily be imagined, must have been enormous, when our own is estimated at no less than 1,000 men.

In view of the remarkable success of the Monitor in the action of Sunday, it is probable that the Senate Finance Committee will recede from its opposition to the House appropriation of fifteen million dollars for iron-clad gunboats. Until the news of this battle arrived, the Senate Committee was determined in its opposition to the gunboat bill, but circumstances alter cases, and there is now a new phase of the case to be considered.

A special despatch from Washington says the chairman of the Naval Committee of the House declares that the disaster will produce a good effect. If Congress will learn from it the lesson that iron is superior to wood for the construction of vessels of war.

At last we have intelligence from Commodore Dupont's fleet, whose departure from Port Royal we chronicled several days ago. Brunswick, Georgia, and Fernandina, Florida, have both been taken possession of without resistance, the rebels abandoning the forts at both places, with all their contents, on the approach of our gunboats. The occupation of these points by the Federal forces gives the Government the control of the whole coast of Georgia from South Carolina to Florida.

We see no reason to doubt the reports about the evacuation of Manassas by the rebels. The National Intelligencer of yesterday, says that the military authorities in Washington have received reliable authority to that effect. The lines of the army of the Potomac were so rapidly closing around the rebel stronghold, that its evacuation or capture was only a question of time.

We have stirring news from New Madrid, Missouri. General Pope's forces have reached that place and commenced an attack on the rebel strongholds.

The rebels are in large force there, and have several gunboats helping them, but as Commodore Foote's fleet have gone down to the scene of operation, it is probable that they will not be allowed to do much damage to our forces. If the rebel gunboats are driven off, we may expect to hear of another large capture of prisoners, as General Pope's army has them surrounded, so that they cannot retreat by land, while Commodore Foote will attend to them by water.

Onward Progress of the Union Arms.—The operations against the rebels are as active as they are extended. From all around the cordon which is enclosing them, come encouraging accounts of gains, which prove that the rebel power is not equal to the contest it is engaged in, and that the work of concentration with them has begun, as a military necessity. Com. Dupont, with his fleet of vessels, has taken Brunswick and Fernandina, the first in Georgia, the last in Florida. Fort Clinch was abandoned by the rebels, and the flag of the Union now floats over it. This is the first of the forts on the coast seized by the secessionists which has been "retaken," as President Lincoln said they would be. It will not be long before others are added to the list. From New Madrid, on the Mississippi, just where it bends on the southeast corner of Missouri, General Pope has commenced an attack on the rebels whom he had invested there, their number being about 10,000, with four of Hollin's gunboats. This battle, which was going on by the last despatches, will be a land and naval fight, and Capt Foote will have another opportunity to exhibit his daring and skill. Besides this, we have a report that Winchester, Va., has been abandoned, and from other indications it is supposed that the rebels are about to retire from Manassas. The movements in Tennessee by Buell, and behind Norfolk, by Burnside, are very threatening to them, and independently of the proposed concentration of their forces, would be likely to make them withdraw from Manassas, if they could do so with safety to Richmond. From Arkansas comes the intelligence of a great battle, lasting three days, between Curtis' division of Halleck's army and Gen'l Price. It has been a most sanguinary battle, but Price has been utterly routed and many prisoners taken. All these successes indicate the speedy downfall of the rebellion.

Great News from Virginia—The United States Troops in Manassas.—Washington, March 11th.—Manassas has been evacuated by the rebels, and our forces have taken peaceful possession.

The rebels had all fled precipitately, before our forces took possession, abandoning their fortifications at Centreville, as well as those on the Lower Potomac. It is believed that they are in full retreat

PRESENCE OF MIND

BY REV. THEODORE L. CUYLER

Did you ever cross the Catskills by the old-fashioned turnpike on a [illegible] day? Long, over sit out with the driver just as the summit was gained, and the stage began to swing down the dizzy descent? You laid tight hold, I'll warrant you, of the side strap, and braced both your feet on the foot board, and if you were a little inexperienced in mountain travel, you said somewhat nervously, "Now, driver, go carefully down here."

The driver smiles, changes his quid coolly to the other side of his cheek, rings a loud crack with his whip, and clasps his heel on the break as much as to say "festina lente," and away the coach sings down the mountain. Presently the driver, with a slight catch in his breath, says, "I declare if the reins on that off leader ain't broke!" Sure enough the lines are unloosed from the bit of the gay skittish creature, and he tosses his head with an airy motion very suggestive of a runaway. Your first impulse is to scream to the inside passengers, your next one is to make a break-neck leap from the box of the coach. "Keep quiet, keep quiet!" says the driver, and then swings his long whip around the legs of the two dancing leaders, as if he too were in a plot to send the coach and its precious cargo to Davy Jones' locker in the shortest possible time. "Driver, what do you mean?" "Keep quiet," he says, with another touch of the whip to the leader's white fetlock, "I know what I'm about; those leaders are full of mettle, and I want to make them think that I am giving them the loose rein; if they only knew they were loose, they would dash us all into kindlin' wood in less than five minutes." We try to believe that John is right, but secretly we give up all for lost. We look down at the narrow thread of the Hudson River, winding ten miles beneath us, and then across to the distant Green Mountains of Vermont that gleam in the October sun as the Delectable Mountains gleamed before Bunyan's Pilgrim. It is astonishing how of mind sense objects when in great danger or when expecting death. A culprit listening to his death-sentence notices every button on each juryman's coat.

With this intense study of the scene before us, and with our hand so numb that we do not feel the strap we are grasping, we whirl down a half mile of the declivity. Before us is a slight rise in the road of four or five feet. Just as the leaders gallop up it, the driver jumps with his whole weight on the break—gives a tremendous pull on the reins of the wheel horses—shouts "Woo" with a startling screech—and in the instant that the coach halts, he leaps from the box, and is at the leaders' heads! It is all done in a twinkling. And before the frightened inside passengers have had time to shout, "What is the matter?" the quick witted driver is fastening the rein-buckle again into the bit.

Now there was presence of mind. Had that driver been "out of his wits" he would probably have dashed himself off of his coach, to be followed by the coach dashing itself over the mountain-side. But he had his wits within reach—or what the old Greeks called nearness of mind. As the shrewd Dr. John Brown, of Edinburgh, says in one of his essays, "It is a curious condition of mind that this requires. It is like sleeping with your pistol under your pillow, and the pistol on full cock; a moment lost, and all may be lost. There is the very nick of time. Men, when they have done some signal feat of presence of mind, if asked how they did it, do not very well know—they just did it. It was in fact done, and then thought of; not thought of and then done, in which case it would likely never have been done at all. It is one of the highest powers of mind thus to act; it is done by an acquired instinct."

This presence of mind is invaluable in a military commander. Nearly every battle turns on one or two rapid movements, executed amid whirl of smoke, and thunder of guns that jars the solid globe. Napoleon possessed this quality beyond any general of modern times. His mind acted like the lightning; and never with such prompt precision as in the moments of greatest confusion and danger. What confused others clarified him. At Arcola, he saw that the tide was turning against him; he called up twenty-five horsemen, gave them each a trumpet, and made a dashing charge that gave him the victory. At Montebello, he computed with his eye the distance of the Austrian cavalry, saw that it would require a quarter of an hour for them to come up, and in those fifteen minutes executed a manœuvre that saved the day. "These quarters of an hour," he used to say, "generally decide the fate of a battle. The Austrians never know the value of time." A little of this Napoleonic presence of mind might have saved for us the battle of Bull Run. But officers and soldiers lost both; and one-half of that whole army set off on a wild, topsy-turvy chase after their wits!

A good physician needs to have his mind at his finger-ends. There is a sudden turn in the disease or there must be a rapid surgical movement. His books are useless unless his books are in his head. He must grow cooler as his patient or the bystanders grow more frightened. Napoleon feared that the physician who was attending upon the Empress at the birth of the King of Rome would lose his self-possession. "Compose yourself," said the Emperor, "and imagine that you are attending only a poor girl in the Faubourg St. Antoine."

The pulpit debutant who sees his manuscript swimming about on the walls of the church that is swimming too—the panic-struck house-wife who throws her mirrors out of the third-story window at the alarm of fire—the pilot who gives the wrong pull to the wheel when a vessel comes suddenly out of a fog upon his bow—are all familiar illustrations of one's wits "stepped out" just at the moment that they were wanted. Dr. Brown in his essay gives a couple of instances of the opposite.

A lady was in front of her lawn with her children, when a mad dog made his appearance, pursued by the neighbors. What did she do? Better than you or I would have done. She ran straight toward the dog, received its head in her thick stuff gown between her knees, and muffling it up, held it with all her might until the men arrived. No one was hurt. Of course, she fainted after it was all over. Both her acts were womanlike.

The other case Dr. B. gives is of a Mrs. Major Robertson, a slight and beautiful woman, who, on going alone to her room, sees the foot of a man projecting from under her bed! Only a servant is in the house. She goes carelessly about the room, until suddenly exclaiming aloud, "I declare, I've forgotten that key again," she leaves the light and coolly goes down stairs. When she comes up again it is with a policeman, and the foot is soon on its way to the watch-house.

Presence of mind is partly a natural gift, and partly an acquisition. It is hard to to ach it to a fool, but many a wise man has played the fool for want of it.

MEMOIR OF BUNSEN.

We are glad to see it announced in the Record of London, that the widow of Chevalier Bunsen is engaged in preparing a memoir of her late distinguished husband. Few men better deserve a memorial than he. An eminent scholar and statesman, and moving in the highest ranks of society, he was yet a devout believer in the truths of Christianity, and an humble disciple of the Great Master.

THE HEAD AND THE HEART.

The "head" brings those things which pertain to faith into the place where they belong, namely, "the heart." It was a great and important question which a distinguished man once asked Spencer, "How can we bring the head to the heart?" Is not the correct answer this?—"Prepare a place in the heart for the head, through the awakening of feeling for faith, and then bring the head itself into it."

2. To [illegible] with more [illegible]

3. To [illegible] that if exercise is good for the health [illegible] more good is done.

4. To [illegible] that every heart [illegible] room in the house is large enough to sleep in.

5. To argue that whatever remedy causes one to feel immediately better, is "good for" the system, without regard to more ultimate effects. The soothing syrup," for example, will stop the cough of children, and does arrest diarrhœa, only to cause a little later, alarming convulsions, or the more fatal inflammation of the brain, or water on the brain, at least, it always [illegible] disease.

6. To commit an act which is felt in itself to be prejudicial, hoping that somehow or other it may be done in your case with impunity.

7. To advise another to take a remedy which you have not tried yourself or without making special inquiry whether all the conditions are alike.

8. To eat without an appetite, or continue to eat, after it has been satisfied, merely to gratify the taste.

10. To eat a hearty supper for the pleasure experienced during the brief time it is passing down the throat, at the expense of a whole night of disturbed sleep, and a weary waking in the morning.

11. To remove a portion of the clothing incidentally after exercise, when the most stupid draysman in the city knows that if he does not put a cover on his horse the moment he ceases work, in winter, he will lose him in a few days, by pneumonia.

12. To contend that because the dirtiest children in the street, or on the highway, are hearty and healthy, that, therefore, it is healthy to be dirty, forgetting that continuous daily exposure to the pure out-door air, in joyous, unrestrained activities, is such a powerful agency for health, that those who live thus are well, in spite of the rags and filth.

13. To presume to repeat, later in life, without injury, the indiscretions, exposures, and intemperances which, in the flush of youth were practised with impunity.

14. To believe that warm air is necessarily impure, or that pure cool air is necessarily more healthy than the confined air of a close and crowded vehicle. The latter at most can only cause faintness or nausea; while entering a conveyance after walking briskly, lowering a window, thus while still exposed to a draft, will give a cold infallibly, or an attack of pleurisy or pneumonia, which will cause weeks and months of suffering, if not actual death within four days.

15. To "remember the Sabbath day," by working harder and later on Saturday than on any other day in the week, with a view to sleeping late next morning, and staying at home all day to rest; conscience quieted by the plea of not "feeling very well."—Journal of Health.

INCIDENTS OF THE FORT HENRY BATTLE.

Flag Officer Foote is beloved by all his men. The night after he captured Fort Henry, a gentleman said to him that he was getting nervous, and must have some sleep. "I never slept better in my life than I did the night before the battle, and I never prayed more fervently than on that morning; but I couldn't sleep last night for thinking of those poor fellows on board the Essex," was his reply—a reply which at once reveals his whole character; for he is not only a moral man, but humane, self-sacrificing: one who openly recognises the claims of Christianity, and lives up to his professions.

In the explosion on the Essex, at the capture of Fort Henry, one of the seamen was shockingly scalded. His clothing was at once removed; linseed oil and flour applied to his parboiled flesh, and he was carefully wrapped in blankets and placed in bed. A few moments after, came news that the rebel flag was struck, and the fort surrendered. In his enthusiasm, he sprang out of his berth, ran up on deck, and waved his blanket in the air, huzzaing for the stars and stripes. The poor fellow, after the first excitement was over, was assisted below, and in the night he died, full of rejoicing to the last at the triumph of the old flag.

A correspondent writing from Fort Henry says: "Since the rebel inhabitants about here have met our troops, they have strangely altered their views, and express great pleasure at their happy disappointment, though they concluded at first General Grant's army must be an exception to Yankees generally. One elderly female, living a few miles above the fort, declared to some of the scouts that the Yankees were worse than the Indians; that they always burned the bodies of the rebels, and that they had eat the corpse of Gen. Zollicoffer to pieces and eaten them. The woman honestly believed the story, and said that she had been told it by a man who had witnessed this instance of Northern cannibalism."

GOOD FOR MR. LINCOLN.

We learn from excellent authority (says the Philadelphia Bulletin) that during the recent visit of the Finance Committee of our Board of Trade to Washington, an informal visit was paid to President Lincoln, by whom the Committee was received with all of his well known affability and cordiality. Encouraged by the President's open manner, one of the members of the Committee made bold to attack him directly upon the topic nearest his own heart, when the following dialogue ensued:

"Mr. President, I wish you would tell me where the Burnside expedition has gone."

"Why, don't you know where they have gone? I thought every body knew that."

"Well, sir, it may appear very ignorant in me, but I must confess I don't know, and that I would like to know, exceedingly."

"You really surprise me, sir. The papers have been full of it; every body has been talking of it, and I did not suppose there was anybody who did not know all about it. Of course I will tell you, if you will promise not to give your authority."

The gentleman promised solemnly.

The President drew his chair close to him and with his hand carefully interposed between him and the rest of the company, whispered, with mysterious emphasis:

"The Burnside expedition, sir, has gone to sea!"

THE SIRENS.

Have you ever heard the story of the Sirens? They were women of wonderful beauty, dwelling on an island, green and flowery, in the Mediterranean sea. When vessels passed their island they would sit upon the shore, making the air musical with their sweet singing and coaxe the poor sailors so that they could not refrain from leaping into the water to rush to them. But when the Sirens had them on the shore, they murdered them, and the heaps of white bones scattered here and there over the beach showed too plainly how successful their allurements had been. When Ulysses was returning to his home in Ithaca after his long and painful wanderings, he was obliged to pass by the island of the Sirens. His friend, the goddess Circe, had warned him of their fatal beauty and had advised him how to escape it. So when the charming islands came in sight, the cunning Ulysses stuffed his ears and those of his men with wax, so that they might not hear their songs, and he made his sailors bind him with cords to the mast so that he should not be enticed by their bloodish ments to his destruction. Yet when he saw their beauty, he wished to get loose and rush to them But his men would not untie him, and so they got safely past.

Now do you understand what this story means? Perhaps it is not true, but it has a deep meaning. When you are assailed by temptation and sin, you should close your ears against them as Ulysses did his, and cry to God for strength to enable you to withstand them. And if you do yield to them, you will be certainly suffer and [illegible] unfortunate, when you wish to indulge in any [illegible] think of this little story and try to fight against it and to conquer it. HOUSEHOLD BABY

[illegible]

What a joy to human eyes,
When it laughs, or when it cries;
What a treasure, what a poise
[illegible]

Be its temper roving, falling,
[illegible]
'Tis the same dear precious darling—
[illegible]

If the scene without be dreary,
If the heart within grow weary,
Baby wakes, and all is cheery—
What a rush for baby!

Mamma's eyes grow bright with joy—
[illegible]
Gladly leaves his last new toy
To play bo-peep with baby!

Sisters from their music run,
Maud has caught the "sweetest one,"
Grace bends down in girlish fun,
To make a horse for baby!

Up to everything we know,
Hands and feet "upon the go,"
What a funny creature though,
Is the household baby!

Bring the puppy and the cat,
Let her pull and pinch and pat,
Puss and pup were made for that,
Made to please the baby!

Bring that china vase, mamma,
Quick "the mirror and the hammer,"
Any thing to make a clamor,
And delight the baby!

Let it clang and clash away,
Let it laugh and shout and play,
And [illegible] while it may,
Dear mischievous baby!

What a joy to human eyes,
What an angel in disguise,
[illegible]
Is the household baby!

Little Pilgrim.

PRINCESS PEARLYPAT.

BY LYNDE PALMER.

Little Prue had been very sick, but had so far recovered as to sit up in the big arm-chair—wrapped in so many blankets that she looked like a quaint little mummy—and receive the visits of her friends. So one bright afternoon they came in a flock, each kind hand bringing a present to make rosy pleasure dance in the little pale cheeks. Madge had an orange, Bernard a bunch of hot-house grapes, Flaxy, a wonderful "picture-book," Bettine, a kitten as handsome as if Hermann had rubbed "Mac" and "Jeff" into one, and finally, tenxing Dudley, after looking over all the room, and pretending as great surprise at discovering Prue in the blankets, as if she had been a needle in a hay stack, drew up his chair, and whispered confidentially,

"You see, 'Dot,' I've been hard at work at the 'Golden Rule,' ever since I heard your story, and to-day there is such a splendid wind' I couldn't think of anything that would please me better than a magnificent kite, with no end of tail, so I've bought you one, though it has stripped me of my last cent. See, here it is, and if you don't think the tail is long enough, I've got Seward's correspondence on the Mason and Slidell affair, and we'll just make it up into tags, and then I guess we can back that tail, for length, against the world."

Poor Prue tried to be grateful, but looked very blank.

"There, you don't like it," said Dudley, with an air of immense disappointment. "Didn't you say we ought to do to others as"—

"Yes," said little Prue, hesitating, "and you're very good to me, but you see little girls don't fly kites much, and the next time you give me anything I'd rather you'd do unto me as you would like to have me do unto you, if you were me."

"Good," said Dudley, "I just begin to see it."

"Come," said Bernard, "you are taking up too much time. Remember that 'Princess Pearlypat' is going to tell little Prue a story."

"Oh, how nice!" cried Prue, clapping her little thin hands.

"Wait a minute," said Dudley, fumbling in his pocket, "here's a doll that old Pennyman on the corner persuaded me to buy, but I'm sure I don't know what to do with it, unless the housekeeper can pick up this head to wear her linen thread, and perhaps stuff a pincushion with those fussy yellow curls."

Little Prue uttered an exclamation of dismay at such a fate for those lovely pink cheeks, and golden ringlets, and involuntarily stretched out her hands.

"Oh, would you care for it?" said Dudley, in great surprise. "Who would have thought it? You are very kind to take it off my hands. What a good little Prue you always were. Now don't do it just to oblige me."

Dear simple little Prue assured him that it wouldn't trouble her in the least, to take care of the doll, and Dudley professing great relief, turned to blushing Bettine, alias "Princess Pearlypat," who was chosen orator for the occasion.

"In the first place," began Bettine, "you must know that my big brother Frank called me Princess Pearlypat, because I was like the Princess in a funny old German story, whose hair was so bright and yellow that it looked like a crown of gold. I wouldn't tell you this only that at the time of my story nobody called me by any other name. A great many years ago, when I was quite a little girl"—

"How many?" asked Dudley.

"Well," said Bettine, considering and coloring a little, "about three. I was standing one Saturday night out by the gate, not feeling good-natured at all. You see I had expected to spend all that day pick-nicking in the woods, and instead I had just sat by the play-room window, and seen it pour, pour, pour, from morning till night. This was very hard, and now, just at sunset, when it was too late, the clouds all rolled away in the most provoking manner, and, as I stood at the gate, all the West grew like a great crimson sea, the trees were all over diamonds, and you would have thought the birds were just going crazy. But I was very angry. 'It's all very nice for you, Mrs Robin,' I said, 'who don't study fractions and geography from Monday till Friday, and go to church all day Sunday. You needn't feel a bit disappointed about the rain, when you can be playing about all day to-morrow, while I sit cooped up in that high-backed pew, with old Miss Prim's big black bonnet bobbing before me.'"

Just then Paul Peyser came along. You remember Paul, and what great friends we used to be. He's gone away to school now. Well, Paul and I had a long talk over our grievances and disappointments. 'It will be a splendid day 'to-morrow," said Paul, at last, "It will be too bad for you to be perched up all day behind Miss Prim's bonnet."

"I hate Miss Prim," said I, feeling that I must be angry with somebody.

"Yes," said Paul, "I don't care if she is a member of the church, and going to be an angel some day, she isn't near as pretty to look at as a weed."

Then we both laughed at good old Miss Prim, and after a little more talk together, we formed a very bad plan, as you will see as I go on with my story. I must say I felt rather uneasy about it, after I went into the house, and the next morning when I told mother that my head ached, so that I did not feel like going to church, it was not quite a story, for I had been tossing and restless all night, and my head was very hot. So my kind mother bathed my forehead, and darkened the room, and leaving me on the sofa, told me to keep very still till she came home. She was hardly out of the house before Paul's round face looked in at the window.

"Oh, you're there, are you, Princess? All right! Come on! Such a time as I had though, I was such a fool as to play sick before breakfast, and I declare they didn't let me eat enough to keep a horn-bug alive. Come, what are you waiting for?"

"I'm afraid it isn't right to spend the holy Sabbath in the woods."

"There, I might have known you'd back out, girl-baby!" said he, scornfully, and then he changed his tone. "Come, Pearlypat, that's a brave girl! I've got the dearest little cave to show you. I was the Columbus, and found it all myself, but I'll tell you the secret, and no one else shall know. Won't it be fun to hide there sometimes? It's a little place. I'm going to call it 'the Princess' Thimble,' or 'Pearlypat's Cradle,' or whatever you like. Come, we won't be gone but an hour. Let me lift you your highness' sun bonnet;" and so some way, I hardly know how, he coaxed me out over the soft green fields into the woods. It was the loveliest morning that I ever knew, and now that the church bells had stopped, there wasn't a sound except the birds, and those dear little noises of bees, and lazy, sleepy flies. I thought how very good God was to make everything so beautiful, and when, as we struck into the mossy, shady path, Paul quoted from the piece he used to speak Friday afternoons, 'The groves were God's first temples,' I began to think we were not doing anything so very wrong after all. Why couldn't we be just as good out there in the dear old woods as sitting bolt upright in the little brick church.

"Let's try and be good out in these 'first temples,' Paul," said I. "Let's each say the verse we learned this morning."

"Oh, I was too sick to learn any," said Paul, with his gay laugh. "What's yours, Princess?"

"Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him, for he knoweth our frame. He remembereth that we are dust."

"That's a great verse for us, Pearlypat," said Paul. "I never thought of it just so before. Don't you see, if we're doing wrong to-day, God won't be very angry with us. We won't be expected to act just like angels. Don't you see He'll just remember that we're dust."

I knew there was something wrong about this, and I had a sort of dim idea that we ought to be very thankful if God remembered this when we were trying to do our very best. But I didn't know just what to say, and so we went on and pretty soon we forgot all about verses and Sunday. We sailed boats in the brook, and had a little feast in the cave, and finally began to play "catch," and while I was chasing him very hard through the woods, where there wasn't any path, I saw Paul suddenly throw up his hands, then he gave a little cry, and there was the last of him. I came after rather more slowly, you may be sure, and found that in our play we had come right upon the edge of the ravine, and looking over I saw that Paul had only fallen a little way, and was holding on to a twig.

"Ah, Pearlypat," said he, laughing, for I believe he would laugh if he were going to be hung. "You see the wood-spirits are dragging me down, but just reach me your hand, and I'll be up in a minute."

So I took hold of a little bush, and leaned over and he caught my hand, and struggled up, but just at the worst minute, my bush gave way, over I tumbled, and Paul after me, over and over. I quite lost my breath, and was so stunned with hitting my head against stones, that I didn't know anything for a long time. At last I heard Paul laugh, he always laughed, though this time he groaned the minute after.

"Well, Princess," said he, "how do you like playing gralanche?"

"It's poor fun," said I, trying to sit up, but feeling so sure all over, that I burst out crying.

"Nonsense, Pearlypat," said Paul, dragging himself up to me, and smoothing my hand, "I've either sprained or broken my foot, so I can't walk, but you see some one will come to find us before long, and they'll carry us home on rose leaves. No one will think of scolding us when they find we're hurt, but we'll be petted, and have all kinds of nice things to eat, and won't go to school for a week."

"But as the hours passed away, and no help came, matters began to look pretty serious. Once we thought we heard steps in the woods above, and cried with all our might, but we were so far from the road that no one thought of looking for us in that dark ravine.

"O how many times during the day I would have given anything in the world to have been sitting in my clean white dress behind Miss Prim's black bonnet. But the day wore on, and when the sunset burned so fierce and red behind the solemn old pines, I felt as if God was very angry with us.

"What do you think of my verse now, Paul?" said I, "I'm afraid we'll have to stay here all night. Do you think God will remember that we are dust?"

"I'm afraid he doesn't remember anything else," said Paul, with a doleful shake of the head, "I'm afraid he thinks we might just as well lie here a year or two, as those little lumps of clay there."

"Then, as it was pretty dark, I'm quite sure Paul laughed a little the wrong side of his mouth, though he made all manner of fun of me, and said they wouldn't need any more rain in the ravine all summer.

"I don't remember much after that, only that Paul made me lay my head on his shoulder, and I went half to sleep, though I always kept dreaming I was an avalanche, and would wake up with a great jump and a sob.

"All of a sudden, when the stars had been out more than an hour, Paul started up with a cry, and I thought we had fallen into the hands of the Indians, there was such screaming and hallooing, and great red torches that flared till all the trees seemed dancing like mad. I thought I must die then to be sure, and shutting my eyes, I began to say my prayers just as fast as I could, 'Now I lay me down to sleep' when somebody caught me right up in his arms, and I heard dear Frank say almost sobbing, 'She is alive, dear little Pearlypat,' and he kissed me over and over.

"I was very sick for a long time, but everybody was a great deal kinder than I deserved. I remember that good Miss Prim used to rub my aching limbs, and carry me about every day, till I could quite cry for shame, to think we had said she was uglier than a weed.

"No one ever said a word to me about how naughty I had been, only one day Frank said very softly, 'I used to hope dear little Pearlypat was one of God's children,' but I couldn't answer a word; so he said, 'Does my little Princess know that she must act very differently if the great King ever calls her to be a princess in the other world?'

"I didn't say anything, but Frank knew I was thinking a great deal, so he kissed me and went away.

"That same day Paul came to see me, looking rather pale. 'I've had a pretty tough time, Pearlypat,' said he, laughing, of course, 'but I wasn't too sick to learn a verse,' and then he grew quite sober—'Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy.'"

THE LITTLE CAPTIVE GIRL.

The first missionary, in the land of Assyria, was a little captive girl. She was stolen out of the land of Israel, from her father and mother, and taken far away into a strange land. It was very hard for the little girl to leave her father and mother, and brothers and sisters. It was still harder for her to leave the house of God, and a family where God was worshipped, to go to a land where God was not known, and where there were none to sing his praise. But she was stolen, and forced to go away, far away from home. Those who took her were wicked, cruel men, and they did not care for her crying, nor how much the loss of her dear friends would break her little heart. She was placed in the family of a man whose name was Naaman who was an idolator, and who neither worshipped nor prayed God. How hard was it for her to have the children of this man laugh at her, and mock her, when she prayed and sang psalms to God. But their laughing and mocking did not keep her from praying to God. Her master was a very rich man, and he had a very bad disease called leprosy. No doctors in all that land, could cure him, and unless he was cured he knew he would surely die. One day this little captive girl told her mistress, that if her master would go to the prophet in Samaria, he could be cured. Her mistress laughed at her. But the little girl still said, "Oh, that my master were with the prophet in Samaria!" One day, when the man was almost dead, his wife told him what the little captive girl had said, and persuaded him to go to the prophet and see if he could cure him. He consented and went. He took a rich present, and many men with him, and came to the prophet's house. The prophet sent word to him, as he stood at his gate, to go and wash himself seven times in the river Jordan, and he would be cured. He went and washed, and was cured of the leprosy. Children, the world is full of leprosy, for sin is the worst of all leprosy, and unless the sinner is washed in the blood of Christ, he must die, forever die. Will you tell sinners of Christ the great Prophet? That Christ is willing and able to save sinners? You, little reader, must be washed from sin, in the blood of Christ, or you will die eternally. He invites you to come and be washed. Come yourself, and tell all others to come, and to be cured. Be like the little captive girl, say to sinners, Oh, that you would go to the great Prophet, for he will heal you.

THE SABBATH SAILING EXCURSION.

A TRUE STORY.

Dear little Charlie J., with his sunny curls, blue eyes, and rosy cheeks, his good nature and obliging disposition, was a favorite with all who knew him. His playmates would engage in no game till they had searched for him; and at home he was considered the sunshine of the household. A few months after his parents had removed from Pittsburgh to St. Louis, one beautiful Sabbath afternoon in July, Charlie, with his books under his arm, started out, as usual, for Sabbath School. Nothing but sickness ever kept him at home, and his lessons were always well prepared.

As he was walking along he heard some one call him, and looking back saw Willie Lee and Harry Scott.

Willie said, "Do not be in such a hurry, Charlie; we wish you to take a walk with us. It is not school-time, so we are going to walk along the river bank."

Charlie at first refused, as his mother had always forbidden his going any place else, when on the road to Sabbath School. At last he yielded to their persuasions, and went with them.

These boys were older than Charlie, and he was so old going, that it was very difficult for him to say no, but should he not have done so? After going some distance they saw a sail-boat, which Harry immediately proposed appropriating for, as he said, "a little while." Charlie hesitated, but being more easily influenced than before, jumped in with the others. They were enjoying themselves very much, when suddenly there was an end to their sport. A violent storm had arisen. Their own pleasure occupied so entirely their attention, that they did not perceive the large, black clouds which obscured the sun, and spread themselves over the whole sky. Their boat was tossed to and fro, and finally upset. Two of these little boys sank beneath the waves, to rise no more, till called forth at the last day, by the great trumpet of Him who is the "resurrection and the life." Charlie and Willie were drowned. Harry alone remained to carry the sad tidings to the now desolate homes. My little reader, do you think he would ever again break the 4th and 5th Commandments? Although this was such an impressive lesson to him, he will be likely again to disobey his parents, or break the Sabbath, unless he asks God to help him. Without His aid we cannot keep from sin. I hope when tempted to do wrong, you will think of little Charlie and his deeply grieved parents, and ask God to give you strength to say no.

MYRTA

DON'T FRET.

Parents, we mean you, when we say, "Don't fret." Don't fret with your little ones when they are slow to understand your teachings—when their pertness occasionally brings a sharp reproof to your tongue. Remember the world is new to them, and their little minds cannot grasp the mass of facts and truths which continually crowd upon them. Don't fret because your child cannot keep pace with your further. Teach the little ones patiently. Line upon line, and precept upon precept, here a little and there a little.

Children ask a great many questions. But, answer them pleasantly, and as clearly as you can. Do not answer them with impatience, nor with a frown. Seek to deepen their curiosity. Let your reply be such as to stir up a desire to know more in the heart of the little ones. Teach your little ones with patience and care, and they will bless you in after years. Sow in their young hearts the seeds of divine truth and love, looking to God for his blessing, and you will receive an abundant reward.

SEWING MACHINES.

SEWING MACHINES. WILCOX & GIBBS

Price with Hemmer and Feller,

$35 00.

THIS MACHINE HAS POINTS OF SUPERIORITY PECULIARLY ITS OWN.

Stitching, Hemming, and Felling with a Single Thread.

It forms a flat, even, and elastic seam, which is [illegible] and is [illegible] in case, even if the seam is cut at frequent intervals, and also under all circumstances [illegible]

A talented device of great utility to seamstresses prevents the possibility of the machine being run in the wrong direction, or the balance wheel wearing a lady's dress.

Another feature which deserves particular attention is [illegible]

You do good either to two pairs of such, as he does in one minute [illegible]

These Machines are simple and accurate in their construction, as pure as the tree of the shuttle; and with one thread [illegible]

Although at about half the price of the other first class machines they will accomplish double the sewing in a given time.

It is emphatically the good, low priced Family Sewing Machine that the public have long been waiting for.—Boston Transcript.

"It is indeed a wonderful production, and for family use especially, to either will bear any comparison with it."—Philadelphia Evening Journal.

"A mechanical wonder."—Scientific American.

"Among the best and most serviceable sewing machines. Light and elegantly finished, and as simple in its construction that it seems almost impossible for it to get out of repair."—Pittsburg Christian.

"Has combined with its own peculiar merits all the really valuable improvements of the higher priced machines."—Pennsylvanian.

"This machine, in the midst of the competition, has more nearly met the requirements of a perfect family machine, than any one exhibited."—Franklin Institute Exhibition Report of 1858.

"Taking into consideration simplicity, compass, durability and doing all work, the committee were unanimously in favor of the Wilcox & Gibbs as a single thread machine."—Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society's Report.

"The most, in justice, express our confidence in the merits of the Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine. We consider it a desirable [illegible] has been supplied by it, in proving beyond doubt, that two threads are not as was supposed, necessary to a good instrument."—Christian Advocate and Journal, May 21, 1856.

"We have one of these machines in use, and think more highly of it than of any of the number we have tried."—Richmond Whig.

The undersigned, Ministry to Contrabands, have examined more than twenty different kinds of Sewing Machines, and after six weeks' experience with Wilcox & Gibbs' Patent, he has purchased one of them, [illegible] and is now employed in the [illegible] and [illegible] for the [illegible]

Office, July 1, 1863.

The undersigned, during eighteen months, has had in almost constant use, he has nearly a Wilcox & Gibbs Sewing Machine, for which has been made the purchase of his large family—from muslin to pilot cloth—including the stitching required by his several trades, and in no case [illegible]

The machine now in use in his family has required no repair, and is, in all respects, well app [illegible] and durable.

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS IN

SEWING MACHINES.

EMPIRE.

SHUTTLE MACHINE.

PATENTED FEB. 14, 1860.

Salesroom—510 Broadway, New York.

This MACHINE is constructed on an entirely new principle of mechanism, possessing many rare and valuable improvements having been examined by the most practical experts, and pronounced to be SIMPLICITY and PERFECTION combined.

The following are the principal objections urged against Sewing Machines:—

1.—Excessive fatigue to the operator.
2.—Liability to get out of order
3.—Expense, trouble, and loss of time in repairing.
4.—Inability to sew every description of material.
5.—Dangerous to sew with its operation.

THE "EMPIRE SEWING MACHINE" IS EXEMPT FROM ALL THESE OBJECTIONS.

It has a straight needle, perpendicular action, makes the LOCK or SHUTTLE STITCH, which will neither rip nor ravel, and is alike on both sides—sews fine or heavy with any description of material, from Leather to the finest Nainsook Muslin, with cotton, linen, or silk thread, from the coarsest to the finest number.

Having neither CAM nor COG WHEEL, and the least possible friction, it runs as smooth as glass, and is

EMPHATICALLY A NOISELESS MACHINE.

It requires fifty per cent. less power to drive it than any other Machine in market. A girl of 14 years of age can work it steadily without fatigue or injury to health.

Its unequaled [illegible] simplicity of Construction renders it almost impossible to get out of order, and is guaranteed by the Company to give entire satisfaction.

We respectfully invite all those who may desire to supply themselves with a superior article, to call and examine this

UNRIVALLED MACHINE.

But in a more especial manner do we solicit the patronage of

MERCHANT TAILORS, COACH MAKERS, HOOP-SKIRT MANUFACTURERS, SHIRT & BOSOM MAKERS, DRESS MAKERS, CORSET MAKERS, GAITER FITTERS, SHOE-BINDERS, VEST AND PANTALOON MAKERS.

IF RELIGIOUS AND CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS WILL BE LIBERALLY DEALT WITH.

Price of Machine Complete:

No. 1, or Family Machine, $[illegible]—No. 2, small Sized Manufacturing, $[illegible]—No. 3, Large sized Manufacturing, $75 00

CABINETS IN EVERY VARIETY.

We want Agents for all towns in the United States, where agencies are not already established, to whom a liberal discount will be given—but we make no consignments.

TAGGART & FARR'S

CELEBRATED IMPROVED

DOUBLE THREAD FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.

NO. 137 NORTH NINTH STREET, PHILADA.

These machines are now [illegible] recommended to families, as not only the simplest and easiest managed, but

THE CHEAPEST AND BEST IN THE MARKET.

Wherever they have been tried, they have given universal satisfaction.

FAMILIES, TAILORS, AND SEAMSTRESSES,

are invited to examine them,—as they are particularly adapted to their wants, being strong and durable. They will sew fine or coarse goods equally well, and are warranted to give entire satisfaction. They make the DOUBLE LOCK STITCH, gather beautifully, and the stitch will not rip or ravel even if the goods when washed. The thread is used from spools of any size, as purchased at the store. Full directions with each machine.

Farmers' wives are invited to examine and judge for themselves. Prices from $40 to $60.

THE HEART THAT LANGUISHES.

Oh! pity the heart that languishes,
And is drooping all the while,
Not for the flatterer's blandishes,
But the kindly word and smile;
The heart that is breaking, oppressed with grief—
The tree all too soon in the yellow leaf.

Ay, follow that heart with friendliness
And the greeting smile of worth,
Speaking in tones of kindliness
To the sorrowing ones of earth:
For hearts all around us are sad and lone,
And breaking with sorrows they dare not own.

Then, pity the heart that languishes,
And is drooping all the while,
Not for the flatterer's blandishes,
But the kindly word and smile;
The heart that is broken, oppressed with grief—
The tree that is casting the yellow leaf

MARTIN LUTHER'S DEATH.

FROM THE DANISH.

In Wittemberg, in Saxon-land,
May be seen a good man's grave,
Where he now in peace repeateth,
All under the old church nave;
Famous name, that each one knoweth
Who loveth his Bible well;
By what name called—with God,—unknown,
Unknown, till some angel tell,
Tell, when we with him assemble.

'Twas he who unlock'd the Bible,
Book so firmly seal'd before;
He saw God's glory in the Mirror,
Wise in its prophetic lore;
Lent it the tongue of the people,
Then brav'd the ban, steel and stake!
Aught against that Wind contending
Sank in earth, no more to wake,
Sank beneath that Word omnific!

Spite of Craft, Force, Ban, and Fortune,
Wide flew the Word o'er the land,
Which spake the language of the people,
All up to the Northern strand;
It sounded at the Danube fountains,
Echo'd loud from Dover-chain,
Peal'd at Blocks-berg and at Hecla,
Peal'd in church-song yet again!
O then but to live was joyous!

When home he went, brave and pious,
To the Father up on high,
Wide o'er the land mourn'd the Christians,
Sighing deep, with tearful eye.
Was he followed to entombment,
Both by lay and learned, too?
Yes, many a knight, brave, chivalrous,
Did with tears his shield bedew:
But still the Word made them joyous!

BREVITY IN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

Children soon become listless and weary, if any exercise in which they engage is tedious in length.

Superintendents and teachers in Sunday schools need always to remember this fact, and be guided by it. A teacher gives advice to the Banner of the Covenant on this point:

"Be brief!" Such was the pithy advice of a greatly revered father in Israel to his neophytes, when introducing them into his pulpit. I would fain whisper it in the ears of my fellow-teachers,—Make your lessons short. Make your questions brief. Above all, make your prayers brief. You have only an hour for reciting lessons, hearing catechism, reading and questioning, exhortation, singing and devotional exercises. If you pray fifteen minutes, and if somebody addresses the school fifteen minutes, what time is left for other duties?

I listened last Sabbath with great pain to a prayer at the opening of a school, which could only be described by a word coined by the Rhenish translators, longanimity. It was a good prayer, and an earnest one, and the officer remembered every interest of the church, from China to the Potomac; but right in front of me was a class of rowdy boys, without a teacher, trying to steal each other's caps, and cut the buttons off each other's jackets, and the class behind that was trading knives, and the infant class was carrying on a comparison of mittens and skating caps. O, how I longed to pull that brother's skirt and whisper in his ear, Stop. Would not five intelligible words—words carrying some meaning known to the children—be a more acceptable prayer from that Sabbath school, than the fifteen minutes' prayer, for things which they could not possibly understand, and had no thought of asking?

Teachers, never exceed three minutes in your prayers. Every minute more is only training the children to formalism and hypocrisy.

THE DEATH OF THE BELIEVER.

Psalm 116 Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints.

The death of the believer is a matter of vast interest from whatever point it may be viewed. One important aspect of the matter is, its consistency with the privileges of God's redeemed children. This we may designate its theological aspect. A proper view of the subject is necessary to preserve the symmetry of our faith. This is happily presented in the answer to the eighty-fifth question of our Larger Catechism. The very beautiful and satisfactory answer there given will bear to be reviewed and revised; and, like every other precious truth contained in the word of God, it will grow brighter by every turn. It is a great loss to the Presbyterian denominations that the Larger Catechism is allowed to mould and rust by neglect.

Our present inquiry is: How can a believer die at all, since Christ has paid the whole penalty, suffered the whole death of the covenant of works? How is it that a believer can even taste the bitter cup? It is a most consoling thought that believers shall be delivered from death at the last day—a thought which ought to satisfy all our personal anxieties, whether about ourselves or our friends. Still there are other considerations demanding our attention, and carefully presented to our faith in the word of God. Among others, take the following:

I. The death of the believer is not a necessity.

It is by no means requisite to fulfil either the Covenant of Works or the Covenant of Grace: it is merely an appointment. Heb. ix 27: "It is appointed to men once to die." Important exceptions to this rule prove it is a matter of convenience only, and not of necessity. Long before the deluge, "Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." God took him home (Gen. v. 24, Heb. xi. 5). Being a believer, this was the result of his faith. Death was no necessity to him.

Some 2,000 years after, when the world was advancing to maturity, "Elijah was taken up by a whirlwind into heaven. 2 Kings ii. 11. This was a favor conferred on him evidently for his faithfulness in witnessing for God during a period of great apostacy; this faithfulness was the fruit of his faith, and procured for him still farther honor, in a happy interview with Christ on earth, at the period of his transfiguration. That is a strange passage of Elijah's biography which we read in 2 Chron. xxi 12: "There came a writing from Elijah the prophet." This seems to have occurred, or, at least, to have been made known, several years after he had been received into heaven. Did the "chariot" carry him back and forth, just as the convenience of Christ's kingdom demanded such a visit?

A more important exception to the general law of death we have in the Epistles of Paul, who assures us that the whole generation of believers on the earth, at the Redeemer's coming, will be translated in like manner. 1 Cor. xv. 51: "Behold I show you a mystery. We shall not all sleep; but we shall all be changed." Yet the same apostle assures us that this will give that generation no advantages over their senior brethren. "The dead shall rise first: the living shall be caught up together with them." 1 Thes. iv. 16. This last exception will probably be a great multitude, making a very important exception to the Reign of Death.

We are now prepared to look at another kind of exception to the general rule appointed, namely, the death of some persons more than once. What cause of those who were raised from the dead? The Shunamite's son, the man cast into the prophet's grave, Lazarus, and all who have been recalled to life, by the Master himself, and by his apostles, seem to have returned by the same path. True, we have no records of their second dying, neither have we of their translation; yet have they, in some manner, gone from earth, and it is entirely reasonable to class them among the exceptions to the general rule of dying only once. Thus, while we have some who die not at all, we have others crossing the valley twice. These put together, satisfactorily prove that death is not, to the believer, a legal necessity, but an appointment of Christ for convenience. So entirely subordinated to convenience do we find the grave, that at Christ's death the graves opened, but their occupants did not leave them till He rose again; Matt. xxvii. 52–53; thus honoring him who was just then vanquishing death.

II. The believer's death answers many valuable purposes in the economy of grace. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

1. We may notice its entire correspondence with other arrangements of the Kingdom. "The kingdom of God cometh not with observation." Now, if the believer were exempt from death, it would be a matter of very remarkable observation. So soon as a man had passed the ordinary period, it would be known to all his acquaintances that he was one of the sealed ones. Those who are willing to imitate the failings of godly men, would then have some excuse for so doing, unless they should, at the same time, arrive at sinless perfection. But Christ has wisely appointed that there shall be no physical distinction between the righteous and the wicked; yea, in this respect, the man has no pre-eminence above the beast, all return to the earth. The only distinction intended in this life, between the righteous and the wicked, is of a spiritual kind.

2. The multitude of believers make it convenient that they should, in some way, be removed from the world; Christ, as a sovereign, holds the keys of death, and can conduct them through this passage as easily as any other, in order to bring them to himself. This makes their death precious to him and to them, that every obstacle is removed which prevented the free communication of his love.

3. As Christ was made in all points like his brethren, it is fit that they should be conformed to him in body and soul, in life and in death, and in the glory of the resurrection. This should make death precious in our sight, as well as the sight of the Lord.

4. It is proper that faith be tried and exercised in a great variety of forms. If the believer were exempt from death, many opportunities would be lost for the exercise and trial of his faith. There would be no place for courage sanctified to the Lord's service; no laying down of life for Christ or for the brethren; no danger and no fear. Faith must lose its power and its uses, in ten thousand forms, if the believer were not, like other men, exposed to death.

5. The constant proximity of death is made a means of completing our sanctification. Not a necessary means, to be sure, we are trusting only of the convenience of the economy of grace. The Lord and his Spirit could make us perfectly holy at once; but we see that he has chosen a different course—the progressive development of the new man. Various are the expedients he uses in carrying on this work: and for this purpose, if there were no other, the death of the saints is precious in the sight of the Lord.

6. The conflict between the seed of the serpent and the children of God enters into the economy of grace, and forms a very extensive feature of that economy. Let us suppose a believer removed from the world without death, and many questions which now agitate the world would lose all their interest. The divine authority of the Scriptures would stand on another footing entirely. What church, what routine of observances were most in accordance with the will of God, would be determined, not so much by the written word, as by the number of persons taken away without death. In short, much of the blessings of the last day would be anticipated if the Lord would in this tangible manner show who are his.

Again: suppose the believer living all the time in the world through the four, five or six thousand years of its existence past, and secured against death in the future, where could the ruthless hand of the persecutor bathe itself in blood? The victim might be stoned, sawn asunder, or plunged in a caldron of boiling oil, might be immured in the dungeon or nailed to the cross; but the full amount of fiendish enmity could never be reached, he must suffer his Master's fate. The death of the sainted martyr, so closely following the faithful and the true Witness, is peculiarly precious in the sight of the Lord. In this aspect death is a conservative. Satan can show what he is—a murderer from the first, and his seed can only prove their paternity.

III. The Redeemer has the undoubted right to determine how his people shall live in the world, and how they shall leave it.

All the sufferings and sorrows, all the discouragements, doubts, difficulties, and dangers we encounter stand on the same footing as our death. The mixture of good and evil in the present life is one of the guarantees of the kingdom—one to which theologians have not given sufficient attention. The fact is patent to every observer, thrusts itself on the most thoughtless, but what is the moral philosophy of such a tangled skein? How is it that a believer can go mourning all the day, and die a felon's death at night, while a cardinal in his purple can enjoy the ague? True, the day of judgment will reverse and rectify the whole. But still the scientific mind asks how, under the perfect regime of the Omniscient, even a temporary period of disorder can exist. The student of the Bible is delighted to find a theorem for all such questions in the immeasurable value of the atonement. Rejecting, as we do, the silly notion of a numerical satisfaction, and considering the death of Christ a matter of infinite worth, we can view him using all wicked men and devils at his sovereign pleasure; bestowing on the worst of them abundant enjoyment and prosperity in their unholy schemes; sending rain upon the just and unjust; allowing tares to flourish among the wheat, by an absolute sovereignty, without the slightest ground of complaint against himself or his Father; without giving countenance to sin, or the smallest hint of laxity in the government of the universe.

Our Redeemer magnified law and made it honorable, even to SUPEREROGATION, leaving to himself a broad margin wherein to exercise his sovereignty in our little earth.

In relation to his own people, he has so purchased them, and innumerable blessings for them, that, without any reflection on his rectitude, goodness or love, he can subject them to any amount of misery which may be needful, whether to burnish their own graces or to expose the hatefulness of their adversaries. He was still Job's Redeemer, although he gave Satan power over him for a time; he walked with the three children in the furnace; he sent his angel to shut the mouths of the lions in the den. Satan has his period for roaming the earth; the Lord Jesus is as righteous in superintending that period as in sealing the pit when it is closed over him. See him at the top of Jacob's ladder presiding over a solemn scene. The witnesses strip and lay their clothes at the feet of a young man; the martyr kneels and looks above; one company stones him to death; another bears his soul to the bosom of Abraham, and still another carries his body to the grave. The blood of the Lamb has washed the soul; the Intercessor presents him in the presence chamber; the Sovereign spares the wretches for the time, and seals the seven thunders till the day of wrath. Precious in the sight of the Lord is such a death. Yes, a believer can die; only a believer knows how to die. Christ has purchased for the believer a right to die. 1 Cor. iii. 22: "——the world, or life, or death, all are yours."

IV. The believer is abundantly compensated for all the inconveniences of a present life; all the fears and all the sufferings of death.

As many as I love I rebuke and chasten. Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God; and he shall go no more out. To him that overcometh will I give to sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne.

V. Still a believer does not die THE DEATH. His exit from the world is a totally different thing. The wages of sin is death; Christ died that, leaving only the shadow of it to his people. In noting the distinction between the believer's death and that of the unbeliever, we observe, 1. The believer's exit from the world has nothing penal in it. It is the loving requisition of the Saviour. "He shall call and I will answer." 2. It is free from the curse. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." 3. There is no sting in it. With his last breath he bids adieu to sin and suffering at once. "Let me die the death of the righteous." 4. It has the most happy results. Forsaken relatives drop the tear of sorrow; but he is gone to enter the joy of the Lord. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my hereafter be like his." 5. Death is henceforth dead to him forever. Sleep is, in Scripture, the favorite name for such a change. The body sleeps to wake in more than mortal vigor; the soul not even sleeping, but receding from our view to the rest above. Difficult as it may be to realize it here, it is no more than simple truth that Christ has abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel.

Grove Hill, Iowa, Feb. 1862.

WHO WILL HELP THE WOUNDED!

Christians and patriots! Loyal men and loyal women! thousands of our wounded countrymen need your aid. There are more agencies than one already in the field to meet this need, but all are wanted, and more besides, to meet it completely.

The Christian Commission is ready and anxious to do its part of the work. The large number wounded in the recent gallant affairs in the West, make a special demand at the present juncture. Thousands of husbands, sons, and brothers lie in the hospital wards, and while their bodies receive the care they need for their recovery, mind and soul are wide open to the truth, and crave it with earnestness. Shall it be withholden?

Chaplains from every quarter are pressing their appeals, not only for directly religious reading, but for all varieties of sound and profitable matter. What the Sanitary Commission is so largely and so efficiently doing for the body, the Christian Commission seeks to do for mind and soul. The opportunity is one too broad, too happy, and too imperative to be neglected.

Through its several District Committees at the several points of the East and West, and its local army committees in almost every town, the "Commission" is seeking both to reach the public with the appeal of the army, and to reach the army with that which the appeal brings in from the public. Fortunately in the West, there are numbers of loyal and noble young men, who stand ready to give time and labor to this work; but their hands are empty. Thus under a powerful appeal to us at the East-ward, whose means are more abundant, to fill them.

God be thanked for the spirit of liberal sympathy already displayed. But the work is not done, and we feel assured that the sources of loyal beneficence will only expand the wider to meet the increased demand, and will not stint till it is all and well supplied.

The able and active Chairman of the Army Committee, at St. Louis, says in a recent letter:—

"We prefer to labor in the hospitals, as offering more permanent and profitable fields of labor. Our work will be,

"1. Placing permanent libraries under the superintendence of stewards, nurses, or convalescents, to be changed or enlarged, as may seem best.

"2. To distribute tracts, religious books and papers, magazines, and all other profitable reading. To execute this, we propose organizing a permanent Board of Visitors, to visit every soldier, attend to his spiritual wants, by placing in his hand such reading as may be suited, accompanying it with personal conversation; thus to afford all the possible means to throw into the mind of the sick, wounded and dying, that which shall render them happy here and beyond.

"3. To hold religious meetings in all such apartments as the Sanitary Commission may grant for that purpose. Visitors, aided by [illegible] visitors, will thus carry [illegible]

[illegible] their families [illegible] ate heartily [illegible]

go to the expense of their abilities."

This extract will give some idea both of the spirit, and of the method of the work, and will serve to show how efficient and penetrating it is capable of becoming.

Immediately upon the fall of Fort Donelson, the Army Committee of Chicago deputed a number of young men to visit and assist the wounded of both the loyal and rebel armies. They have been just heard from at Paducah. Received with satisfaction and delight by the sick and wounded of our own forces, their loving care excited profound surprise among the wounded and captured of the enemy.

They had expected nothing of the kind from "ruthless Yankee invaders," the "Lincoln hirelings," the "barbarous mercenaries." Nothing seemed so to shake their loyalty to the rebellion as this most palpable, moving evidence that they had been made the sport of a cruel and dastardly deception.

There is a moral, however, in such conviction greater than the national might of many armies, and to the subtle spread of which throughout the society of our misguided countrymen at the South no power of the sword can oppose any check. Every man approached by this tender and loving service of Northern sympathy, is a man twice gained to the cause of our country, and ten times lost to that of the rebellion.

Shall not this service be increased tenfold? A little spent in this kind of warfare will go farther than anything else in following up our national victories with that moral force of conviction and reconciliation, which must succeed the desolating track of armies before healing unity and everlasting amity can return, to bind a severed nation once more into one cordial whole.

The loud-mouthed peacemakers of battle must be followed by the tender-toned peacemaking of forgiveness, and of love. Then our victories will be not only gallant and glorious; but as fast as they shall be pressed forward, effectual and complete.

The men then stand ready to go forth; their hearts and their lips are full of love and sympathy, but their hands must not be empty. They call loudly for an abundant supply not only of directly religious reading; but of secular literature of a solid and profitable sort.

For these objects are needed:

1. The large-hearted contributions of loyal publishers, whether of book or periodical literature.

2. The collections of all; men, women, or children, who have a heart, to go out and gather up really valuable reading matter from house to house.

3. And last, but far from least, money is needed to make large purchases of the various valuable and appropriate publications, which have been issued especially for distribution to the army.

All, of every class, whose hearts are opened to give, are earnestly solicited to do it without delay, for the need is great, and the call, particularly from the West, urgent.

Money should be sent to Hon. B. F. Manierre, Treasurer Christian Commission, Importers and Traders' Insurance Co., 24 Wall Street, New York.

Send reading matter, always prepaid, to Rev. A. M. Morrison, Office of Christian Commission, No. 4 Bowling Green, New York, whence it will be at once forwarded, either to particular addresses, or used for general distribution, as directed by the donors.

Don't send matter which you have consigned to some dusty corner of your garret, as unfit, or without interest for yourselves. It is useless expense. Don't send masses of old newspapers or odd religious periodicals.

Files of the leading religious papers, not more than one year old, in good condition, may be sparingly sent. Magazines, literary or religious periodicals of the same age, or if Quarterlies, or illustrated periodicals, of any age, and properly arranged, are invaluable, and will be thankfully received and immediately distributed.

A. M. MORRISON, Secretary.

Bible Homes.—The wonderful success that has attended the labors of the Bible women in London, in getting so many Bibles and Testaments disposed of among the poorest and most wretched of the metropolitan lower classes, has stimulated the friends of evangelical truth to employ a similar agency in several of our large cities and towns, both in England and Scotland. In Glasgow, Bible women have been at work for some time with the most gratifying results. I heard lately an account of the labors of one of these women in an Ayrshire country town. On visiting the houses of the working classes, she ascertained that a far larger proportion than had at all been supposed, were destitute of the word of God. And so successful was she in her efforts to induce the parties to purchase copies of the Scriptures, that in the course of six weeks she sold two hundred and thirty Bibles and Testaments. I see, also, that attempts have been made to benefit religiously those who attend our markets, hirings, and fairs, by circulating among them religious tracts. One instance of the good that a few zealous Christian men may be able to accomplish, I may quote from a recent London religious paper. At a late execution at Newgate of a man who murdered his wife, a Christian man, accompanied by a Bible woman and other friends, not only addressed the crowd assembled on the occasion, but was listened to with great attention, while he himself and others in different parts of the crowd, no fewer than from 20,000 to 25,000 tracts were distributed, and earnest conversations on religion were engaged in with a goodly number of those present.

The Great Exhibition building is rapidly approaching completion. It is all covered in, and the internal painting and decoration are in a very forward state. The railway companies have agreed greatly to reduce the rates chargeable on goods sent up for exhibition; and we see it stated that packages have begun to arrive. During the erection of the enormous building, every attention has been given to the religious instruction of the workmen. At the dinner hour, when the thousands of tradesmen issue from the building, it is customary for two preachers to appear every day. One of them, after prayer, addresses the men on the great concerns of religion, and afterwards tracts are delivered. The elder of these two men was a enemy a few years ago, and is admirably qualified for his work. At a recent meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, held in London, Sir Culling Eardley announced that arrangements were made for providing, as soon as the exhibition is opened, that the gospel shall be daily preached in most of the continental languages, for the benefit of the [illegible] who are expected to visit London next summer. We anticipate, from all these agencies, that this year will not only be one of great and varied Christian effort, but remarkable for the number of immortal souls brought during it to the knowledge of salvation through the Lord Jesus.

Awful Accident.—One of the most alarming [illegible] that has occurred for many years past, took place [illegible] instant, at Newcastle on Tyne, [illegible] Newcastle on Tyne, [illegible] engine connected with this colliery is the largest employed in such work in the north of England. The beam of the engine, which weighs forty tons, suddenly broke in two, on the morning in question: the one-half fell into the pit, down which it descended with fearful momentum, carrying timber, brattices, and everything else along with it at the moment eight men were drawn up out of the pit. Five were thrown out of the cage and killed. The timber and other debris choked the shaft half way down, and cut off two hundred and fourteen men and boys who were at work in the pit from all communication with the bank. From the time the accident occurred, the ablest mining engineers and pitmen in the tract were incessant in their efforts to remove the obstructions, and reach the men and boys below. There is, it appears, but one shaft to the mine, but there is a communication between the lower or "main seam," by means of a staple, or ladder, and the "yard seam, twenty-fathoms higher up, and out of the reach of water. For about two days after the accident, the buried men were distinctly heard working at the shaft from that seam, evidently attempting to clear away the obstruction on it from below.

It was not until the morning of last Saturday that the workmen were enabled to clear the shaft so as to get down to the yard seam with safety, their operations having been suspended for nearly two days, by the ascent of most deadly gas vapors from the pits. On getting down to the yard seam, a terrible scene presented itself: the bodies of the dead men were seen lying in heaps. The first man found was sitting on a coal seat, his head resting on his arm in a posture of calm repose, and immediately beyond him was a row of corpses seated on the ground with their backs against the wall of coal. Further on were three or four rows of dead men, lying pell mell with legs interlaced, some with their heads lying on each other's breasts, and some locked in each other's arms. Families were found lying in groups. Fathers and sons, and other near relatives had clung together, as if they wished to be near each other when the sleep of death came over them. It appears that, for some time, they had lived on such food as they had in the pit, for the corn bins were empty, and corn was found in the pockets of several of the dead men; but, from the general appearance of the corpses, there can be no doubt that they died from the effect of the gas, and died quietly and calmly. No one survives to tell the tale of their feelings when they first became conscious of their fearful imprisonment—their plans and suggestions for relief—their hopes on hearing the effort made from above to release them—and their state when they felt, from the generating of the gas around them, that deliverance was too late, for ere it could reach them they would all be in eternity. But though no living witness survives to tell these things, a scrap of paper has been found in a candle box, which in part informs us how they occupied themselves during their terrible imprisonment. It was written by one of the foremen, and states that, twice before this scrap was written, they had had a prayer meeting, and several individuals are mentioned, who addressed to their companions words of exhortation and consolation.

The heart of all England has been moved by this appalling catastrophe. The Queen telegraphs from Osborn to say, that "her whole heart bleeds, and she is most anxious to know as to the safety of the men," and when the dreadful fact was at last ascertained, Her Majesty sent, not only a contribution of £200, but a most affecting letter to the bereaved widows and mothers, to comfort and sustain them under their bitter and heavy calamity. Meetings are being held all over the country to sympathize with the bereaved, and raise funds for their support, and the appeals made to the country are meeting everywhere with a most ready and generous response.

J. B.

THE LATE PRESIDENT OF HARVARD COLLEGE.

CORNELIUS CONWAY FELTON was born in what is now Newbury, Mass., Nov. 6, 1807, so that he has passed away at the comparatively early age of 55. He entered Harvard in 1823, at the early age of 16, where he distinguished himself for literary taste and belle-lettres culture; being elected when a senior an editor of the College periodical. On graduation in 1827, he taught for some two years in Cincinnati, N. Y., in 1829 was appointed Latin tutor in his Alma Mater; Greek tutor a year later, and College Professor of Greek in 1832. In 1834 he was elected to the Eliot chair, which place he held till his acceptance of the Presidency, some two years ago.

President Felton was unwearied as a scholar, and his works praise him at the gate. In 1836 he published an edition of Homer with Flaxman's illustrations and English notes; which has since held sway in the market. In 1840 he translated Mauricio's German Gymnastics, to which he added a volume and the same year published his "Greek Reader," which has since been frequently reprinted. In 1841 he published an edition of the "Clouds" of Aristophanes, with notes—afterwards reprinted in England. In 1842, in conjunction with Profs. Sears and B. H. Edwards, he issued a work entitled "Classical Studies,"—mostly essays on subjects connected with the study of the classics—a work, by the way, which we think it would be well to reprint. In 1845, "Poets and Poetry of Europe," was shared by him with Prof. Longfellow. In 1847 he published Selections from Lessing and Richter, with introduction and English notes—both reaching second editions. In 1849 he translated Prof. Guyot's "Earth and Man," and published the Berlin Atlas plates, with English notes. In 1852 he issued a selection from the works of Prof. Popkin, his predecessor in the Professorial chair, with an introductory biography; and in the same year a volume of selections from the Greek Historians. In 1853-4 he visited Europe, spending about three months in Greece. On his return he revised for the press Smith's "History of Greece," with a preface, [illegible] and the same year an edition of Lord Carlisle's "Diary in Turkish and Greek waters." In 1856 he published a volume [illegible] from Mount Greece [illegible]

Besides these more elaborate performances, President Felton was the author of many and valuable articles in the Christian Examiner, the North American, the Boston Courier, and other periodicals, besides contributing many valuable articles to Appleton's new Cyclopedia.

President Felton also has been one of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institute at Washington.

In 1858 he visited Europe the second time [illegible] his election to the Presidency two years [illegible] has devoted himself with great success [illegible] up the discipline of the College in a manner [illegible] second to us very much to be commended.

An affection of the heart [illegible] President F was on a visit to [illegible] M. Felton, Esq., formerly Superintendent of the Fitchburg Railroad.

A GOOD JOKE.

The following story, [illegible] Mr. [illegible] "Lyrical Ballads" first came out, it was among us early, and they made a good deal of noise. A few days after they were published I dined at Mrs. Barbauld's, and sat beside 'many-toned' Pinkerton, as he was called, from the number and variety of his writings. We talked a good deal together, and I found him very amusing, and full of general information. When we retired to the drawing room he led me to a recess, having taken up a copy of the 'Lyrical Ballads,' which lay on the table. 'Pray, sir,' said he, 'have you read this thing?' 'I have looked into it.' 'Do you know the author?' asked he. 'Do you know the author?' echoed I, resolved not to be caught. 'No,' said Pinkerton; 'but I never read such utter trash as his book, particularly an extravagant farrago of absurdity called "The Ancient Mariner." 'Don't you think it insufferable?' Coleridge: 'Intolerable!' Pinkerton: 'Detestable!' Coleridge: 'Abominable!' Pinkerton: 'Odious!' Coleridge: 'Loathsome!' Pinkerton: 'Sir, you delight me. It is really delightful to meet a man of sound taste in these days of our declining literature. If I have a passion on earth, it is an abhorrence of these "Lyrical Ballads," of which every one is talking, but most especially of this "Ancient Mariner." Coleridge: 'Hush! not a word more! Here comes our hostess! I know she is acquainted with the author, and she might be hurt.' Pinkerton (pulling Coleridge by the button, taking a huge pinch of snuff, and speaking in a whisper:) 'I'll tell you what, sir; we mustn't let this matter drop. Let's fix a day for dining together at the Turk's Head. We'll have a private room, a beefsteak, a bottle of old port, pens, ink, and a quire of foolscap. We'll lay our heads together and review this thing—and if we don't give it such a slashing, such a tearing, such a ——' 'If we don't!' said Coleridge. 'Is it a bargain?' 'Most certainly.' 'Done!' 'Done!'"

Grattan's Reminiscences.

MATERIALS IN THEIR INVISIBLE STATE

If a piece of silver be put into nitric acid, a clear and colorless liquid, it is rapidly dissolved, and vanishes from the sight. The solution of silver may be mixed with water, and, to appearance, no effect whatever is produced. Thus, in a pail of water we may dissolve and transfer more than fifty dollars' worth of silver, lead, and iron; but every other metal can be treated in the same way, with similar results. When charcoal is burned, when candles are burned, when paper is burned, these substances all disappear, and become invisible. In fact, every material which is visible can, by certain treatment, be rendered invisible. Matter which, in one condition, is perfectly opaque, and will not admit the least ray of light to pass through it, will, in another form, become quite transparent. The cause of this wonderful effect of the condition of matter is utterly inexplicable. Philosophers do not even broach theories upon the subject, much less do they endeavour to explain it. The substances dissolved in water, or burned in the air, are not, however, destroyed or lost.

By certain well known means they can be recovered, and again be made visible; some exactly in the same state as they were before their invisibility; others, though not in the same state, can be shown in their elementary condition; and thus it can be proved that, having once existed, it never ceases to exist, although it can change its condition like the caterpillar, which becomes a chrysalis, and then a gorgeous butterfly. If a pailful of the solution of silver be cast into the stream, it is apparently lost by its dispersion in the water; but it nevertheless continues to exist. So, when a bushel of charcoal is burned in a stove, it disappears, in consequence of the gas produced being mixed with the vast atmosphere; but yet the charcoal is still in the air. On the brightest and sunniest day, when every object can be distinctly seen above the horizon, hundreds of tons of charcoal, in an invisible condition, pervade the air. Glass is a beautiful illustration of the transparency of a compound which, in truth, is nothing but a mixture of the rust of three metals.

The power of matter to change its conditions from solid capacity to limpid transparency causes some rather puzzling phenomena. Substances increase in weight without any apparent cause; for instance, a plant goes on increasing in weight a hundred fold for every atom that is missing from the earth in which it is growing. Now, the simple explanation of this is, that leaves of plants have the power of withdrawing the invisible charcoal from the atmosphere, and restoring it to its visible state in some shape or other. The lungs of animals and a sandstone furnace change matter from its visible to its invisible state. The gills of fishes and the leaves of plants reverse this operation, rendering invisible or gaseous matter visible. Thus the balance in nature is maintained although the continual change has been going on long prior to the creation of the "extinct animals."—Times.

WHAT TO EAT, AND WHEN

When a piece of land is exhausted of the element which is the principal ingredient of a certain crop, that ingredient must be supplied, or the crop will fail in quantity and quality; hence, the thrifty farmer ascertains the wants of the soil, and supplies it with the needed manure every year. The human body is exhausted of its elements day by day, and day by day must these elements be supplied by what we eat and drink; but the required proportion of these elements changes with the seasons, with the temperature of the weather, and he who eats the same in quantity and quality in July as at Christmas, will die in a month, because the adult eats for two reasons—to warm and to nourish. All food contains two chief principles—Carbon, to keep from freezing; Nitrogen, to keep from famishing. The proportion of these elements varies with the food. Those who work a great deal, require a great deal of nourishment, of nitrogen, for it is the flesh-forming principle. Those who are exposed a great deal to the cold, should eat the carbonaceous, the heat-supplying food. Butter and fat are three-fourths carbon; vegetables have but little [illegible] Hence, Greenlanders, in their icy homes, luxuriate in blubber and whale oil, while the people of the sunny South revel in oranges and bananas, on the plantain and the peach, on dates and figs, on lemons, tamarinds, pine-apples, &c. We who live in latitudes between, are permitted the diet of the Polar Seas and the tropics, in their season. A wise man will take but little carbonaceous food on a suddenly hot day; but if suddenly cold, it is best for him to eat more of fuel-making food. An infinite number of fevers and colds would be avoided if timely attention were paid to these things. By the aid of these statements, the following tables may be used to great advantage, showing the amount of carbon, or heat-forming principle, in several articles [illegible] gen, or flesh forming principle, in fruits, berries, and the more common vegetables. Meats have about fifteen per cent. The meats average twenty-five per cent of nutriment, that is, including both carbon and nitrogen. Of all meats, mutton is the most nutritious, thirty per cent.; fish least, twenty per cent. Of all vegetables, white beans are the most nutritious, ninety-five per cent.; wheat flour, ninety per cent.; turnips, the least, five per cent. Of fruits, plums are the most nutritious, thirty per cent. [illegible] The more waste, the more open the bowels are:

LONDON BEGGARS.

The following is derived from MAYHEW's book:

Army and navy beggars abound, as we all know, in every part of the country, and more especially in parts remote from garrison towns and from seaports. Experienced persons can easily detect the imposture, and real soldiers and sailors soon catch them in details, for which they are not prepared. Mr. Halliday relates that he was once walking with a gentleman who had spent the earlier part of his life at sea, when a "turnpike sailor" shuffled on before them. They had just been conversing on nautical affairs, and Mr. Halliday said to his companion, "Now, there is a brother sailor in distress, of course you will give him something." "He a sailor!" said the friend with great disgust. "Did you see him spit?" Mr. Halliday answered he had. "He spits to the windward," was the reply. Mr. Halliday asked what of that? "A regular landsman's trick," said the true salt. "A realsailor never spits wind'ard. Why he couldn't." No great are the delicacies of the art, and so hard is it to counterfeit nature. Generally a sham sailor or soldier who finds he has to do with a specimen of the real article gives in at once, and makes the best of his way to the dwellings of unprofessional people. But Mr. Halliday tells a story of one who stood a contest with his detector, and had the best of it. The "turnpike sailor" was giving a vivid and minute account of an engagement during the Crimean war, and was telling an admiring circle of hearers how he and his mates boarded the enemy and did wonders. Mr Halliday let him finish the yarn, and then determined to show him up. "I saw," he said, "the account of the action in the newspapers, but they said nothing of boarding. As I read it, the enemy were in too shallow water to make it possible. The vessels were more than half a mile apart." The rogue saw his advantage, and with the utmost coolness replied, "The newspapers—the newspapers. You don't believe what they says, surely. Look how they served out old Charley Napier. Why, sir, I was there and I ought to know."

Mr. Halliday sorts into different classes the numerous beggars of a low type who hang about the streets, and leaves us with an impression that every beggar in the street must be an imposter. With the ordinary types of disaster "beggars," such as shipwrecked mariners, blown up miners—"those having real or pretended sores, vulgarly known as the scaldman dodge," we are all familiar with. But there are oddities and niceties even in this humble department of the begging art. There are, for instance, the lucifer droppers. The business of these persons is to take a box or two of lucifers and offer them for sale at a crowded and dirty corner. They choose a victim and continue to get in his way. Down go the lucifers in the mud, and the professional sets up a piteous howl. The gentleman is ashamed of having done so much mischief, and to quiet the complainant, who is generally of the softer sex, he gives her many times the worth of her dropped lucifers. "Famished beggars" seem highly successful in their own line, but their success demands the natural advantages of a corpse-like face, an emaciated frame, and a power of enduring the winter's cold in rags. Among those endowed with these requisites, the more accomplished performers have invented many ingenious subtleties. One device is the "choking dodge." The famished beggar seizes on a crust and eagerly devours it: but he has been too long without food—he tries in vain to swallow it, it sticks in his throat

The Christian Recorder.

Philadelphia, March 22, 1862.

EPISCOPAL VISITS.

I will be on the Westchester Circuit on the 29th of March. The Elder may make arrangements up to the 5th of April. I will then leave for Oxford on the Penningtonville Circuit, and remain to the 12th, on which day I will leave for Lancaster Circuit, where I will remain a week. The Elders or Preachers will make their arrangements and inform me of them. W. NAZRRY

OUR PROGRAMME.

If no preventing providence should interpose, we shall leave for the Ohio Conference, which meets on the 15th of April, and we will preach in Harrisburg, Pa., on Thursday, the 10th of April, at half past 7 o'clock. Rev. B. F. Gibb will please make the necessary arrangements. On Sabbath, the 13th instant, we will be at Pittsburg, with Rev. Brother Watts and the other brethren.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

The Bethel Choir or Musical Association will give us some of their choice musical selections on the 27th instant, at the Philadelphia Institute, in Lombard Street.

Those of our friends who would like to avail themselves of the opportunity to be present at a rich treat, should not fail to go. The price of admission is only ten cents. Just drop in at our office and get a ticket.

OLD FOLKS' CONCERT.

Father Burris and his Troupe will repeat, in compliance with the special request of many delighted friends, their Concert at Franklin Hall, on Monday evening, the 24th instant. It will not be necessary for us to eulogize upon the merits and moral excellence of the concerts given by Father Burris, at least to those who were present on a former occasion. To those who were not so fortunate as to hear the first rendition of his brilliant and beautiful gems of sweetest music, we say, emphatically, Don't fail a second time!

APPOINTMENTS

IN BETHEL CHURCH, SABBATH, 23D INST.

The Port Royal Contrabands.

A collection will be taken up in Bethel Church on Sabbath, the 23d instant, in aid of the Contrabands.

Preaching at 10 o'clock, A. M., by the pastor Preaching at 8 o'clock, P. M., by the Rev. A. L. Sunford, of Little Wesley Church. Preaching at half-past 7 o'clock by the Rev. James Gloucester, of New York.

Let the members of the church and congregation come prepared to contribute to this laudable and humane object, and receive the blessings of the destitute boodman.

JOSHUA WOODLIN, Elder in Charge.

HELP WANTED.

Our church at New Brunswick, N. J., is in trouble. Part of the roof and the tin that covered it blew off in the storm of the 24th ultimo. It would cost about two hundred dollars to replace it, and we have no money nor credit.

March 15, 1862. P. GARDINER.

ANNUAL CONFERENCES.

Bishop Quinn has some time since announced his Ohio Conference to meet on the 15th of April, and we were glad when we saw it announced.

Bishop Payne had appointed his Conference (Baltimore) to meet on the 24th of April, which would have given the Bishop an opportunity of meeting each other's Conferences, but now we see that Bishop Payne has changed the Baltimore Conference to meet at the same time as that of the Ohio Conference. We are really sorry for this, for we desired to meet both Conferences. We wish that different arrangements could be made. There are many things that we might say, and truthfully say too, in relation to the present state and condition of the church, but will forbear for the present. We are a close observer of the times.

NOTICE.

Mr. A. H. Bandois, manufacturer of rosewood and gilt moulding looking-glasses, &c., at Third and Callowhill Streets, Philadelphia. We recommend our friends to give him a fair patronage.

AID FOR THE CONTRABANDS

We have not said anything about this subject for two reasons:—1 We entertained doubts as to whether we would not uphold and encourage Slavery by contributing to their support, in the event that the Government remanded them (the contrabands) to those who might claim them as their property; also enforce the Fugitive Slave Law; thereby placing the Government in the same predicament as it was before the Rebellion 2 That had we opposed the enterprise—said it was a good one, and worthy of all aid—we would have been, through our influence, the means of preventing many who have aided, and may still aid more Therefore we have given it a careful and prayerful consideration, and our conclusions are, that the cause is a good one, and deserves special attention. We would say, in behalf of the people of color, that when it is made clear to them that the premise laid down is a good one, there is no class of people under the heavens more liberal to give than they are. Now we say, and do recommend, to all of our people, as well as all others, to give to this cause, for we believe it to be a Christian act and a Christian duty:—1. Because those claiming to be their masters have fled for their lives, leaving the contrabands behind They also left behind them corn, wheat, poultry, cows, hogs, &c. enough, which might have done them until they could have shifted around and provided for more. But our soldiers having taken possession of the deserted land and houses where those contrabands were left, ate what they wanted, plundered and destroyed the rest, leaving these poor souls without any support while they (the soldiers) are supported by the Government. 2. These contrabands are surrounded with certain elements; a portion of which would debauch them, and then drive them to the clutches of those who had already deserted them in order to secure their own lives But let us provide clothing and money to help to take care of them; let us send them kind teachers, both colored and white; let there be also persons to work with them, and let them till the ground, raise cotton, grain, and potatoes, as they understand the ground and climate. We recommend our people and churches to take hold of this matter, and appoint good and efficient committees who may be responsible for any amount that may be put into their hands.

Again, we would recommend those of our ladies, here in the city, who can cut and make dresses, pants, &c., to give as much time as they can spare, and then let work be furnished them, and they can employ persons to come to their houses and work on the cheapest scale. We believe our women will do that, however. We believe we can speak for Mrs. Wilkins, Mrs. Palmer, and Mrs. Weaver, at No. 610 Pine St. These are all of our acquaintance.

THE WEST.

Our Western brethren may imagine our feelings, as the cloud which seemed to have intervened between them and us has begun to disperse, and the rays of light begun to glimmer into, and illuminate, our office. We know that the West can move mountains, for we are well acquainted with her machinery and her great levers. Yes; we remember well when Rev. A. R. Green was General Book Steward and Editor, how we used to put our hands together, and send substantial aid to Rev. Mr. Green. We remember that such was the appreciation of the cause of our Book Concern and paper, Brother Green only had to notify such men as Rev. W. R. Revels; and we remember of pulling three dollars out of our pocket in Rev. W. R. Revels' house, in the city of Jeffersonville, Ind., and giving it to him as a free will offering, in making up ten dollars for the benefit of the then Christian Herald. A similar case occurred with Rev. Robin Jones' and the late Rev. Byrd's paper, Kentucky. In 1852, when Rev. M. M. Clark was Editor of the Christian Recorder, the West still stood by him and the Book Concern. The young men had come in, and were making their mark, such as Revs. William Jackson, W. J. Davis, W. A. Dove, Rev. John Turner, Rev. Richard Bridges, Rev. F. Myers, and Elisha Weaver, your humble servant, and many others, like Rev. John M. Brown, the Editor of the Repository. All of the fore-mentioned names can bear testimony how often we had to go down into our own pockets to send our dollars to assist and encourage Brother Clark. Yes; hundreds and hundreds of dollars have we sent up from the West to sustain the man whom the General Conference saw fit to appoint as her agent to superintend and manage the affairs to the best advantage. Yes; Brother Clark can say that he never called upon the West but what she responded to his call, and that largely too. Our Rev. and dear Brother Campbell, our predecessor, can say that the West was a great friend to him and the cause while he was General Book Steward and Editor. But, in relation to us, we had almost concluded that the West had hung her harp upon the willow, but Revs. John Turner, of St. Louis, Mo., Rev. Wm. A. Dove, of Chicago, Ills, and the Rev. William Jackson, of Vincennes, Ind., sent letters, and we refer all our readers to them, with the hope that they may be read. They begin to say, that though the times have been very bad in relation to money affairs, and the winter cold and dreary, yet they have not forgotten us. Amen, amen! Do so again, my brethren, and may the good Lord bless you in the attempt

TWO CENT MONEY.

We call the special attention of the brethren to page 219, New Discipline, in relation to the two-cent money, and especially to the 16th paragraph under the same page. We do hope that all of our brethren having charge of circuits and stations will obey the General Conference of our beloved Zion, and commence in time to collect their two-cent money; and if the brethren have so far obeyed the law by making a collection every month, or every two months, we are quite sure that there will be a change in matters pertaining to our financial department. Suppose that Bethel Church, of Philadelphia, with over twelve hundred members, (we will say twelve hundred, though there is said to be some fifteen hundred,) should comply with the request; twenty-five times twelve would be three hundred dollars,—and this, it will be remembered, is only twenty-five cents a head. At the very lowest estimate, this is what Bethel Church will owe us at our Annual Conference

The Union Church, placing the membership at two hundred, at twenty-five cents each, will be fifty dollars. Baltimore (Md.) Bethel Church has about twelve hundred members; suppose that she is caused to do her duty—that the minister should feel it his duty to see that each member pays his or her twenty-five cents per year; there would be three hundred dollars due the Book Steward, to be appropriated as per Discipline. Ebenezer Church has at least two hundred members, and twenty five times two hundred is fifty dollars

Now here would be seven hundred dollars,—leaving out Washington, New York, Brooklyn, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville Indianapolis Chicago, and St. Louis, and besides hundreds of churches on circuits, and other stations where brethren are. If brethren will only do what the regulations of the Church have demanded of them, all would be well. We believe that there is not a member in our Church but what would consider it a great insult to say that they were too poor to pay the small sum of twenty five cents a year for the benefit of the Book Concern and of our brethren who have labored hard to carry the glad tidings of the gospel to the dying world.

We are glad to see that Rev. Bishop Nazrey has notified all of his Conferences and members to come prepared to give a good account of themselves. So you may look well to the eastern brethren, and govern yourselves accordingly; for if he enforces the law, which he is bound to, somebody's head may have to come off. We hope that the other Bishops will do the same.

RELIGIOUS UNION.

We reprint our article, which appeared some time ago, upon the subject of "Religious Union," and shall be glad to see from our brethren a reply to it, and also to Rev. S. T. Jones' article, which appeared in our previous number; for there are brethren who can talk masterly upon subjects of Religion:

RELIGIOUS UNION

This is the title of an article which appeared in the 42d number of the CHRISTIAN RECORDER, with the signature of Rev. Singleton T. Jones In relation to the article, we remark first, that it has not been lost sight of; and there are two reasons why we have not said something about it before now.

1. We have been so much engaged, in a pecuniary interest for the welfare of this paper and Book Concern that we did not find time to think on much else.

The 2d reason is, that we were waiting to hear some of the older brethren speak out, for we held that there is no impropriety in discussing a matter of so much magnitude as these precious words, viz., Religious Union. Now, the writer, in his article, refers to us, as we preached the first discourse on the day in which he refers to, in Bethel Church, in obedience to the national proclamation issued by the President. He says, that "presuming from our discourse on the same day, that we were fully committed to the Union policy." We would just say, that according to our understanding of the word union, we could not be of any other opinion; for, if religion mean anything, it means love, and where there is love there must be union.

In relation to what the writer says in his article, that there should be but the one colored Methodist Church, we most heartily and sincerely endorse his views, that there ought not now, nor ever ought to have been, but the one colored Methodist Church in this country. I suppose that we would be safe in saying that we speak the sentiments of our church, or at least the most of them; for we believe that there is no Methodist, or rather true Methodist, but what is in favor of Religious Union. Now, we propose to ask a few questions, to be answered by some one or more.

1. What is the cause of our not being a great and glorious body now?

If that query is answered, the second question is, What is the most healthy and effective means to be raised to remove the cause? The means being solved, the third is, Who will set about the work to remove the cause? and in the event the cause shall be removed, the fourth question is, When, where, and how shall we meet to amalgamate?

We hope that our brethren will speak out freely and frankly upon the subject, and let us know the drift of the minds of the church, and her ministry. Therefore, as Rev. Dr. Jones has led the way for some thinking and discussing to be done, and we have asked some several questions to be answered by or from either side of the house, we will, therefore wait for further information.

OUR BALTIMORE CORRESPONDENCE.

Our city has once more assumed its usual quietness. Business has commenced to revive. The business part of the city presents the appearance of past days, when the Monumental City was looked upon as one of the great commercial places of this nation. Hopes are entertained that the day is not far distant when Baltimore will once more occupy her former position. There is a great commotion among the religious community, and particularly with some of the members of the M. E. Church. It has gone so far that several of the leading members have withdrawn from the Conference, and are about to organize an independent M. E. Church.

We have been favored with a visit from Rev. Alexander Crummell, B. A., of Liberia, Africa. He preached an able sermon in Bethel Church on last Sabbath morning. He is regarded as an orator and a first class scholar. On Sunday afternoon he preached in the St. James' P. E. Church. His discourse was much admired. He also preached for Rev. J. M. Brown at night.

On Monday night Mr. Crummell lectured in Ebenezer Church on the Progress of Civilization on the Western Coast of Africa. It was a masterly production, and gave more satisfaction than any previous one we have heard. He will lecture on Thursday evening in Bethel Church upon the same subject.

We have just conveyed to the house appointed for all the living another one of our highly respected members, viz., Sister Ann Ash, who was well known to many of the African Methodist family.

The Baltimore Annual Conference will meet on Thursday, 17th of April, instead of the 24th, as reported by me in a previous number of your paper, and we extend an invitation to our brethren to come and see us.

We were pleased to learn, a few days ago, that Rev. Richard Barney, of the Philadelphia Conference, is on a visit to our city, the place of his nativity. He is much respected in our city. We never see him but we think of the time when he and I were licensed to exhort by the well known Rev. Richard Williams of blessed memory.

As we write, Rev. James N. Gloucester is taking leave of our city for his home in Brooklyn, New York W

COME AND SEE

The death-bed scene of the Rev John Wesley is now to be seen in our book room, hanging up in a frame, so that any one can have the pleasure of seeing it; after which we think they will purchase one, as we have them for sale. It is a beautiful steel engraving.

LETTER FROM WM JACKSON.

Vincennes, March 12th, 1862

MR. EDITOR:—It is truly gratifying, in these times, to know that the feelings for the Book Concern, the Editor and Recorder on this Circuit are on the increase. We cannot reasonably expect to swell the number of our subscribers during these exciting times; still if we can keep up an interest in our work for the Christian Recorder, we will be doing comparatively well, simply because some of our people are poor, and would do more for the Christian Recorder if they could. I am happy to see the young ladies and gentlemen of our city so appreciate the Christian Recorder as they do The following is an evidence of the right spirit and a determination to stand by the Book Concern, and to pray for our beloved Editor, Rev. Elisha Weaver, and to subscribe for and pay for the Christian Recorder. I have tried, and yet am trying to set the demands and wants plainly before our people. I find my people a willing people, a religious and intelligent people.

We held a meeting March the 10th, 1862, in the A. M. E. Church, for the special benefit of the Christian Recorder. The meeting was opened by singing and offering prayer to a throne of grace—after which it was, on motion,

Resolved, That Rev. Wm Jackson be the Chairman of the meeting, which prevailed.

It was also by motion

Resolved, That Rev. John W. Waller be the Secretary of the meeting.

The Chair arose and stated the object of the meeting, after which Mrs. E. A. Jackson arose and made some interesting remarks. She spoke of her knowledge of the connexion, and that she has had the pleasure of being a member of the A. M. E. Church for 26 years. She referred to the Christian Herald and the Christian Intelligencer, and the efforts made on the part of the Editors to sustain these papers, and the Book Concern. She also spoke of their failure, and the embarrassed state of the Book Concern, and then referred to the present Editor, Rev. E. Weaver, whom the Lord raised up in the Indiana Conference. It is he who stands head of our Book Concern, and the Editor of the Christian Recorder—the organ of a great people. She, therefore, recommended this periodical, and hoped that it may be supported at all hazard.

Mrs. Sarah A. McGilpin arose and made an interesting address on the importance of education and the support of the Christian Recorder. She was very beautifully responded to by Mr. William Stewart, who urged the citizens to engage in this laudable enterprise, and support the Recorder.

Miss Caroline Rollins arose and spoke on the subject of the elevation of our race, and the Christian Recorder. She said, though the progress was slow, it will finally be accomplished if properly looked to. She referred to the slow progress of Noah's ark, and the final accomplishment of it; also to the building of Solomon's Temple, and the accomplishment of it. She was responded to by Mr. Reservos Knigh. He impressed that our example should be extended to the rising generation. Miss Mary Posey arose and addressed the audience in a very sublime and interesting manner. She was responded to by Mr. Joseph Stewart. He referred to the life and emancipation of the Right Rev. Richard Allen, and the progress and extension of our Church through the many difficulties to which she has come, and he spoke of the Christian Recorder as the only organ that we have to meet our demands, and that we ought to support the Christian Recorder, for its Editor is worthy of the strongest encouragement, after which we raised a collection of two cent money for the benefit of the Book Concern—two dollars and sixty cents—and got eight new subscribers for the Christian Recorder, as follows, seven for six months and one for three months:

Two-cent money for the Book Concern,	$2 60
Twenty numbers of the Christian Recorder, March 8th,	1 00
Subscribers for the Recorder:
Mr Joseph Stewart,	1 00
Mr. Patrick Thomas,	1 00
Mr. Eli Lofton,	1 00
Mrs. Sarah A. McGilpin,	1 00
Mr. John W. Beard,	1 00
Mr. Charles L. Posy,	50
Miss Caroline White,	1 00
Mr. George Dunlap,	1 00

Please to send me four hymn-books for ninety cents a-piece, and three Disciplines, and two Union Bible Dictionaries, two dozen Catechisms, and send me 30 more of the Recorders of March 8th. I had not enough of them to supply the people, and send me 20 extra numbers of the paper that you record this article in. I remit you the sum of $13.00.

I will settle all that is due you.

Yours in Christ, WILLIAM JACKSON
